Philip had received an invitation from the emperor, together with a declaration of his intentions of resigning to him his dominions. He therefore took this opportunity of retiring to Flanders, and met his father at Brussels. Here the emperor instructed him in the art of government; and recommended to him the following maxims for his conduct, which Philip took no care to observe: "To think himself rich, when his subjects were so; and wise when he had wise counsellors; to govern his subjects rather by love than by fear; to let a small fault pass unpunished, rather than condemn an innocent person; to avoid the curiosity of searching into things done in private; to leave the secrets of men's hearts and thoughts to God, and the chastisement of interior offences to the divine vengeance; since, what the eyes of man could not see, it was not fit for their hands to punish. Had Charles himself directed his conduct by those maxims Germany and the Netherlands had not been deluged with blood, nor Europe been filled with widows and orphans. But the cool reflections of age had now discovered to him the emptiness of his former pursuits; and he found that the vain scheme of extending his empire, had been the source of endless opposition and disappointment, had kept himself, his neighbours, and his subjects in perpetual inquietude, and had frustrated the sole end of government, the felicity of the nations committed to his care.

The parliament met on the twenty-first of October, but with visible discontent at the late proceedings. They indeed confirmed the queen's resignation of the first-fruits and tenths, but were so fearful of restoring to the clergy an authority so odious to the nation, and so highly offended at the queen's giving up the church lands, that it was with the utmost difficulty they granted a moderate supply. Mary therefore soon dissolved a parliament she found so untractable. This sudden change in the temper of the house of commons, is, perhaps, with justice, attributed to the death of Gardiner, who paid the debt of nature on the twelfth of November. By the death of this prelate, the queen was deprived of her ablest counsellor, and the only person in the ministry who had any great authority in the parliament. He was a person of a selfish character; a profound dissembler, and of a proud, vindictive and cruel disposition. He understood the canon and civil law as well as most of his time; he wrote latin with ease and purity, and few of his contemporaries excelled him in the knowledge of the Greek language. He is said to have felt some remorse in his last moments for the cruel persecutions he had carried on against the protestants, and to have exclaimed, "I have sinned with Peter, but I have not wept with Peter!"

A.D. 1556. The refusal of the parliament to grant the supplies necessary for satisfying the demands of Philip, so highly exasperated the queen, that she had recourse to every method in her power to extort money from her people. She levied a loan of sixty thousand pounds, upon a thousand persons; whom she was assured would not refuse to assist her; but that sum being insufficient to answer the end proposed, the she exacted a general loan of an hundred pounds a piece of all persons possessed of twenty pounds a year; she extorted sixty thousand marks from seven thousand yeomen; who had not contributed to former loans; and exacted sixty thousand pounds from the cloth-merchants of London trading to Antwerp, which they refused, having advanced her large sums already. But Mary was determined not to be disappointed; and having received advice that they had shipped great quantities of cloth for Antwerp fair, she seized both ships and cargo, laying upon them a new subsidy of twenty shillings for each piece of cloth; by an arbitrary stretch of the royal prerogative; nor could they procure this imposition to be abolished, till they had agreed to advance forty thousand pounds, and to engage to pay twenty thousand more in a limited time. All these violent and oppressive measures were pursued at a time when England enjoyed a profound tranquillity, and when Mary herself had no other occasion for money than to satisfy the exorbitant demands of a husband, who was equally regardless of her love and her generosity, and attended to nothing but his own interest.

The power of Philip now rose to the highest pitch by the retreat of Charles V. his father, who, though still in the vigour of his age, had determined to seek, in the tranquillity of retirement, that happiness he had so ardently pursued in vain amidst the tumults of war, and the restless projects of ambition. He accordingly embarked on board a fleet, sailed immediately to Spain, and took his journey to St. Just, a monastery in Estramedura, which being situated in a happy climate, and amidst the greatest beauties of nature, he had chosen for the place where he intended to end his days in solitude and contemplation. He was soon convinced that the homage he had received, had been paid to his fortune rather than to his person. He, however, pursued his design with undaunted resolution, and shut himself up in his retreat. Being thus secluded from the world, he amused himself in examining the religious controversies which had so much agitated Europe in his reign, and in imitating the works of celebrated mechanics. Among the rest the construction of clocks and watches engaged his attention, and never being able to make two go in a perfect equality of time, he concluded from thence that it was impossible for men to agree exactly in the articles of faith; and that it was unjust to punish them for their opinions. This conclusion proved, at least, that he had changed his own. Notwithstanding the ingratitude of his son Philip, who no sooner succeeded than he neglected him, he endeavoured to make him master of the empire, with all the other vast estates of the family. But Ferdinand the brother of Charles, who had been elected king of the Romans, would not come into his views; and the house of Austria was divided into two branches. Paul IV. refused to crown Ferdinand, alledging, that though on the death of an emperor he was obliged to crown the prince elected, yet in case of a resignation, the right devolved to the holy see, and consequently it belonged to the pope alone to name an emperor.

That turbulent pontiff was a sworn enemy to the house of Austria, and accordingly engaged Henry II. of France to break the truce with Spain. Philip was not fond of war; his object was to govern by political resources, and flattered himself by that means alone to rise superior to all his enemies, and extend, at once, his authority and dominions. But being obliged to take up arms, he endeavoured to engage the English in his cause against France. Had the decision depended entirely upon the queen, he would have found no difficulty in his application; she was incapable of refusing the demands of a husband the so tenderly loved; but she had little influence in the council, and still less among the people: her government was hardly able to support itself in the midst of a profound peace.

A. D. 1557. Philip returned to England on the twentieth of March; and the nation was soon after alarmed with accounts that a rebellion was broke out in the northern parts of the kingdom. Thomas Stafford, a lineal descendant from the late duke of Buckingham, and consequently possessed of a distant claim upon the crown, had for some time taken refuge in France, where he had been joined by several other disaffected persons; and, unhappily for themselves, mistaking the discontents of the people for an indication of their readiness to take up arms against the government, they attempted to excite an insurrection. About the latter end of April they landed in Scotland, marched directly to Scarborough, and seized the castle. Stafford now assumed the title of protector of the kingdom, and published a manifesto, pretending that the queen had forfeited her right to the crown by introducing Spaniards into England. But he soon found the people, however oppressed with regard to religion, were too cautious to join his standard. The earl of Westmoreland marched against him, defeated his little army, and took him prisoner. Persuaded that this attempt to disturb the internal peace of the kingdom was owing to the instigations of the French king, a resolution was taken in the council to declare war against that monarch, which was accordingly performed, with great solemnity, about the middle of June.

Having thus procured the assistance of the English, Philip passed over to the Low Countries; while his general, the duke of Savoy, strengthened with the junction of a body of British forces, entered Picardy, and St. Quintin. As the place was but poorly fortified, and defended only by a weak garrison, he hoped in a few days to compel it to surrender; but the governor, admiral Coligny, thinking it his duty to save so important a fortress, threw himself into the town, with a few battalions of French and Scots, and by his exhortations and example, encouraged the soldiers to make a vigorous defence. In the mean time he sent an express to his uncle, the constable Montmorency, then at the head of the French army, requesting a reinforcement. That general accordingly advanced towards St. Quintin, at the head of his whole army, in order to facilitate the attempt of throwing a body of forces into the town.

The duke of Savoy, one of the greatest generals of his age, informed of the constable's design, fell upon the reinforcement with such irresistible fury, that not more than five hundred men entered the place. Animated by this success, he attacked the constable, routed his whole army, and took him prisoner. Two thousand five hundred of the enemy fell on the field of battle, among whom were several princes and noblemen of the first distinction.

This defeat filled France with consternation; and the duke of Savoy, to improve the advantage he had gained over the enemy, dispatched the duke of Bedford, and the count of Egmont, at the head of four thousand men, to make an inroad into France. They obeyed their instructions, and ravaged the country to the distance of two and twenty miles, without meeting with the least resistance. The inhabitants of Paris were so terrified, that they began to fortify their city with the utmost expedition; and had the duke of Savoy marched directly to the capital, he had, in all probability, made himself master of the place; but he continued the siege of St. Quintin, which, by the bravery of the admiral, held out seventeen days, when it was taken by storm, and that gallant officer, with his brother, and all who had survived of the garrison, were made prisoners. The noble defence made by the admiral, saved France. The Spaniards lost the favourable opportunity of pushing their conquests, till the advanced season obliged them to go into winter quarters.

A. D. 1558. The French, in the mean time, recovered from their fears, and made the necessary preparations for rendering abortive any attempts of the enemy. They even formed an attempt for reducing Calais, a fortress considered as impregnable, especially during the winter. Among the papers of the French admiral, taken prisoner at St. Quintin, some obscure hints of this design were found; and Philip failed not to inform Mary of the discovery he had made, and offered to supply her with troops to defend the place. But the English council considering this intimation as a stratagem of Philip to get possession of Calais, not only declined the offer, but neglected to put the place in a posture of defence, notwithstanding the repeated solicitations of the governor.

The duke of Guise, lately created lieutenant-general of France, not content with fortifying the frontiers of the kingdom, resolved, even in the depth of winter, to attempt the reduction of Calais; an enterprize which France, during her greatest success, had always considered as impossible, and therefore seldom attempted. The place was commanded by lord Wentworth, a brave and experienced officer; but the garrison consisted only of five hundred soldiers, and about two hundred townsmen. The English having, at the end of autumn, drawn off a great part of the garrison, with an intention to replace them in the spring, when their attendance was thought absolutely necessary. Guise knew this, and determined to take advantage of his discovery.

Calais was surrounded by morasses on the land side, and could only be approached by a dyke, at the head of which was a bridge, defended by a fort called Newenham, about a quarter of a mile from the town. Near this fort was another, called St. Agatha; and the entrance of the harbour was defended by a castle, termed the Ryfbank. Such was the situation of Calais when Guise sat down before it, to the astonishment of all Europe. It was not even imagined that the French could be able to undertake any enterprize of consequence, so soon after the dreadful defeat they had suffered at St. Quintin.

When the duke of Guise began his march towards Calais, a fleet of French ships was sent into the channel, under pretence of cruising on the trading vessels of the English, but in reality to assist the land forces in their attempts upon a place deemed impregnable. The first operation of the French was against Fort Agatha, which the English, after a gallant defence, were forced to abandon. The garrison, however, threw themselves into Fort Newenham, which was immediately invested by the enemy. At the same time, the French ships cannonaded the Ryfbank, and both forts soon became untenable. Wentworth saw the necessity of abandoning these castles, as the greater part of his garrison was employed in defending them: he therefore gave orders for their capitulating with the enemy, and joining him in Calais, which, without their assistance, he was in no condition to defend. The garrison of Newenham followed his instructions, and were permitted to retire into the town: but those in the Ryfbank were not so fortunate; the French admiral refused to sign any capitulation; and the garrison were soon after obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war.

All access to Calais was now totally cut off; and the duke of Guise formed, with prodigious labour, a road, constructed with pitched hurdles, through the morasses, by the help of which a large detachment of his army lodged themselves behind some heights, near the walls of the town. Here they erected a battery of fifteen pieces of large cannon against the castle, in which a practicable breach was soon made. D'Andelot, brother to admiral Coligny, was now ordered to draw the water out of the ditch, and successfully executed the task in one night. The next day the duke ordered a general assault, which was made with such fury, that the breach was carried by storm, and the French effected a lodgment in the castle. During the ensuing night, Wentworth endeavoured to recover that post; but having lost two hundred men, and the French pouring such numbers into the castle, he thought any farther defence would be madness, and accordingly capitulated on the following conditions, the best he could obtain in his distressed situation: "That he himself should remain a prisoner of war, with fifty of the chief officers of his garrison: that the rest should be at liberty to retire, either to England or Flanders; and that the place, with all its provisions, ammunition, cannon, and riches, should be immediately delivered up to the French." This capitulation was signed on the seventeenth of January. Ham and Guisnes were taken by the twenty-second; and the duke of Guise reduced, in less than thirty days, and even in the depth of winter, what had cost Edward III. a siege of eleven months, at the head of an army flushed with the glory they had lately acquired in the fields of Cressy.

But instead of being roused to vengeance, they sunk in despair; their spirits were broken by a series of calamities and disgrace. Mary was so sensibly affected with the loss of Calais, that she abandoned herself to grief; and repeatedly declared to those about her, "That her end was approaching, and that she should never recover the effects of this misfortune." She, however, assembled the parliament, in order to obtain supplies. This was effected, though not without opposition from the Commons, who seemed determined to remonstrate against the abuse of prerogative. They also passed an act for confirming all alienations of crown-lands that the queen had made, or might think proper to make during the space of seven years to come. One Copley, a member of the house, having expressed his apprehensions, that the queen, under the sanction of this dangerous act, might alienate even the crown itself, to the prejudice of the lawful heir, was punished for his presumption.

But the government was much more intent on persecuting the Protestants at home, than in consulting the best means of repairing the national losses abroad. All who refused to conform to the Catholic religion, or were found possessed of what were then stiled heretical books, were punished without mercy; even the life of Elizabeth herself was perpetually in danger. Notwithstanding the protection of Philip, who was greatly interested in her safety, that princess had undoubtedly fallen a sacrifice to the cruel hatred of her sister, had she not, by the most prudent conduct, avoided every thing that might render her suspected, and disarmed even calumny itself. In the retreat where she resided, remote from the court, and surrounded with spies, she devoted herself wholly to study; and was preparing, in solitude and silence, for those important scenes in which she was soon to bear so distinguished a part. She made religion itself subservient to policy: she conformed to the established worship, though strongly attached to the Protestant principles. To have acted otherwise, would, indeed, have been no other than running headlong to death, and the time of her ascending the throne was at no great distance.

Though the English had refused the offer of Philip with regard to throwing a strong reinforcement into Calais, he made a proposal for assisting them to the utmost of his power in recovering that important fortress, before the season would permit the French to repair the works, which were now in a very bad condition. But this offer was also refused, and no military expedition attempted till the spring was considerably advanced, when a fleet of one hundred and forty sail of ships was fitted out, for revenging the insult upon the enemy. This fleet being reinforced with thirty Flemish ships, having on board a body of six thousand land forces, were sent to alarm the coast of France. They accordingly landed near Breff; but so little care had been taken to conceal the design, that the French were prepared for their reception; and the English were obliged to retreat to their ships, without having effected any thing of consequence.

A much smaller squadron, consisting only of ten ships, were, however, more fortunate; they had an opportunity of retorting upon the enemy the disgrace suffered by their countrymen. The marshal de Thermes, governor of Calais, invaded Flanders at the head of an army of fourteen thousand men. He crossed the Aa without opposition, and made himself master of Dunkirk and Berg St. Winloc. But being overtaken by the Spaniards under count Egmont, near Gravelines, a bloody contest ensued. While the two armies were closely engaged, and fortune seemed undetermined on which side to bestow the wreath of victory, the English men of war came into the harbour, and pointing their cannon against the flank of the French, made such a dreadful slaughter, that the whole army was thrown into confusion, and the Spaniards gained a complete victory.
the

This action was, however, little more than a prelude to the grand event which was every day expected. The two grand armies of France and Spain were now approaching each other; and as the two contending monarchs had come into their respective camps, attended by the flower of their nobility, a general engagement, which would decide the contest, was thought to be inevitable. But Philip possessed not the enterprising spirit of a conqueror. Notwithstanding the great superiority of his numbers, and the two important victories he had lately obtained over the forces of the enemy, he chose rather to have recourse to negotiation than venture a battle. He demanded, among other articles, that Calais should be restored to the English; and Henry, that the kingdom of Navarre should be delivered to its right owner. But before any thing was determined between them, the queen of England died; and Philip being no longer connected with that kingdom, soon relaxed in his demands with regard to that capital article.

The health of Mary had been long declining. She had for some time been afflicted with a dropy, the consequence of her false conception, and the improper regimen she had pursued. The malady was greatly increased by the anxiety of her mind, which was now increased by the most painful reflections. The consciousness of being hated by her subjects; the mortification of being without children; the fear of leaving her crown to a sister whom she detested; the approaching ruin that threatened the Catholic religion; the indifference of a husband, who was going to retire into Spain; all these disagreeable reflections preyed upon her mind, and threw her into a slow fever, of which she died on the seventeenth of November, in the forty-third year of her age, and the sixth of her reign.

The character of Mary is so strongly marked in every action of her inglorious and unfortunate reign, that the disagreeable task of a recapitulation may be well spared. She possessed few estimable or amiable qualities; nor was her person more engaging than her behaviour. Every circumstance of her character received a tincture from the badness of her temper, and the narrowness of her understanding. Obstinacy, bigotry, violence, cruelty, malignity, revenge, tyranny, were the ruling passions of her mind; and it will, perhaps, be difficult to find a single virtue among so remarkable a complication of vices.

Cardinal Pole, who had long laboured under an intermitting fever, died the same day with the queen. He was a person of great sweetness of temper, candour, and moderation, and was lamented by all who knew how to esteem those valuable qualities. In a nation where such cruel persecutions were carried on against the Reformation, Pole experienced not the hatred of the Protestants.

Neither the commerce nor the marine of England had yet obtained any respectable footing. Fourteen thousand pounds having been voted for the service of the navy, it was computed, that when this sum was expended, ten thousand pounds a year would be sufficient for its maintenance. The privileges of the German merchants were restored at the solicitation of the emperor; and no doubt was entertained with regard to the power of the crown to grant such an indulgence. A passage to Archangel had been discovered during the last reign, and tended greatly to improve the commerce of England with Muscovy. The Czar sent an embassy to the queen; and this was, probably, the first time that the Russian empire had any correspondence with the inhabitants of the western kingdoms.

By a law passed in Mary's reign, the number of horses and arms each person, in proportion to his abilities, should supply for the defence of the kingdom, was fixed. Those of the first class, consisting of all who inherited a thousand pounds a year, were to keep six horses; with their proper furniture for dragoons, and ten for the light horse. Exclusive of these, they were to furnish forty pikes, thirty halberds, twenty muskets, and twenty morions or sallets. This method was, doubtless, subject to many inconveniences; but the revenues of the crown, and the supplies of parliament, were so inconsiderable, that there was no other method of equipping the troops. The revenue of England, at that time, was very little more than three hundred thousand pounds a year.

A. D. THE arbitrary council of Mary were 1558. thrown into the utmost consternation at the death of the queen. The parliament was sitting when the event happened, and far from being pleased with the late transactions of the ministry. The latter well knew the consequence that would inevitably result from their acting by their own authority, and therefore resolved to inform the House of Lords that the throne was vacant. A short consultation ensued, and Elizabeth was unanimously declared the legal successor. The Commons followed their example; and that princess was immediately proclaimed at the usual places, while the Protestants and Papists seemed to vie with each other in shewing their joy on this happy occasion.

Elizabeth was then at Hatfield, in Hertfordshire, where she had for some time resided, and where she received information of the steps taken in her favour by the parliament. The first act of her government was a proclamation, strictly enjoining "all her subjects to keep the peace, and forbear all attempts, upon any pretence whatever, to break or alter any order or usage at that time established." This prudent measure was taken to prevent those disorders which there was too much reason to apprehend would otherwise have resulted from the intemperate zeal of some of the reformed, who, following the precedent given them by the popish party in the late reign, might have proceeded in an illegal and riotous manner in destroying the superstitious objects of the Catholics, and restoring the reformed method of worship, without waiting for the royal orders.

The queen was about twenty-five years of age, when she passed, as it were, from a prison to a throne. The remembrance of her misfortunes added a lustre to her merit, and she was considered as the deliverer of the kingdom. Born with superior talents, she had acquired, by study, the great art of government, and had in herself all the resources of genius, authority, and policy. Her compliances during the late reign had had inspired the Catholics with hopes, that she was not so great an enemy to their religion as to the cruel and bloody methods made use of to enforce it; while the Protestants believed her to be sincerely a friend to their more humane and enlightened doctrine. She knew the advantage of keeping both parties in suspense, and accordingly formed her council of state out of persons of both religions.

Elizabeth seemed, on her change of fortune, to forget all the injuries she had received from her enemies. She returned thanks to heaven for her deliverance as for a miracle; but she wished not to make her persecutors feel the weight of the rod of retaliation. Even Sir Henry Bedingfield, who had been her keeper in prison, and who had even delighted in treating her with the utmost rigour, found her insensible to the desire of revenge. This noble instance of a superior understanding and beneficent disposition charmed her enemies; they were convinced that their religion would never be punished as a crime by a princess who cherished not the passion of revenge.

Philip received the news of Elizabeth's accession to the English throne with great surprize; but desirous of securing his interest in that kingdom, he ordered his minister to pay her his compliments on that occasion, and offer her proposals of marriage. He flattered himself with obtaining at last the government of that kingdom, over which Mary, or rather the parliament, had given him no power. But the queen knew too well the aversion of the English to an alliance with Spain; and, at the same time, was too fond of her own independence, to accept his proposals. Her desire of making an advantageous peace with France, before she declared her real intentions, induced her, however, to elude his offers, without appearing to reject them; and Philip, as if already sure of success, solicited a dispensation from the Roman pontiff.

Elizabeth was well acquainted with all the religious disputes which had so long divided Europe, and embraced the Protestant tenets from conviction. But though she was determined to restore the reformed worship in England, her ambassador at Rome received orders to notify to the pope her accession to the throne. Had the pontiff been the least desirous of supporting his own interest, and that of the holy see, he could not, on this critical occasion, have acted with too much prudence and moderation. But Paul IV. one of the most haughty and inflexible churchmen that ever filled the papal chair, instead of endeavouring to heal the breaches that had so long subsisted between the churches of Rome and England, behaved with all the insolence natural to his character. He declared, that the kingdom, being a fief of the holy see, it was an act of the highest presumption in Elizabeth to assume the title of queen without his concurrence; that her illegitimate birth excluded her from the right of succession; that he would not annul the decree passed against the marriage of her father with Anne Boleyn; but that if she would solicit his favour, he would shew her all the indulgence she could expect from the head of the church. The queen being informed of this answer, said, that the pope, in order to gain too much, was willing to lose the whole. She accordingly recalled her ambassador, and applied herself seriously to restore a religion altogether unfavourable to the papacy. But she used not terrifying, but conciliating measures. She withdrew not her favours from the Catholic party. When the bishops came in a body to pay her their obedience, she expressed her sentiments of regard for them all, except Bonner, from whom she turned aside as from a man polluted with blood, an object that excited horror in every heart susceptible of the tender feelings of humanity.

The violences of the preceding reign had sufficiently disposed the people to a change in religion: but she feared they would run into the opposite extreme, and severely retaliate on the Catholics the miseries they had suffered. In order, therefore, to render this change less dangerous and more durable, she imitated not the precipitate conduct of her sister; she took her measures with caution, and ensured her success by the rectitude of her views. She soon perceived that the Protestant divines attacked, with all the virulence of religious zeal, the superstitious worship of the Roman church; and that the Papists retorted upon them with equal acrimony. She therefore published a proclamation, forbidding all preaching, without a special licence, that the pulpits might not be filled with the combustibles of discord. At the same time, she introduced such a number of Protestants into her council, as were sufficient to counterbalance the power of the Papists, should they exert themselves in favour of the ancient religion. She discharged from prison, or recalled from exile, those whose religion only had been their crime; and she ordered the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Gospel, to be read in English. The elevation of the host was discontinued, and a greater zeal was expressed for the Bible than for the Church of Rome.

These steps towards a reformation so alarmed the popish bishops, that, apprehending a total abolition of the papal power, together with the ceremonies of the church of Rome, would soon follow; or, perhaps, fearful of offending the holy father, who had scrupled to acknowledge the queen's title, and absolutely denied her legitimacy, they resolved not to officiate at her coronation. Oglethorpe, bishop of Carlisle, alone opposed the resolution, and readily undertook to perform the ceremony.

A.D. 1559. On the fourteenth of January, Elizabeth passed from the Tower through the streets of London, in grand procession, to Westminster, amidst the acclamations of a prodigious number of spectators assembled on that occasion. The queen's behaviour was remarkable: she returned their applauses with such a modest affability and winning behaviour, as charmed the hearts of all beholders. But nothing displayed in a stronger light the religious sentiments of the citizens, or tended more to endear the new sovereign to the people, than her accepting of an English bible, richly gilt, which was let down, from a pageant in Cheapside, by a child representing Truth, who made the queen a speech on the occasion. Elizabeth received the book in both her hands; and having kissed it, held it up, and laid it on her bosom, promising to be diligent in reading it; and assuring the citizens, that she esteemed that gift more than all the costly presents they had made her. The next day the queen was crowned at Westminster with great solemnity.

The parliament, which assembled on the twenty-fifth of January, gave the queen every testimony of zealous loyalty and obedience. The two houses, after confirming her right to the crown, acknowledged her supremacy, and gave her, under the title of head of the church, the tenths, first-fruits, and impropriations, which had been restored to the pope by queen Mary, together with all the ecclesiastical authority which her father and her brother had enjoyed, and also a power of adjusting that authority to such commissioners, whether ecclesiastics or laymen, as she should think proper to nominate. Several penalties were threatened to all those who refused to take the oath of supremacy. The statutes of Edward VI. were confirmed. The mass and liturgy of the church of Rome were abolished.

All these changes took place without any disturbance, and almost without opposition. The affability of the queen, her address in gaining hearts, and directing opinions, her graceful dignity, her insinuating manners, subdued all the difficulties of the enterprise: she dispensed the national religion from her hand. So little did the cruelty of Mary contribute to the establishment of her equally cruel system of popery!

Nor did the affair of religion wholly engross the attention of the parliament. The commons, exclufive of tonnage and poundage, then considered as the property of the crown, voted new supplies to Elizabeth, and petitioned her in form to make choice of a husband. She answered, with great politeness, that she always considered marriage as a burden, and that while she was charged with the government of so great a kingdom, it seemed still more so; that the state was her husband, and the people of England her children; and that she should not think herself barren, nor her life unfruitful, while her days were devoted to the care of such a family. At the same time she gave them to understand, that any farther applications on that head would be disagreeable.

The bishops, however, still opposed the tenets of the Reformation; one only agreed to take the oath of supremacy, all the rest refused, and were deprived of their sees. But out of near ten thousand parishes contained in the kingdom, not more than twenty-four of the parochial clergy rejected the oath. Bonner alone felt the weight of the hand of authority; he was committed to the Marshalsea, and died in confinement. Some foreign princes interposed their good offices to procure the catholics the privilege of separate assemblies in particular cities, but the queen would not comply with their request; and represented the danger of disturbing the national peace by a toleration of different religions. But in order to induce the catholics to join in the established worship, she caused every thing to be struck out of the new liturgy, that had any tendency to give them offence.

While the queen and parliament were employed in settling the public religion, the negotiations for a peace were carrying on at Chateau-Cambrois, between the ministers of France, Spain and England. The treaty was at last concluded, by which Calais was given up to Henry, who, on the other hand, engaged to restore it at the end of eight years, provided, during that time, Elizabeth did not break the peace either with France or Scotland. All men of penetration easily saw, that this stipulation was nothing more than a colourable pretence for abandoning Calais; but they excused the queen for making the sacrifice on account of the necessity of her affairs, and even extolled her prudence in submitting without farther struggle to that necessity. A peace with Scotland followed as a necessary consequence of that with France. The treaty was more honourable for the king of Spain. Henry II. restored all the places he had conquered, and gave him his daughter in marriage. It was also agreed that Philibert, duke of Savoy, should marry the French king's sister. The ceremonies were accordingly performed, when Henry II. was accidentally killed by a wound he received in his eye from the splinter of a lance, at a tournament held in honour of the nuptials.

His son and successor Francis II. who had married Mary, queen of Scots, was a prince void of genius and experience. He was nothing more than an instrument in the hands of the Guises, who hurried him into measures which tended to augment their ambition and their vanity. Persuaded that the accession of England in right of their niece, the queen of Scotland, would aggrandize their family, they had prevailed upon Henry II. to maintain an army in Scotland, as the only avenue by which the English dominions were accessible. By their persuasions also the young king of France, who was incapable of holding the reins of government, contested the legitimacy of Elizabeth's birth, in order, on a proper opportunity, to dispute her right to the English crown. Mary took the arms and title of queen of England, and by her intimate alliance with the French nation, was considered as a formidable rival. Elizabeth saw her danger, and determined to exert all her prudence and all her courage to render the attempts of her enemies abortive.

The troubles of Scotland seemed to offer the means for defeating the projects of the Guises. The disturbances excited by religious disputes had now attained the most enormous heights. The Protestants were headed by persons of the first distinction; particularly by the earl of Argyle, the lords Turner and Morton, and others of the nobility. They entered into a bond of association, and called themselves "The Congregation of the Lord," in contradistinction to the established church, which they denominated "The Congregation of Satan." The substance of the bond was as follows: "We perceiving how Satan, in his members, the antichrists of our time, do cruelly rage, seeking to overthrow and to destroy the gospel of Christ and his congregation, ought, according to our bounden duty, to strive in our master's cause, even to the death, being certain of the victory in him. We do therefore promise, before the majesty of God and his congregation, that we, by his grace, shall with all diligence continually apply our whole power, substance, and our very lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish, the most blessed word of God, and his congregation; and shall labour, by all possible means, to have faithful ministers, truly and purely to minister Christ's gospel and sacraments to his people: we shall maintain them, nourish them, and defend them, the whole congregation of Christ, and every member thereof, by our whole power, and at the hazard of our lives, against Satan, and all wicked powers, who may intend tyranny, and trouble against the said congregation. Unto which holy word and congregation we do join ourselves; and we forsake and renounce the congregation of Satan, with all the superstitious abomination and idolatry thereof; and moreover shall declare ourselves manifestly enemies thereto, by this faithful promise before God, testified to this congregation by our subscriptions."

The signing of this bond of association was followed by an open revolt from the clergy and the church of Rome. They committed ravages in various parts of the country, and the whole kingdom became one continued scene of disorder. About this time John Knox, one of the most zealous preachers in Europe, returned to Scotland. He had been persecuted for his religion, and took refuge at Geneva. His enthusiastic sermons kindled the flames of rebellion. The Romish priests were attacked, the images broken, the monasteries demolished, and every disorder that could be expected from a multitude inflamed with religious madness, was committed. The fanatical leaders of the reformed party declared, in a manifesto, that they took up arms by the express commands of God, as the children of Israel did against the Canaanites, and that they would listen to no propositions of peace, while the idolatry of the papists, and the persecutions of the children of God subsisted.

But the heads of the revolt soon perceived that it would be impossible to execute their project without the assistance of some foreign power. They were already distressed for want of money, and found, that the reformation of religion, however desired by the people, would not be sufficient to keep a numerous army together. The revolt therefore, notwithstanding the inveterate hatred that subsisted between the two kingdoms, applied to Elizabeth for assistance. The court of France were at first pleased with these commotions, as they afforded a plausible pretence for sending forces into Scotland, who would be there in readiness to act against Elizabeth, and support Mary's claim to the English crown. But on receiving intelligence that the Scottish revolt was negotiating with Elizabeth for assistance, they were greatly alarmed, and exerted all their influence to render the treaty abortive. They even offered to restore Calais, and all its dependences, if the queen would observe a strict neutrality. But Elizabeth was too prudent to be diverted from her purpose: she answered, that a small fishing town was of little consequence when compared to the security of her dominions. She dispatched Randolph into Scotland, to assure the revolters of support, and to animate the leaders of the congregation in their design of shaking off their subjection to Rome, and the reformation of religion.

A. D. 1560. A squadron of sixteen ships of war was accordingly fitted out, under the command of vice-admiral Winter; and an army of eight thousand men was ordered to rendezvous at Berwick, on the thirtieth of January, in order to act in concert with the fleet, and join the revolvers. The appearance of the English ships in the Forth gave new spirits to the leaders of the congregation. While the French forces, terrified at the loss of some of their ships, which Winter had destroyed in his passage up the river, retired to Leith, in order to wait the powerful reinforcements they expected from the continent. But the troubles which now broke out in France demanded all the attention of the ministry, who therefore laid aside all thoughts of invading England.

On the twenty-seventh of February, a treaty of mutual defence was signed at Berwick, between the duke of Norfolk, earl marshal of England, on the part of Elizabeth, and the leaders of the congregation; and the English received orders to join the Scottish revolvers. The combined army immediately began their march for Leith, which was immediately invested. The queen retired to the castle of Edinburgh, where she soon after expired. She was a princess of great capacity, virtue, and moderation; and had the management of the affairs of Scotland been wholly intrusted to her management, she would, probably, have accommodated all differences with the reformers, and preserved the nation from the miseries of a civil war. The French soon perceived that all farther opposition would be in vain, and therefore desired to capitulate. The offer was accepted; and a treaty was signed at Edinburgh, whereby it was stipulated, That the French should evacuate Scotland in twenty-four days, and return to France in ships furnished by Elizabeth: that the king and queen of France and Scotland should thenceforth abstain from bearing the arms of England, or assuming the title of that kingdom: that farther satisfaction for the injury already done in that particular should be granted Elizabeth; and that commissioners should meet to settle this point; or, if they could not agree, the king of Spain should be arbiter between the two crowns. Besides these stipulations, which solely regarded England, some concessions were granted to the Scots, which the plenipotentiaries, in the name of the king and queen of France and Scotland, promised, in the treaty with Elizabeth, to observe; that an amnesty should be published for all past offences; that none but natives should be put into any office in Scotland; that the states should name twenty-four persons, of whom the Queen of Scots should chuse seven, and the States five; that the whole administration of affairs should be committed to these twelve, during the queen's absence; and that Mary should neither make peace nor war without the consent of the States. This treaty, so glorious for Elizabeth, greatly increased her power, and extended her reputation. She became, from that moment, sure of the confidence of the Scottish malecontents, and mistresses of their hearts and fortunes.

This union was still farther cemented by the subsequent measures of the reformers. They assembled the parliament, without any authority or orders from Mary. As soon as the session was opened, they presented a petition against the catholics, in which they were represented as robbers, assassins, and traitors, that ought no longer to be tolerated. Thus the reformers adopted all the violent measures of their enemies. The parliament itself seemed also to be actuated by the same spirit of rage and persecution. The mass was prohibited, under pain of confiscation, banishment, and death. The presbyterian worship, founded on the most rigid principles of Calvinism, was established; and the Romish clergy were stripped of their possessions, and banished from the kingdom. The queen of France and Scotland, who governed her husband, and was herself governed by her uncles, the Guises, refused her consent to these measures, declared she would not ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, and continued the war against Elizabeth. The reformers, however, gave themselves little concern about the refusal of their sovereign; they immediately put the statutes in execution; abolished the mass; settled their ministers; committed every where the most dreadful devastations upon the monasteries, and even the churches, which they considered as having been polluted with idolatry. The rapacity of the people, who had been excited to rebellion by their new preachers, could not be restrained; and fanaticism concurring with avarice, gave an incurable blow to the papal authority in Scotland. These violent proceedings convinced the nobility of that kingdom, that they must now rely on England for protection: their own sovereign was too much exasperated to hope for any favour from her; and the court of France, stimulated by motives both of ambition and religion, would not fail to exert all their power to revenge the insult.

A. D. 1561. During these transactions in Scotland, the fortune of Mary underwent a sudden change, by the death of the king, her husband. Catherine of Medicis, the mother of Charles IX. assumed the whole authority, in quality of regent. Mary Stuart, who experienced nothing but mortifications at her hand, found herself obliged to leave a country which she loved, and return to her unhappy kingdom, rent to pieces on account of religion. Accordingly she sent her ambassador to England, to demand from Elizabeth a safe conduct for herself and the ships that were to attend her. But that princess, who was highly exasperated at her refusing to sign the treaty of Edinburgh, answered, "that every part of her request should be readily granted, provided she previously ratified that convention." She added, "That she should have free liberty to pass through England, where she should be received with all the marks of affection she could expect from a sister." Mary could not retain her resentment at this refusal: she sent for Throgmorton, the English ambassador, and asked him, What offence she had given his mistress, that Elizabeth should deny her so small a favour? "But," (added she) "I can, with God's assistance, return into my own country without her leave, as I came into France in spite of all the opposition of her brother Edward. I want not friends both able and willing to conduct me home, as they brought me hither, though I was desirous rather to make an experiment of her friendship than of the assistance of any other person."

Nor did the delay her departure from France on account of the safe-conduct's being refused by Elizabeth. She repaired to Calais, attended by all her uncles, and several noblemen of the first rank in that kingdom, and embarked in the beginning of August. She seemed greatly affected on her leaving France; she kept her eyes fixed upon the coast till darkness intercepted it from her view. "Farewell France!" she cried, "Farewell, beloved country! I shall never see thee more!" Elizabeth had fitted out a fleet of ships, under pretence of pursuing some pirates, but, probably, with a view of intercepting the Queen of Scots in her passage. Mary, however, passed the English fleet in a fog, and reached her native kingdom in safety on the eighteenth of August, after an absence of thirteen years. She was received by her people with every mark of esteem, regard and affection; and Mary flattered herself with enjoying more happiness and repose than she had reason to expect from the accounts she had received of the state of parties in her kingdom.

She had now reached the nineteenth year of her age; and, if the graces of youth, if the charms of beauty, beauty, if softness of soul, if elegance of manners, if every amiable talent could have touched the hearts of a stubborn, unlightened, and fanatical people; Mary would have soon become the idol of her subjects. Far from interfering in their religious sentiments, she reposed her whole confidence in the heads of the reformers, who were now the leaders of the people. But her being a papist was a sufficient provocation to the multitude. It was with the utmost difficulty she could obtain permission to celebrate mass in her own chapel. "One single mass (said the reforming ministers) is more dangerous to this kingdom than an hundred thousand armed men." Knox, the enthusiastic and turbulent preacher, daily signalized himself by fresh instances of zeal against the Catholics. He publicly called the queen Jezabel; and even went so far as to tell her to her face, in one of his sermons, That Samuel did not hesitate to hew Agag in pieces, in spite of king Saul; that Elias, in the presence of Ahab, neither spared the false prophets of Jezabel, nor the priests of Baal; that Phineas, though no magistrate, put the fornicators to death; and that others of course, though no magistrates, might legally punish those crimes which were condemned by the laws of God." All the endeavours of Mary to gain this impracticable preacher over to her interest were in vain: he rejected her offers with contempt, and continued to disseminate the seeds of revolt and rebellion. He was cited before the council, but refused to make any acknowledgment: he defended his principles without timidity, and was discharged without punishment.

Surrounded with dangers from a bigotted people, she determined, if possible, to maintain a good understanding with Elizabeth. In order to this, she dispatched Maitland, her secretary, to pay her respects to that princess, to signify her desire of cultivating a friendship and good correspondence with her, and requesting that she might be acknowledged her successor in the throne of England, in case she died without issue. It was hardly possible for Mary to have made a more unreasonable request, or to have urged it at a more improper juncture. Elizabeth was highly provoked, and told the Scottish ambassador, "That she was determined to live and die queen of England, and would therefore never have the mortification of seeing her subjects adore the rising sun; that to name a successor was to expose her own life to danger, to destroy the security of her government, to place a winding-sheet before her, and to invite the king of terrors before his time." She added, "That she should leave it to others, after her death, to discuss the title of her successor; that she hoped the Queen of Scots claim would then be found preferable, and that she would do nothing to hurt her interest in that respect."

Elizabeth, though the jealousy she had long entertained against Mary was inflamed by this imprudent step, sent Sir Peter Meutas with compliments to Mary on her safe return to her kingdom, and to insist on her ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh: but Mary still eluded the demand, pretending that the affairs of Scotland were yet in too unsettled a condition for her to examine the articles of that treaty with that attention the importance of them required, as she imagined they might tend to deprive her of all hopes of succeeding to the crown of England. Elizabeth, to put the matter out of all dispute, offered to explain the words of the treaty in such a manner as to leave no suspicion of their excluding Mary's right of succession. But still difficulties occurred, and the treaty continued without being ratified. All disputes were, however, laid aside, and a cordial reconciliation seemed to have taken place between them.

The care of her own government now wholly engaged the attention of Elizabeth. Her first attempt was to put the English navy in a very respectable condition: she augmented the pay of her seamen; filled her magazines with arms; introduced the manufacture of gunpowder into England; ordered a great number of iron and brass pieces of ordnance to be cast; reinforced the garrison of Berwick; fortified the northern borders of her kingdom; introduced and encouraged improvements in agriculture, by permitting the exportation of corn; promoted the trade and navigation of England; regulated the national coin, which her predecessors had altered; and ordered her people to attend the exercise of arms at stated times. The glory that attended her labours attracted the admiration of Europe; and she received the addresses of several princes, who were either in love with her person or her power. She amused their hopes, but always with a resolution to preserve her liberty. Self-love had, possibly, as much concern in this particular as the love of dominion. What is still more singular in her conduct, is, that though she determined never to have any heirs of her own body, she was not only averse to fix any successor to the crown, but also desirous to prevent, as far as lay in her power, any person who had pretensions to the succession from ever having heirs. Catherine Gray, daughter to the duke of Suffolk, sister to lady Jane, and now the sole heiress of that house, was sent to the Tower, for marrying the earl of Hertford without her consent, and died in confinement.

But however severe the queen was with regard to those who had any pretensions to the throne, she was always attentive to remove the oppressions of her subjects. She revoked all warrants granted to the purveyors for victualling the fleet, which were generally executed in a very vexatious manner; and issued orders, that the people should be paid in money for whatever provisions they furnished. She reformed the impositions of the exchequer; and took care that the pensions assigned to the popish clergy, on their resigning their livings, should be punctually paid. She also increased the salary of the judges, and allowed them a provision for their respective circuits. At the same time, she took care that her economy should go hand in hand with her liberality: she gave very little out of the royal demesnes, but on condition of its reverting, on default of male issue, to the crown. It would, perhaps, have been happy, if her successors had invariably observed the same rule.

A. D. 1562. The affairs of the continent now engaged the attention of Elizabeth. The religious wars carried on in France, furnished a new field for her political operations. After the death of Henry II. the Hugonots, whom that prince had persecuted with the utmost rigour, became a very formidable people, whether we consider their zeal for the reformation, their numbers, or the talents of their leaders. The prince of Condé, admiral Coligny, and his brother Andelot, were at the head of the Hugonots, and rendered their party respectable to the government. The Guises were their declared enemies, and armed against them the popish faction. Both parties assumed the mask of religion; and, under pretence of supporting the gospel of peace, carried on the most dreadful wars against each other. Catherine of Medicis, hoping to put an end to the civil discords which had so long wasted France, persuaded the catholics to compromise their differences with the chiefs of the Protestant party; and an edict, favourable to the reformers, was published, by which they were permitted to have places without the cities and towns, for performing divine service according to the tenets of their religion. But this deceitful compliance served only to irritate these two irreconcilable parties. The duke of Guise, who was considered as the protector of the catholic religion, passing through Vassy, a town on the borders of Champagne, fell upon a congregation of Hugonots, who, in consequence of the privilege granted them, were singing psalms in a barn. Above sixty of these poor defenceless people were killed, and the rest fled to the woods for shelter. The consequence of this inhuman action was a general insurrection of the protestants in almost every part of the kingdom, and the nation was divided between the duke of Guise and the prince of Condé. Catherine, fluctuated between both, attempted, but in vain, to mediate a peace between them. She was then at Paris with the young king her son, where finding herself deprived of all authority, she wrote to the prince of Condé to come to her deliverance. This letter augmented the flames of the civil war, which was carried on with the greatest inhumanity: every town was a fortified post; every street a field of battle. Anthony, king of Navarre, the first prince of the blood, was obliged to serve in the army of the duke of Guise, and, with the queen mother, dragged to the siege of Rouen, where he was killed.

Philip II. who made it at once his glory and his interest to extirpate the reformed religion, and was even desirous of casting a shade over the memory of his father, who was suspected of a secret attachment to the new doctrines, after having persecuted their partizans, favoured the papists in France, from whom he hoped to derive considerable advantages. He was also uneasy lest the contagion should spread in the Low Countries, where the inhabitants had already given strong indications of their affection for the reformed religion. He therefore engaged in a secret alliance with the duke of Guise, and sent him six thousand men, and a large sum of money, to strengthen the catholic party.

Perceiving it would be impossible to resist so powerful a confederacy, supported by the royal authority, Condé dispatched the Vidome of Chartres, and de la Haye, to solicit the assistance of Elizabeth, in order to prevent the total ruin of the protestants in France. He offered to put Havre-de-Grace into the hands of the English; provided the queen would undertake to garrison the place with three thousand men, together with three thousand more to defend Dieppe and Rouen, and furnish the prince with a hundred thousand crowns. Elizabeth listened to these proposals, and sent Ambrose Dudley, earl of Warwick, at the head of six thousand men, one half of whom were landed at Dieppe, and the other took possession of Havre. At the same time the queen published a manifesto, declaring, "that she did not send troops into Normandy, with a design to recover that province, the ancient patrimony of her ancestors, and unjustly wrested from her; but to preserve it for the king of France during his minority, and to rescue it from the ambition and tyranny of the princes of Lorraine: that she was the more concerned to endeavour to prevent that province falling into their hands, as it was manifest their design was to seize the ports of Normandy, and from thence to invade her dominions, after extirpating the reformed religion in France: that for these reasons she had thought herself obliged to assist the young king, hinder his subjects from being oppressed by the Guises, protect the professors of the reformed religion, and provide for the safety of her own kingdom."

As soon as this proclamation was published, another was issued by the faction of Lorraine in Paris, in which Elizabeth was charged with breach of faith, in seizing the king's fortresses, and assisting his rebellious subjects; and in consequence of this war was declared against her. This hasty step, which was taken by the advice of the cardinal of Lorraine, was followed by a seizure of all the English ships at Bourdeaux, and the imprisonment of the ambassador's courier at Rouen. But it was soon perceived that they had acted with too much precipitation. The English fitted out privateers to make reprisals on the French, and the utmost dispatch was used in making the necessary preparations for carrying on the war with vigour. The court of France perceived their mistake, disowned the proclamation, and the preparations for war in England were laid aside.

By this time the catholics had made themselves masters of Rouen, and it was expected they would immediately form the siege of Havre, which was not then in any condition of defence; but their attention was diverted to another enterprize by the intestine disorders of the kingdom. Andelet, seconded by the negotiations of Elizabeth, had levied a considerable body of protestants in Germany, and having arrived at Orleans, the fear of the Hugonot's power, the prince of Condé and the admiral were enabled to take the field in order to oppose the progress of their enemies. They first marched into the neighbourhood of Paris, and threatened the capital with a siege; but thinking themselves unequal to the undertaking, they directed their route towards Normandy, in order, if possible, to persuade the English to join them, and act in conjunction against the catholics. The royal army commanded by the constable Montmorency, followed them, and at last forced them to a battle. The action was remarkable severe, and distinguished by this singular event, that Condé and Montmorency, the leaders of both armies, were taken prisoners. The catholics gained the advantage; but the admiral, who always became more terrible by a defeat, collected the remains of the army, kept them together, and made himself master of several of the most considerable places in Normandy. Elizabeth was so greatly pleased with his valour, that she made him a present of an hundred thousand crowns, and offered to give her own bond for the payment of an hundred thousand more, if he could find merchants to advance the money.

A. D. 1563. Notwithstanding the great economy of Elizabeth, her disbursements in favour of the Hugonots exhausted her treasury, and she found it necessary to summon a parliament in order to obtain a supply. A little before the meeting of the parliament, the queen had been seized with the small pox, and her life had been in danger. The commons therefore presented an address to her majesty, requesting that she would either marry, or fix the succession in such a clear and explicit manner, as might prevent the calamities which it was natural to fear would result from the contests of several claims to the throne. But Elizabeth still found means to elude their application; she could not be prevailed upon to declare a successor. The parliament, however, made no difficulty of granting the necessary supplies. They were very willing to support the noble designs of Elizabeth for the improvement of trade and manufactures, for the augmentation of her navy, for the suppression of vice, and for the more effectual restraining the progress of popery. They granted two fifteenths and two subsidies. They also passed a bill for enlarging the oath of supremacy, and it was resolved that a second refusal to take it should be deemed high-treason. A law was made against the seductions of enthusiasts; and another against magicians and forcerers, who were then thought dangerous.

While the English parliament were thus employed in the business of the nation, the catholic army under the duke of Guise, were carrying on the siege of Orleans with great vigour. A very considerable progress had been made in this undertaking, when the duke was assinated by a young enthusiast called Poltrot de Merc. The duke, on finding his end approaching, expressed the deepest remorse for having involved his country in the horrors of a civil war; and conjured the queen-regent to conclude a peace as soon as possible with the Hugonots. His advice was followed; both parties were heartily tired of the war, and soon agreed to the articles of a pacification. A toleration, under some restrictions, was again granted to the protestants; a general amnesty was published; Condé was reinstated in his offices and governments; and money being advanced to pay the arrears of the German troops, they were sent out of the kingdom. Not the least regard was paid to Elizabeth in this treaty; and a garrison of six thousand men, ill supplied with provisions, could not long resist the whole army of France. The earl of Warwick, who commanded the English garrison in Havre, made a gallant defence, notwithstanding the many difficulties under which he laboured; but the plague breaking out among his troops, he was obliged to surrender surrender the place: Nor did the misfortune terminate there; the garrison imported with them the pestilence, which afterwards raged with uncommon violence: above twenty thousand persons died of it in London only. A peace was soon after concluded with France; two hundred thousand crowns were paid to Elizabeth for the redemption of hostages, and the mutual pretensions of both parties continued.

The death of the duke of Guise greatly tended to lessen the influence of Mary Queen of Scots in France. The Scottish guards were dismissed, and the payment of Mary's dowry was discontinued, notwithstanding the warm representations of her uncle, the cardinal of Lorraine, who was now more desirous than ever of marrying her to some powerful prince, who was able to support her against the contumelious behaviour of reformers in her own kingdom; and give disturbance to Elizabeth. He had already offered his niece to Don Carlos, Philip's son; to the king of Sweden, the king of Navarre, the archduke Charles, the duke of Ferrara, the cardinal of Bourbon, who had only taken deacon's orders, from which he might easily be absolved. Elizabeth, on her part, was equally vigilant to prevent the execution of their schemes, and was particularly anxious, lest Mary should form any powerful foreign alliance, which might tempt her to revive her pretensions to the English crown, and to invade the kingdom on the side where it was weakest, and most exposed to the attacks of an enemy. She always told the queen of Scots, that nothing could satisfy her but her espousing some English nobleman; and even went so far as to propose her own favourite, the earl of Leicester, whom she certainly never meant to part with; for when she found that Mary was inclined to listen to the proposal, she found means to elude the promise she had made of declaring that princess her successor. So fatally may low and little passions mingle with the greatest and most distinguished qualities.

England now enjoyed the most profound tranquillity: her trade with the Low Countries had been interrupted by the intrigues of cardinal Glanville, who foreseeing a war in the Netherlands, was desirous of removing the English, and persuaded the government to prohibit the importation of their cloth, a branch of trade which was carried on to a prodigious extent; but Philip perceiving that this prohibition was equally detrimental to his own subjects as to those of England, desired the old treaty concluded in the reign of Maximilian I. might be renewed: this was accordingly done, and the affair was terminated to the satisfaction of both nations.

The queen being no longer engaged in foreign affairs, made a progress to the university of Cambridge, where she was received with great pomp and magnificence. Every thing was conducted with a splendor that did honour to that celebrated seat of learning; and the queen declared her satisfaction in an elegant Latin oration, wherein she assured the university of her protection, and earnest desire of encouraging learning to the utmost of her power.

A. D. 1565. After two years of uncertainty, Mary determined to marry; and fixed upon lord Darnley, son to the earl of Lenox, as the object. This young nobleman was her cousin-german by the lady Margaret Douglas, niece to Henry VIII. and daughter to the earl of Angus by Margaret queen of Scotland. He had been born and educated in England, where his father had constantly resided, after being expelled his native country by the superior interest of the Hamiltons. Darnley was also, by his father, descended from the same family with Mary herself; and would, by marrying her, preserve the royal dignity in the house of Stuart. He was, after her, next heir to the crown of England; and those who affected to deny her title, on account of her being a foreigner, had endeavoured to maintain his claim, and to give it the preference. It was therefore considered as no inconsiderable advantage, that by espousing him, she could unite both their titles; and as he was an Englishman by birth, and could not, either by his power or alliances, give any cause of suspicion to Elizabeth, it was presumed that the proposal of this marriage could not be disagreeable to the queen of England. She, indeed, seemed to consent to this alliance; and even wrote to Mary, thanking her for her kind intentions towards the earl of Lenox, whom the queen of Scots now restored to his honours and estates.

Darnley having obtained leave from Elizabeth, repaired to Scotland; and, by his presence, completed the conquest, which the fame of his accomplishments had already begun. He was in the flower of his age, and his appearance remarkably graceful. Mary, forgetting all her ideas of grandeur, and all her schemes of policy, listened only to the dictates of her growing passion. Elizabeth was no sooner informed that the Queen of Scots was pleased with the figure and person of Darnley, and that the treaty was on the point of being concluded, than she exclaimed against the marriage; dispatched Throgmorton to Scotland, to dissuade Mary from espousing lord Darnley; ordered the earl of Lenox and his son to return immediately into England, under the severest pains and penalties the laws could inflict; and caused the counsellors of Lenox and her second son, who were then in England, to be committed to the Tower; where they suffered a very close confinement.

The conduct of Elizabeth, though generally judicious, was too often full of duplicity; but never did she behave with greater insincerity than in her transactions with the queen of Scotland. Though she now expressed so violent a resentment against the intended marriage of Mary with Darnley, she was not averse to it in her heart. She would rather, indeed, have wished that Mary had remained for ever in a single state; but as that could not be effected, she did not dislike a choice that delivered her at once from the fear of a foreign alliance, and the necessity of parting with her favourite Leicester. She had, however, some strong reasons of a political nature for affecting displeasure on the present occasion; it furnished her with a plausible pretence for refusing to declare Mary her successor to the English crown, a point which she had always laboured to evade; and it gave her an opportunity of exciting a spirit of rebellion among the Scottish nobility and clergy. This political duplicity is always shocking to a virtuous mind, though it often makes too large a part in the science of government.

When Mary was informed of the opposition of Elizabeth, she justly observed to Throgmorton, that as the queen of England had already signified her desire of her marrying an English nobleman, to avoid the umbrage of her espousing a foreign prince, she had, in effect, followed her own advice; but in order to give Elizabeth time to examine the affair with more deliberation, she would defer her marriage for three months. But this concession not satisfying Elizabeth, the ceremony was performed at Edinburgh; and Mary was so pleased with her new consort, that she gave him the title of king, and added his name to her own in all public acts. But she soon perceived that his advantages of person served only to conceal a mind that was trifling, vain, ungrateful, too much occupied with self-love, too much swollen with silly pride, too much the slave of libertine folly, to be sincerely attached to the most amiable of women. Reasonably disgusted with this unworthy husband, she withdrew from him, by degrees, her confidence, and treated him with neglect.

There was then in the court of Scotland one David Rezzio, a Piedmontese musician, who had raised himself to an honourable employment by his address rather than by his talents. Mary had appointed him her secretary for foreign affairs, loaded him with favours, and by reposing in him too much confidence, and giving him too much credit, empowered him to make a traffic of his patronage, and to exercise all the insolence of an upstart favourite. The king was persuaded that Rezzio was the principal cause of the queen's coolness. Jealousy ensued, and notwithstanding the disagreeable figure of the Piedmontese, he was thought to enjoy more of Mary's favour, than merely her confidence. The suspicion was ridiculous, but sufficient to make the most dreadful impressions on a heart already inflamed. The malecontents among the nobility added fuel to the flame of his jealousy; and persuaded him to expostulate with the queen on her too great intimacy with this Italian favourite. Secure in conscious innocence, the queen treated these insinuations with the contempt they merited; and in order to convince her unworthy consort, that in exalting him she meant not to divest herself of any part of her authority, she ordered his name to be omitted on the coin, and to be placed after her own in public acts: she even gave Rezzio more countenance after this insult than before.

A.D. 1566. Inflamed with rage, and incapable of curbing that violent passion by the reins of prudence, Darnley vowed the most severe revenge; and the dissatisfied nobility offered to assist him in his bloody design, and to be themselves the executors of his vengeance. The ninth of March was the day fixed for this sanguinary purpose, and the necessary precautions were taken to prevent the design from being rendered abortive. Mary, who was then in the sixth month of her pregnancy, was supping in private with her natural sister, the countess of Argyle, and David Rezzio. The king entered the apartment by a private passage, and placed himself at the back of Mary's chair: the lord Ruthven, George Douglas, and other conspirators, rushed in after him. Terrified with this appearance, the queen demanded the reason for so rude an intrusion. They told her, that not the least violence was intended against her person; they meant only to bring that villain (pointing to Rezzio) to the punishment he so justly deserved. Aware of his danger, Rezzio ran behind his mistress, and seizing her waist, called aloud to her for protection; while she interposed in his behalf with cries, menaces, and intreaties. But all her efforts were in vain: the impatient assassins rushed upon their prey; and, by overturning the table, greatly increased the horror and confusion of this dreadful scene. Douglas seizing Darnley's dagger, stuck it in the body of Rezzio, who screaming with fear and agony, was dragged into an anti-chamber, and his body pierced with no less than fifty-six wounds.

Mary behaved on this occasion with admirable prudence: After paying a decent tribute of grief to the memory of the man she had honoured with her confidence, she dried up her tears, and employed her mind wholly on meditating a severe revenge; while the assassins, conscious of their own guilt, and dreading the resentment of their sovereign, detained her a prisoner in the palace, dismissing all who might have attempted her escape. In this alarming situation, she determined to pardon those noblemen who had opposed her government, in order to secure herself against the malice of the assassins, whom she now considered as her most inveterate enemies. They readily accepted the offer, returned to court, and the assassins of Rezzio were obliged to fly into England, where they lived in great poverty and distress. Darnley declared himself, by proclamation, innocent of the murder of Rezzio, and that he sincerely repented of having given any countenance to the conspirators.

On the nineteenth of June, Mary was delivered of a son, whose fortune it was to unite the crowns of England and Scotland. Sir James Melvill was dispatched to the court of Elizabeth to inform her of this happy event, and was received with great politeness by the queen. She thanked him for the dispatch he had made in bringing her such agreeable intelligence, and expressed the most cordial friendship for the Scottish queen. She soon after sent the earl of Bedford, and George Carey, son to the lord Hunsdon, to assist at the baptism of the young prince, and charged them with several magnificent presents for the queen.

The birth of a son contributed greatly to encourage the zeal of Mary's partisans in England: and persons of all parties began to be impatient for some settlement of the succession; but Elizabeth, whenever pressed on that subject, eluded the question, by pretending she had some thoughts of marrying Charles, archduke of Austria. Several of Mary's friends, however, advised Melvill to make the proposal to the queen. He followed their instructions, but used the utmost circumspection in this delicate affair. He told her majesty "he was well assured she formerly delayed declaring his mistress presumptive heir of the crown of England, merely to wait till she should see some issue of her body; and as that objection was fortunately removed, he hoped her majesty would no longer defer gratifying the desire of her subjects, who wished to see one point settled, in doing justice to the title of his sovereign, who would never seek any place or right in England, but by her favour and assistance." The queen answered, "that the birth of a prince was a strong inducement to her using greater diligence in making a strict inquisition into that matter; that she was persuaded the right belonged to her sister of Scotland, in whose favour she heartily wished it might be decided;" but added, "that she should defer making any declaration till the young prince was baptized, when she would certainly satisfy the queen in that particular." Melvill justly considered this answer as a mere evasion.

The earl of Bothwell was now in the highest favour with Mary. He had been always sincerely attached to her family and person, and had performed signal services for both. His courage and conduct as a soldier were unquestionable, and he cherished the most cordial hatred for the English, against whom he had been a great and successful commander on the borders, where his estates were situated. He had, some years before, been banished through the influence of the earls of Arran and Murray, but had been re-called and pardoned by Mary. In his private life he was a complete profligate; by his intemperance he had dissipated a large estate; but he still retained his propensity to licentiousness, and nurtured every vice but hypocrisy. His appearance was manly, though he was now advancing to the decline of life; he was equally gallant in the court and in the field; and he possessed that openness of manner, which, with his experience in life, rendered him an agreeable companion to both sexes. A person of his character could not be respected by the gloomy reformers of Scotland; and perhaps that very circumstance rendered him more agreeable to Mary.

During these transactions in Scotland Elizabeth applied herself to cultivate the arts of peace. She was always desirous of promoting literature in her dominions, and made a progress to Oxford with that intention. She addressed the university in an elegant latin speech, in which she recommended the most assiduous attention to the instruction of youth committed to their care. And during her stay in that famous seat of the muses, she displayed such a lively concern for the prosperity of literature and the welfare of the university, that the members were in love with her government, and made her ever after, the arbiter of all their disputes.

Soon after her return from Oxford the parliament met at Westminster; and once more determined to address the queen, either to marry, or settle the succession. Accordingly Mr. Molyneux made a motion, that the affair of the subsidy, which had already been moved by secretary Cecil, might go hand in hand with that of the succession. The majority declared in support of the motion; but the members of the privy-council, who knew how disagreeable the subject would be to Elizabeth, opposed it with all their influence. They informed the house that they had authority to assure them, that the queen would marry as soon as she could find a prince deserving erving her affection; that the appointing a successor would expose her person to the most imminent danger; and that she was therefore determined to delay the decision of that important subject to a more favourable opportunity. But these reasons not being satisfactory to the members, they resumed the subject with some warmth; several of them spoke with great freedom. Elizabeth was alarmed, and sent a message by Sir Francis Knolles, expressly commanding them to proceed no farther in that affair; but to rest satisfied with her promise to marry. Paul Wentworth, a member who nobly supported the cause of liberty, made a motion, and put the question, whether such a prohibition was not an infringement of the liberties and privileges of that house? This brought on very warm debates; and Elizabeth repeated her commands against their proceeding any farther in that matter. But this order, instead of silencing the members, increased their ardour; the whole house was in a flame, and such strong symptoms of disgust appeared, that the queen was obliged to retract her former orders, and allow the house free liberty of debate.

Pleased with this gracious condescension, the speakers delivered their thoughts with more calmness and temper; they even voted the supply without any condition. But as it appeared to have been given with a view of obtaining her consent to fix the succession, she remitted one third of it, declaring, that the money of her people might be as well in their own pockets as in the public treasury. She was, however, far from being pleased with the spirited behaviour of the Commons; and when she put an end to the session, she severely reprimanded the members in her speech from the throne; advising them not to put her patience to so severe a trial for the future. At the same time, she declared, that she knew how to distinguish the principal offenders from the rest; and that the greater part of the members might rest assured, that they departed in her good graces.

While Elizabeth was employed in cultivating the arts of peace in England, the Netherlands were agitated with those alarming convulsions, which at last gave liberty to a very considerable part of that country. Soon after Philip had quitted these provinces, in order to reside in Spain, the discontent of the inhabitants arrived at such a height, that it was impossible for affairs to continue long in their present situation. This universal dissatisfaction flowed from several causes. The people were persuaded that the king intended to abolish the small remains of their liberty and privileges, and to erect on their ruins the throne of despotic power. The establishment of bishoprics alarmed many of the principal families, as the jurisdiction and revenues of the abbies, in which they were nearly concerned, were greatly lessened. The inquisition, which was going to be established in these provinces, caused an universal alarm, that bloody tribunal being little less abhorred by the catholics than by the protestants themselves. The states had been prohibited from assembling. The king's determined resolution to extirpate the reformed religion, which had now a multitude of professors. These measures, which were on the point of being established, set the provinces in a flame. They had, for several years, petitioned the governors to assemble the states, in order to avert the storm which threatened the destruction of their country. Their request was always rejected, and often with contumelious language. This strange behaviour raised the resentment of the people. The prince of Orange, with the counts of Egmont and Horne, withdrew from the council, and joined in a petition to the king. The cardinal de Glanville, who directed all the measures of the government, had rendered himself so odious, that the most violent attempts were to be feared, if he filled any longer the seat of power. Philip, whose pride would not suffer him to recall the cardinal, advised him to withdraw. The cardinal obeyed; and the nobles resumed their seats at the council-board.

This point being obtained; they exerted themselves to prevent the establishment of the inquisition, which they considered as one of the greatest misfortunes that could attend any people. They formed associations; and the protestants celebrated divine service openly, notwithstanding all the threats of the government. From this moment Philip considered the people of the Low Countries as rebels, while they looked upon him as an unjust and arbitrary sovereign. Such was the beginning of the troubles in the Netherlands, and in which the English were afterwards very intimately engaged.

A. D. 1567. Bothwell had now acquired such an ascendancy over Mary, that all her measures were directed by his advice. Reports were spread of more particular intimacies and familiarities between them; and these reports gained the more credit, as the hatred of Mary towards her husband seemed rather to increase than diminish. Even Darnley himself was reduced to such a state of desperation, that he had secretly provided a vessel, in order to pass over to the continent: while several of the nobility, perceiving there were no hopes of bringing about a reconciliation between them, proposed some expedients for obtaining a divorce; but so many difficulties arose, chiefly with regard to the young prince's legitimacy, that it was laid aside. The king, convinced that it was in vain ever to hope to recover the favour he had lost, retired to Glasgow, where he was seized with an illness of a very extraordinary nature. Mary's enemies, who took every opportunity of blackening her character, imputed this disease to a dose of poison administered to him with her own hand.

Whatever truth there might be in this report, Mary seemed greatly alarmed. She repaired to Glasgow, paid him a visit, and behaved with the utmost tenderness; forgetting, in the duty she owed him as a wife, the causes of resentment he had given her as his sovereign. This behaviour of the queen gave the greatest pleasure to all who wished she might retrieve her character, especially when it was known that she had brought the king with her to Edinburgh. The queen herself resided in the palace of Holyrood-house; but as the situation of that place was unhealthy, and the noise of a court not well adapted to persons in sickness, it was thought proper to fit up apartments for him in a house at some distance from the city, called the Kirk Field. Here the queen continued her visits, and behaved in the most endearing manner. She even lay several nights in a room below Darnley's chamber. But on the ninth of February, Mary told the king, that she intended to sleep that night in the palace, in order to be present at the marriage of one of her maids of honour. About two o'clock in the morning, the whole city was alarmed with a violent noise; and every face wore the aspect of astonishment, when it was known that it was occasioned by the blowing up of the house where the king resided. Darnley's body was found at some distance, without any marks either of fire, contusion, or violence.

These particulars occasioned a multitude of conjectures; but not the least doubt was made by any, that the king had been murdered; and Bothwell was generally considered as the author of that atrocious crime. Mary seemed to be inconsolable on this occasion: she appeared to have devoted herself wholly to grief. The earl of Lenox loudly demanded justice on the murderers of his son; and accused Bothwell, and several others, as the persons who had committed the regicide. Placards were secretly affixed on the walls in various parts of the city, accusing Bothwell as the principal author, and that Mary herself was privy to the bloody deed. Voices were also heard in the streets of Edinburgh during the stillness of the night, imputing to Mary and Bothwell the death of the late king. Whatever reasons there might be for desiring desiring that the sanguinary act might be confined to oblivion, the court was soon convinced, that it was absolutely necessary to make some enquiry; and that Bothwell and his associates, accused by the earl of Lenox, should undergo a legal trial: but, at the same time, care was taken that no evidences should appear against him. Fifteen days only were allowed the earl of Lenox for making good his charge against Bothwell, though he lived at a great distance from the court, and though he conjured the queen, for the sake of vindicating her own honour, to employ more leisure and deliberation in determining a question of such importance to the whole kingdom. Lenox finding all his attempts to put off the trial were in vain, sent one of his retinue to protest, in his name, against the acquittal of the criminal, finding it would be impossible, in so short a time, to collect the witnesses sufficient to prove the charge against so powerful a nobleman. No regard was, however, paid to this protest; the jury acquitted the prisoner.

But this was far from being thought sufficient to exculpate Bothwell; it tended rather to prove his guilt. "Why (it was asked) should a person innocent of the crime he is accused of, endeavour to precipitate the trial? The witnesses themselves, if any are produced, will tend to clear his character; and every enquiry will withdraw part of the veil of calumny and detraction." The murder of the king was, however, only a prelude to the crimes of Bothwell. He forcibly carried off the queen, as she was going to see her son, and conveyed her to the castle of Dunbar, with an intent to marry her. It was generally suspected that the whole transaction was managed in concert with the queen; and some of the nobility, in order to discover the truth, sent her a private message, assuring her, that if she lay under any constraint, they would exert all their power for her relief. She answered, that she had indeed been carried to Dunbar by violence, but had been treated with so much kindness since her arrival, that she willingly remained with Bothwell. The nobility were now sufficiently convinced that the whole had been previously planned between them, and gave themselves no farther concern about her captivity. A few days after, Bothwell received a pardon for this violence, and for all other crimes.

Nothing now remained but for her majesty to marry Bothwell; but this seemed to be attended with an insuperable difficulty. That nobleman had been married, about six months before, to a lady of great merit and noble family; and it was necessary to set this marriage aside. Villainy is always fertile in expedients. The cause was pleaded with success in two spiritual courts, the catholic and the protestant. The first decided in his favour from reasons of consanguinity, alledged by Bothwell; the latter from reasons of adultery, alledged by his wife. Craig, the minister of Edinburgh, received orders to publish the bans of the queen's marriage, which he nobly refused. He even exhorted all those who had access to her person, to give her their advice against so scandalous an alliance. But all his endeavours were in vain; the queen persisted in her intention to marry Bothwell, and the ceremony was performed by the bishop of Orkney. Very few lords attended, notwithstanding many of them had signed a petition for her marrying Bothwell. The French ambassador, though a dependant on the house of Guise, could not be prevailed upon to countenance the marriage by his presence. Mary, who had always paid the utmost deference to the advice of her French relations, declined it in an affair where she was blinded by her passions.

This event disgraced Mary in the eyes of all Europe: her subjects beheld her with horror. The suspicions she lay under with regard to her being an accomplice in the death of the king, grew stronger. Her connection with the man whom the public voice had pointed out as the murderer; her great anxiety to have him acquitted; a marriage so contrary to all decency, negotiated by means so odious; every thing seemed to confirm, that Mary, the slave of her passion for Bothwell, was the partner of his crime. Even though we should be unwilling to impute to her this barbarous action, it is impossible to clear her of the most shameful weakness. But such is the frailty of human nature, that the best characters, under certain fatal circumstances, transgress at once the bounds of wisdom and of duty.

The guilt of Bothwell was augmented by his insolence. He treated the queen herself with the greatest brutality; and endeavoured to make himself master of the young prince, who had been committed to the care of lord Erskine, lately created earl of Mar; but he nobly refused to part with his charge. This attempt alarmed the whole nation; and the principal nobility, by whom Bothwell was hated for his overbearing insolence, met at Stirling, and formed an association for protecting the prince, and bringing the murderers of the late king to condign punishment. They soon collected a considerable number of troops, and marched, with the utmost diligence and secrecy, to surprize the queen and Bothwell in Holyrood-house. Their attempt had certainly been successful, had not one of their number informed the queen of their design. She slighted not the notice she had received, but made her escape, with Bothwell, to the castle of Brothwick, which the associated lords resolved immediately to besiege. Bothwell fled to the Marches at the appearance of the enemy; and the queen escaped, in men's cloaths, to the castle of Dunbar, which was capable of holding out till her friends could come to her assistance. Had Mary continued in Dunbar, the army of the associated lords must have been dispersed for want of pay; but being joined by a considerable number of troops, she imprudently took the field against her rebellious subjects, and marched to Preston, where she was joined by Bothwell. She soon perceived that his presence was of no advantage to her cause; for on meeting the forces of the enemy at Carberry Hill, they refused to fight in defence of a man who was universally considered as the murderer of the late king. Mary was now obliged to have recourse to negotiation; and Bothwell, perceiving that the authority of the queen was no longer able to protect him, made his escape to Dunbar, and thence passed over into Denmark, where he was thrown into prison, lost his senses, and died in the greatest distress.

Mary finding all hopes of resistance were vanished, took the fatal resolution of submitting to her enemies, and was conducted to Edinburgh amidst the insults of the populace. A banner was carried before her, on which was painted the murder of her husband, and her son in tears, imploring the vengeance of heaven. She was not permitted to continue long at the palace: the conspirators sent her, under a strong guard, to the castle of Lochleven, belonging to William Douglas, uterine brother to the earl of Murray. This castle was situated on a small island in the middle of a lake, and accessible only by a boat. Here the captive queen was treated with the utmost cruelty, without a single friend to comfort her in this scene of distress. The sufferings of the unhappy princess affected Elizabeth, and she resolved to employ all her authority to alleviate her misfortunes, and reduce her rebellious subjects to reason. She dispatched Throgmorton to Scotland, with orders to enquire into the real situation of Mary, and to promise her all the assistance in her power. At the same time, he was commissioned to demand of the conspirators the liberty of their sovereign, and, in case of refusal, to threaten them with the repentment of his mistress.

The associated lords, who were determined to humble Mary, refused the English ambassador access to her person; and obliged the unfortunate queen to sign an instrument, whereby she resigned the crown to her infant son, who was proclaimed in Edinburgh under the name of James VI. and crowned at Stirling on on the twenty-ninth of July. They also forced her to sign a second instrument, by which the earl of Murray was appointed regent during the minority of the young king. Murray was Mary's natural brother, an active enterprising man, and one of the principal promoters of the reformation in Scotland.

But the signing of these instruments was not sufficient to procure Mary her liberty. The conspirators feared the consequence of the return of the affections of the people at the sight of majesty in distress. Murray therefore summoned a parliament, and that assembly, after voting she was undoubtedly an accomplice in her husband's murder, condemned her to perpetual imprisonment, ratified the instruments she had signed, acknowledged her son for their king, and Murray for regent. But though no difficulties occurred in the parliament, many of the nobility were disgusted at the proceedings of the conspirators. The flight of Bothwell had tended greatly to alter the sentiments of the virtuous part of the nation; the situation of Mary was commiserated; and a powerful party was formed for supporting the cause of that unfortunate princess.

A.D. 1568. But all their endeavours would perhaps have been rendered abortive, had not the charms of Mary effected her escape. George Douglas, brother to the laird of Lochleven, engaged to assist her in her flight. He found means to steal the keys of the castle from his brother's chamber, and while the family were engaged in their devotions, opened the gates, conveyed her into a small boat, and rowed her ashore. The news of her escape was soon known to her friends, who conveyed her to Hamilton, where she was joined by a great number of the nobility. A bond of association was immediately signed for her defence, and Mary, in a few days, found herself at the head of six thousand men.

She immediately dispatched Bathune, a person of abilities, and one that had been very instrumental in her release, with a letter to Elizabeth, informing her of the happy change in her circumstances, and requesting a body of troops to assist her in reducing her rebel subjects. Mary intended to retire to the strong castle of Dumbarton; in order to wait the arrival of the succours expected from England. She also took some steps towards opening a negotiation with Murray. But the regent refused to listen to any terms of accommodation that tended to divest him of the power he had acquired by usurpation; and both parties prepared to decide the contest by the sword. The regent could collect no more than four thousand men; but notwithstanding the inferior number of his army, he took the field against his sovereign. The two armies met on the thirteenth of May, at Langside, near Glasgow; and a battle was fought, in which Mary's forces were totally defeated. The unhappy princess fled with great precipitation, attended by a few friends, to the borders of England. A consultation was now held with regard to the measures she ought to pursue, as they would, in all probability, determine her future happiness or misery. It was hoped, that the late interposition of Elizabeth in favour of the Scottish queen, would induce her to assist her effectually in her distress; and it was therefore determined to pass over into England; and accordingly the queen, attended with a small retinue of seventeen persons, landed at Workington in Cumberland, and was conducted to the castle of Carlisle in a very honourable manner, by the deputy-governor.

Mary was no sooner landed in England, than she dispatched a letter to Elizabeth, informing her of the unfortunate issue of the battle of Langside, and soliciting that assistance she had promised her against her rebellious subjects. Elizabeth received the letter with astonishment; and had she been left to follow the dictates of her own mind at that instant, she would certainly have complied with the request of the Scottish queen. But Cecil cautioned her against the danger of suffering the feelings of humanity to prevail over the dictates of prudence. She, however, dispatched lord Scroop, warden of the Marches, and Sir Francis Knolles, vice-chamberlain, to pay her compliments to Mary, and to take care that she was treated with all the respect her high birth and royalty required.

The privy-council being assembled, great debates ensued on the manner of proceeding with regard to the Scottish princess. To detain her in England might, it was thought, be attended with many disagreeable circumstances; and to send her to France with still more. Humanity would not permit her being delivered into the hands of her rebellious subjects. At last it was agreed by the majority, that she should be detained a prisoner, till she had made satisfaction for having assumed the title and arms of England, and proved her innocence with regard to the murder of her husband. Mary had certainly entered England without leave from Elizabeth, or procuring any safe conduct; and from this circumstance, it was determined by the council, that she was actually a prisoner of war. It cannot be denied, that a sovereign has power to seize a foreign prince; who enters his dominions without a safe-conduct; but there are cases wherein that right deviates into injustice. In this instance, the circumstances were remarkably favourable. Mary had been forced out of her dominions by her rebellious subjects, and obliged to take refuge in the first place that offered. She had no time for choice: she must either submit to those who fought her life, or take shelter in the country of a friend and ally. She had also received assurances of assistance from Elizabeth; so that if the detaining of her a prisoner was not contrary to the law of nations, it was at least repugnant to the dictates of humanity.

Elizabeth balanced, for some time, between political prudence and generosity. The former at last prevailed; she followed the advice of her council, and informed the queen of Scots, that notwithstanding her friendship for her, she could not, with any degree of decency, either see or support her, till she should be cleared of the crimes of which she was accused. Mary answered, that she would willingly justify herself before a princess whom she considered as a sister. But Elizabeth reflected that for her to sit in person as a judge, and pronounce any sentence, would be subject to many difficulties. The royal dignity would be wounded when majesty itself submits to punishment. She therefore declined the office, but offered to send two noblemen, as her commissioners, to hear the mutual charges between her and her subjects. Mary accepted the offer, and Elizabeth wrote immediately to Murray, charging him, in a very peremptory manner, to desist from any farther hostilities against the friends of the queen of Scots, and to appear in person to vindicate his conduct with regard to his sovereign, before the commissioners, who were appointed to sit at York for that purpose.

A message which carried with it all the appearance of command, at once surprized and offended Murray; but having always been an abject slave to the English, and his domestic enemies being now both numerous and powerful, he determined to obey her commands; as the only person from whom he could hope for assistance. This resolution was, however, strongly opposed in the council, by the most judicious of his party. They represented that it would cast an indelible stain on himself and his country, should he accuse his lawful and native sovereign before a foreign court of judicature; before persons who were professed enemies of the Scottish nation. But their arguments were urged in vain. Murray was not to be diverted from his purpose; he passed into England, assisted by the earl of Morton, the bishop of Orkney, the lord Lindsey, and the abbot of Dunferlin. At first Mary's cause appeared triumphant. Murray, flattering himself that if Mary's honour was not impeached, she might be prevailed upon to accept of reasonable terms of accommodation; whereas if he accused her of being an accomplice in the murder of Darnley, and she should afterwards re-ascend the throne, inevitable death must be the consequence. This accusation being omitted, the answers of the queen to the arguments of her adversaries, were extremely plausible: "How could she suspect, said her advocate, that Bothwell was the murderer of her husband, after he had been legally tried and acquitted, and after the nobility themselves had solicited her to marry him. If he was guilty, she desired he might be punished: she appealed to the laws of her country, and they found him innocent. As to her resignation of the crown, it was evidently an act of constraint, and consequently null and void. By what right, or on what pretence, could the Scots revolt from their allegiance, throw their queen into prison, give her battle, and place her successor on the throne. These are confessedly acts of rebellion, and punished as such in every well-governed state."

Murray perceived the full force of these arguments, and was now convinced, that he must either give up the contest, or accuse his sovereign as the murderer of her husband. He chose the latter; and being assured that if Mary's crime was proved in a satisfactory manner, Elizabeth would immediately declare against her, and give him every reasonable protection he could desire, he produced proofs in support of the most horrid accusations. These were love-letters written by Mary to Bothwell, and a promise of marriage signed before the trial of that infamous seducer. From these papers it was sufficiently evident, that all the crimes committed by Bothwell, the murder of the king, and forcibly carrying off the queen, had been concerted with her majesty. Mary's commissioners were astonished when they perceived that Murray had produced testimonies which could not be answered, unless they could prove that the papers were forged. They therefore changed their system; they desired that Elizabeth would bring about an accommodation; and on being informed, that the accusations exhibited against Mary must be first obviated, they broke off the conferences. The friends of Mary have laboured to prove that these famous letters were forged, and many volumes have been written with that intention. The subject is, however, too diffuse, nor indeed is it necessary to discuss the arguments that have been offered both for and against the authenticity of these letters here. Let it suffice to say, that from a candid examination, the proofs brought to prove them forgeries are weak and inconclusive. They are also the more exceptional, as the queen, at a crisis so affecting to her honour, refused either to acknowledge or deny their authenticity.

Every expedient was tried by Elizabeth to prevail upon Mary to continue the conferences; but could not prevail. She remained inflexible; and even accused Murray and the other commissioners of being the murderers of her husband: but produced no proofs against them. Elizabeth offered to bury whatever was past in oblivion, and negotiate a reconciliation with her subjects, provided she would renounce the throne, or even associate her son with her in the government, and suffer the direction of affairs to continue in the hands of Murray during the minority of the young prince. But Mary rejected the proposal with disdain. "My last words, answered she, shall be the words of the queen of Scotland."

During the absence of Murray, the Hamiltons and the earl of Huntley, who were still in arms, had taken possession of Glasgow, with a body of seven thousand men, intending to march forward, and intercept the regent in his return from England. Murray had, therefore, recourse to artifice: he sent Sir Robert Melvill to Mary, with proposals of marriage between her and the duke of Norfolk, and a cessation of hostilities between the two parties in Scotland. She answered that her repugnance to a new marriage should give way to the public good, and that she should be ready to receive any proposal that should be recommended by her parliament, and to make a peace with the rebels; but at the same time declared she would give no definitive answer till she was set at liberty, and restored to the throne of her ancestors. She, however, agreed to send orders to the lords of her party to suspend hostilities against Murray till further orders. This was the sole point the regent had in view; he took advantage of the queen's order, and returned to Scotland in safety. Mary now pressed Elizabeth either to enable her to regain possession of her kingdom, or to suffer her to retire into France and seek other resources. The queen evaded her requests, and the unfortunate princess, whose wit, and insinuating graces, might have created her interest in too many hearts, was removed to Tutbury castle, and guarded with the greatest vigilance.

A. D. 1569. Norfolk, however, pursued his design of marrying Mary. He was greatly beloved by the people, and the first nobleman in England in point of birth and fortune. He was passionately fond of the Scottish queen, but fearful of concluding a treaty of that importance without the consent of his sovereign, he consulted the earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Suffex, Pembroke, and Southampton, who all agreed in advising him to proceed. The principal nobility and gentry engaged to support him; and the lord Lumley and Sir Nicholas Throgmorton joined his interest with great cordiality. It was now agreed to open the affair to the earl of Leicester, Elizabeth's declared favourite. He approved the design, and wrote to Mary, recommending the duke of Norfolk for a husband, and stipulating the following articles for the advantage of both kingdoms: "That Mary should attempt nothing in consequence of her pretensions to the English crown, prejudicial to Elizabeth or her posterity; that she should confirm the present established religion in Scotland, and grant a free pardon to such of her subjects as had appeared in arms against her." Mary very readily gave her consent to these proposals, which seemed to open a path to liberty, and the recovery of the crown of her ancestors. The kings of France and Spain were privately consulted, and highly approved of the intended marriage. This step of consulting foreign princes with regard to a treaty he carefully concealed from his own sovereign, was highly imprudent, nor could it be deemed entirely innocent.

Cecil, secretary of state to Elizabeth, a man of great vigilance and integrity, soon got intelligence of the design, and the queen one day told Norfolk to take care on what pillow he laid his head. She afterwards sent for the duke, upbraided him sharply for presuming to engage in a treaty without her knowledge, and commanded him, upon his allegiance, to proceed no farther. The duke promised to obey her commands; but retired from court without taking leave, and repaired to his seat in Norfolk. He was so greatly beloved in that county, that he could easily have assembled a considerable army in his defence; but his loyalty would not permit him to take up arms against his sovereign. He set out on his return to the court, but was arrested at St. Albans and sent to the Tower. All who had been privy to the design were also taken into custody; but as they unanimously agreed in declaring, that the marriage had been proposed by Murray, and that it was never intended to be concluded without Elizabeth's consent, they were set at liberty.

The imprisonment of so many of the nobility greatly alarmed the nation, and several suspicious assemblies were held in the north, where Mary was the idol of the people. Lord Suffex, president of York, was not ignorant of these meetings, nor of the inclination of the northern inhabitants. He sent for the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, who thought proper to pay no regard to the summons; but being alarmed at their danger they flew to arms without waiting for a supply of men and money, which they had been promised by the duke of Alva, governor of the Netherlands. The insurgents proceeded ceeded immediately to Durham, tore the bible and common prayer book in the public market-place, erected a crucifix in the cathedral, and caused masts to be openly celebrated in an assembly of above six thousand persons. The rebel army now became very numerous, and a party of five hundred horse were detached to release the queen of Scotland from her confinement in Tutbury castle; but that prince's having been removed to Coventry before their arrival, the expedition miscarried. The insurgents soon after made themselves masters of Bernard-castle, and fortified Hartlepool.

While part of their forces, amounting to about fifteen thousand foot and two thousand horse, were employed in these operations, the rest, formed into small detachments, over-ran all Yorkshire; the royal army, commanded by the earl of Suffex, being too weak to prevent their ravages. But the chiefs of the rebels finding it impossible to furnish money sufficient to pay their troops, the army dispersed. Northumberland fled into Scotland, where he was seized by the regent, and committed to the castle of Lochleven. The earl of Westmoreland was more fortunate; he found means to pass over into Flanders, where he lived on a small pension settled on him by the king of Spain.

A. D. 1570. It is said that Murray had entered into a private negotiation with Elizabeth for the delivery of the queen of Scots into his hands; and as Elizabeth now saw all the dangers which might result from her detention in England, it is not improbable but she might have been pleased to have been freed from a prisoner who gave her so much inquietude, could it have been effected on any honourable and safe terms. But if this negotiation ever existed, it was suddenly terminated by the death of the regent, who was assassinated on the twenty-third of January, by a gentleman of the name of Hamilton, in revenge for a private injury.

This event involved Scotland in its former anarchy. The death of the regent was no sooner known, than a considerable body of Scots entered England, and committed ravages which equalled in cruelty those of the most barbarous times. This expedition seems to have been undertaken merely to provoke the English to revenge these affronts on all the Scots in general; and by that means to revive the ancient enmity between the two people, and unite all the inhabitants of Scotland against their southern neighbours. But they were mistaken in their politics: Elizabeth was too cautious to be deceived by so ill-concerted a scheme: she declared, that she did not think the party that supported the government concerned in the late unprecedented insult upon her subjects, nor inclined to think the whole nation criminal. She even offered her assistance to restore the government to its former vigour, and to redress the disorders that had been committed by Mary's friends. She added, that should her friendly offers be rejected, she was sufficiently prepared to do herself justice, and take a severe revenge on those who had wantonly, and without the least provocation, insulted her crown and dignity.

This declaration, which was delivered by Randolph, the English ambassador, to an assembly of the states, disconcerted all the measures of Mary's friends: they were not prepared with an answer, and obtained a farther time for that purpose. During this interval, both parties exerted all their abilities to gain the ascendant. Elizabeth collected an army to give weight to her counsels; and her ambassador artfully cherished the divisions in Scotland, while he seemed to be labouring to promote an union between the two parties. Mary's friends had recourse to the most provoking sarcasms upon Elizabeth and her council, in order to urge them to a general rupture. At the same time, they expected considerable assistance from France and Spain, to enable them to oppose, with more probability of success, the attempts of the party supported by the English.

The earl of Suffex, who commanded Elizabeth's army, received orders to march into Scotland, revenge the injuries suffered by their countrymen, and influence the election of a regent. The queen's orders were scrupulously obeyed: Suffex severely retaliated on the aggressors the miseries they had inflicted on the English. He was, however, soon after recalled, by an agreement with the queen of Scots, who stipulated, that no foreign troops should be introduced into Scotland; and that the English rebels, who had taken refuge in that kingdom, should be delivered up by her partizans. The earl of Lenox was soon after chosen regent in an assembly of the states, and Randolph received orders to maintain a correspondence with him.

But notwithstanding these instances of partiality to Mary's enemies, Elizabeth still continued her ambiguous conduct, and maintained the appearance of friendship with that unfortunate prince's. At the request of the bishop of Ross, Mary's ambassador, joined with the pressing instances of some foreign powers, Elizabeth procured a suspension of arms between the Scottish factions, and by that means checked the progress of the regent's party, when they were on the point of gaining very considerable advantages over their opponents. By this variable conduct, Elizabeth artfully fed the flames of civil discord in Scotland, and rendered the whole country a scene of horror and desolation. Throgmorton scrupled not to load Cecil with the blame of so perfidious a conduct; which, however reconcileable it may be to the rules of policy, is totally repugnant to all the rules of honour and humanity.

A. D. 1571. The catholic powers now exerted all their influence to procure the enlargement of the queen of Scots; but finding all their endeavours were in vain, pope Pius V. had recourse to the thunders of the Vatican. He published the bull of excommunication against Elizabeth, deprived her of all title to the crown, and absolved her subjects from their oaths of allegiance. A person was found hardy enough to affix this bull to the gate of the bishop of London's palace, and to expose himself to death as the reward of his zeal. This violent measure of the Roman pontiff being attributed to the intrigues of the queen of Scotland, served only to inflame the fatal hatred of Elizabeth. The English had long since learned to despise the censures of St. Peter's successor.

The tenets of the puritans, who were now very numerous in England, called for the vigilance of the queen, equally with the papists. They were the declared enemies to episcopacy, religious ceremonies, and every part of the ancient worship. They condemned the church of England, which, according to their language, was infected with the wickedness of the Romish antichrist. An image, the bending of the knee, the sign of the cross in baptism, a surplice, a square cap, struck them with horror. The spirit of liberty, when blended with the spirit of fanaticism, becomes extremely formidable in every established government; and this spirit of independence with which they were animated, rendered them dangerous to the arbitrary measures pursued by Elizabeth; and was the radical cause of those bloody revolutions which afterwards happened in the English government.

A new parliament, after five years interval, met at Westminster on the second of April; and it soon appeared that the seeds of independence began to vegetate in the breasts of several of the members. Strickland proposed a reformation of the liturgy, and particularly an abolition of the sign of the cross in baptism. The motion was supported, and several arguments were used to shew the propriety of the parliament's interfering in religious subjects. It was answered, that this was an infringement of the right of supremacy; that the queen alone, as head of the church, had the power of regulating the ceremonies of worship, and that it was dangerous for the commons to interfere in an affair of that kind. It was added, that the members would do well to take warning from former examples, not to meddle with such matters. But the puritans were not so easily intimidated from their purpose: they exclaimed against the opposition of the courtiers to objects of the utmost importance. "The salvation of the soul (said they) is in question; a consideration to which all the kingdoms of the earth are nothing in comparison." This fallacy of zeal, though highly approved in the house, did not weaken the general respect for the prerogative. It was determined to petition the queen for leave to proceed farther on this subject; and all debates were, for the present, laid aside.

But Elizabeth was too much offended at the presumption of Strickland, to pass it over in silence. She sent for him to the council, and commanded him not to appear any more in the house of commons. This peremptory order was too violent, even for the submissive parliaments of that age to endure; it excited loud complaints in the house, and privileges before unclaimed were asserted to belong to the commons. It was justly observed, that Strickland was not a private man, but the representative of a multitude; and that though the queen ought to support her prerogative, it was limited by the laws: for as the sovereign could not of himself make laws, so neither could he break them merely from his own authority. We shall see these noble seeds of liberty taking deeper root in succeeding reigns, and acquiring daily a greater force. They were now unable to contend with the authority of Elizabeth. But even that arbitrary princess, finding her exertion of power was likely to excite a great commotion, she saved her honour by giving Strickland permission to attend his duty in parliament.

These proceedings, however harsh and alarming, did not terrify the puritans. Robert Bell made a motion against an exclusive patent granted to a company of merchants at Bristol. He displayed the dangerous consequences of this measure, and the great impediment it gave to the commerce of the kingdom. But the general opinion invested such extensive power in the crown, that these efforts of natural liberty were not crowned with success. The majority of the members were so intimidated, that though they approved of these motions, they did not chuse to support them. To interfere in matters of government was considered as the most insufferable temerity. So very different were the ideas of the constitution at that time from those which soon after changed the form of administration.

During these transactions in England, the neighbouring states were ravaged and laid waste by religious wars. The prince of Condé was slain at the battle of Jarnac; and his son, with the young prince of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. placed at the head of the Hugonots. The admiral Coligny, always unfortunate, but always formidable in his misfortunes, constantly supported the protestant party against the royal forces, headed by the ambitious Henry de Guise. Elizabeth saw the necessity of supporting the Hugonots, whose interests were connected with her own, notwithstanding her hatred of all rebellion, and every species of opposition to the will of the sovereign. Soon after, the whole army of the insurgents was defeated at Montcontour, in Poitou, and the admiral himself dangerously wounded. The loss of this battle seemed to have put a final period to the attempts of the Hugonots; and the court of France, persuaded that the force of the rebels was totally annihilated, neglected to make any farther preparations against an enemy whom they thought could never more be dangerous. But they were mistaken. Coligny appeared in another quarter of the kingdom, at the head of so powerful an army, that even the capital itself was in danger. It was now thought proper to have recourse to negotiation; and a treaty was soon concluded, in which liberty of conscience, and a pardon for their revolt, were once more granted them.

Despairing of ever being able to reduce the Hugonots by force, it was determined to have recourse to policy, and to finish by the dagger of assassination what the sword of war had attempted in vain. The perfidious Charles cared for the people he intended to destroy. The terms of peace were strictly observed; the toleration was regularly maintained; all attempts of the more zealous catholics to infringe it were punished with severity; offices and honours were bestowed upon the principal nobility among the protestants; and the court openly declared, that they were determined to allow every person the free exercise of his religion, from a persuasion that there was no other method of restoring the peace of an exhausted country, it being impossible to force the consciences of mankind. An embassy was sent to Elizabeth with proposals of marriage with the duke of Anjou; a prince whose youth, beauty, and reputation for valour, it was supposed would recommend him to a woman of Elizabeth's disposition. The artful policy of that princess appeared in a stronger light at this juncture than ever. She apparently consented to a project inconsistent with her views, and which she never meant to accomplish. She had, indeed, very powerful reasons for this artful dissimulation. Her disputes with Spain, with regard to the Low Countries, were alone sufficient to make her have recourse to every incident to amuse the court of France. But this was not the only motive. The partisans of Mary, who had given her so much uneasiness, would be discouraged by the prospect of an alliance between France and England. Elizabeth knew this, and determined to make use of the expedient.

The Low Countries felt more severely than France the dreadful scourge of superstitious tyranny. Philip was determined to rule those commercial provinces with a despotic power, and employed a man well qualified to execute his tyrannical design. Ferdinand of Toledo, duke of Alva, was the man selected by Philip for this purpose. He had been educated in a camp; and having obtained a consummate knowledge of the military art, his habits led him to transfer into all governments the severe discipline of an army. This general, about three years since, had conducted into the Low Countries, from Italy, a powerful body of veteran Spanish forces. The Flemings, who were no strangers to his ferocious character, and the inveterate hatred he entertained against them, were struck with consternation. Nor were they terrified in vain. The military executions of that unfeeling nobleman are shocking to humanity, and will hand down his name with infamy to the latest posterity. All the privileges of that people were abolished by edict; arbitrary and sanguinary tribunals erected; the counts of Egmont and Horne, notwithstanding all their merits and past services, were brought to the scaffold; multitudes of all ranks were thrown into prison, and thence delivered over to the hand of the executioner. He met with no resistance; the people submitted to his power; but this was not sufficient to satisfy his slavish purposes: he proceeded in his career of cruelty; and nothing was heard of but confiscation, imprisonment, exile, torture and death.

Driven to despair, great numbers of the Flemings took refuge in England, where they were protected by Elizabeth, and where they established their useful manufactures, for which they had long been famous. It was impossible for the violent government of Alva to be of any long continuance, without exciting some dreadful commotion. Elizabeth declared, she could not behold the destruction of a whole people without affording them assistance. She accordingly seized a large sum of money which some Genoese merchants were sending to Alva, for the payment of his forces. This reduced him to have recourse to the most oppressive measures, which still farther animated the Flemings against the Spanish government.

Exasperated beyond the bounds of reason, Alva determined to raise disturbances in England. He accordingly opened a secret correspondence with Mary, queen of Scots, by means of one Rodolphi; a Florentine merchant, who had resided many years in London, and managed all the intrigues between the catholics and the court of Rome. It was agreed that a powerful army of Spanish troops should be landed in England, and at the same time, an insurrection should be excited in the heart of the kingdom. But Alva being persuaded that the attempt could not possibly succeed unless some English nobleman of authority could be found to head the insurgents, and inspire them with courage; and no person appeared so proper for this purpose as the duke of Norfolk. Mary, who was now sufficiently convinced of Elizabeth's duplicity, and despaired of ever recovering her crown, or even her liberty, by pacific measures, readily embraced the offer: while Norfolk, unable to recover the favour of Elizabeth, agreed to violate the promise he had made of breaking off all correspondence with Mary. He engaged in this new conspiracy; the promise of marriage was renewed between them; but he still flattered himself that there was nothing criminal in his actions, as his sole view was that of obtaining the queen's consent to marry the captive princess. In consequence of the duke's consent, three letters were wrote in his name by Rodolphi, one to Alva, another to the pope, and a third to the king of Spain; but Norfolk, though very desirous of delivering Mary from confinement, refused to sign them. He could only be prevailed upon to send Baker, one of his confidants, to the Spanish ambassador, to vouch for their being authentic. The scheme was embraced with great alacrity by Alva and the pope, and every thing seemed to wear a very promising appearance.

These proceedings could not long remain concealed in so prying a court as that of Elizabeth. Rodolphi, indeed, was beyond the reach of the English council, but one Bayley, a servant to the queen of Scots, whom Rodolphi had dispatched with letters to Mary, the bishop of Ross, the duke of Norfolk, and the lord Lumley, was seized at Dover immediately upon his landing, and the letters sent to lord Cobham, governor of the cinque ports; who being a friend to the duke of Norfolk, suffered the bishop of Ross to change the letters for others of less importance. Walsingham, Elizabeth's minister at Paris, had obtained some intelligence of this affair, and was perpetually alarming his mistress with accounts of plots forming against her by Mary's party. The letters delivered by lord Cobham, contained no traces of any secret designs against the government, and suspicions were entertained by the ministry, that these were other letters which had not reached their hands. Bayley was therefore sent for to the council, and soon brought to confess all he had learned from Rodolphi, and that the original packet he had brought over was in the possession of the bishop of Ross.

Fearful of the consequence, and suspecting that his public character would not protect him, that prelate had wisely secreted all his papers of any consequence; and on the thirteenth of May, after undergoing a strict examination before a committee of the council, he was given in custody to the bishop of Ely. Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and one Rolston were committed to the Tower on suspicion. Hitherto nothing had appeared that could greatly effect the duke of Norfolk; but a subsequent transaction completed his ruin.

Mary was very desirous of sending a sum of money to lord Herries, and her partizans in Scotland; and Norfolk undertook to convey it to Bannister, a servant of his in the north, who was to find some expedient to have it delivered to lord Herries. The servant, to whom the money was intrusted, not being in the secret, and judging from the weight and size of the box that it was full of gold, carried it, together with a letter he was charged with to Bannister, to Cecil, now lord Burleigh. Upon the discovery Bannister and Hickford, the duke's secretary, were apprehended, and brought before the council. On being threatened with the torture they immediately confessed the whole, and as Hickford, though ordered to burn all Mary's letters, had concealed them under the mats of the duke's chamber, the ministry became possessed of sufficient evidence against his master.

A. D. 1571. Ignorant of the discoveries made by Hickford, the duke, when cited before the council, denied every article of the charge brought against him, and though exhorted to merit the mercy of his sovereign by a full confession, he persevered in his first declaration. He was therefore sent to the Tower, and after being convicted of high-treason, finished his life upon the scaffold. He died with great calmness and constancy, and was sincerely regretted by the people, by whom he was greatly beloved. He had acquired their affections by his beneficence, generosity, and affability. His ancestors had long been considered as the leaders of the catholics; and this hereditary attachment, joined to the alliances of blood, had procured him the friendship of the most considerable men of that party; but as he had been educated among the reformers, was sincerely devoted to their principles, and maintained that strict decorum and regularity of life by which the protestants were at that time distinguished; he thereby enjoyed the real felicity of being popular even in the most opposite factions. The height of his prosperity alone was the cause of his misfortunes, and engaged him in attempts from which his virtue and prudence would naturally have for ever kept him at a distance.

Very little alterations had happened in Scotland during these transactions: that unhappy kingdom still remained in a state of anarchy. Kirkaldy of Grange, who commanded in the castle of Edinburgh, having declared for Mary, the lords of her party, encouraged by his countenance, made themselves masters of the capital, and carried on a vigorous war against the regent, who was obliged to retire to Stirling. The insurgents followed, and made themselves masters of his person; but perceiving his friends at the head of a considerable body of troops, were advancing, they immediately put him to death. The earl of Mar was chosen regent in his room; but that nobleman found it impossible to govern so divided a country. At last the two courts of France and England, ordered their ministers to negotiate a cessation of arms, which they accordingly effected. But this tranquillity was of no long duration; Mar soon after died of grief for the distracted state of his country, and the earl of Morton elected to the regency. This nobleman had always been directed in his measures by Elizabeth, and it was now determined to support effectually the party at the head of which he was placed. Sir Henry Killigrew was accordingly sent ambassador into Scotland, where he found the partizans of Mary so discouraged by the discovery of Norfolk's conspiracy, that they were glad to submit to the royal authority, and accept an indemnity for all past offences.

France was now the theatre of cruelty, hardly equalled in the most barbarous ages. The deceitful peace granted to the Hugonots was pregnant with horrors that shock humanity. Charles, the more effectually to lull the protestants into a fatal security, offered his sister in marriage to the prince of Navarre, and great preparations were made for celebrating the nuptials with uncommon splendor. Deceived by these perfidious arts, the leaders of the Hugonots flocked to Paris to be spectators of a ceremony which they imagined would for ever put a period to the civil wars which had so long wasted their country. The queen of Navarre died suddenly soon after her arrival, not without the most violent suspicion of poison; and the admiral was dangerously wounded by a base assassin as he was returning to his lodgings. Charles, however, by redoubling his dissimulation, was still able to retain the Hugonots in their fatal security. He visited the admiral, expressed the greatest concern for his misfortune, and promised to take the severest vengeance on the assassin, and all his abettors. The eve of St. Bartholomew was appointed for putting in execution this horrid scheme. The duke of Guise, who was as the head of this infernal enterprize, communicated the king's intention to the intendant of Paris, who ordered the captains of the different wards, to arm the citizens privately, and when the alarm was given, to place lights in their windows, break into the houses of the Hugonots, and put them all to the sword without distinction. About midnight, when the whole city was wrapt in darkness, and the unsuspecting victims folded in the arms of sleep, the fatal alarm was given, and the catholics began the horrid butchery. The hatred they had long bore to the protestants stealed their breaths against the feelings of humanity, and all conditions, ages, and sexes, suspected of any propensity to that religion, were involved in an undistinguished ruin. The streets of Paris flowed with blood, and the catholics, after all their detested victims were destroyed, exercised on their dead bodies all the rage of the most licentious brutality. They seemed to regret that the work of death was over. Above five hundred gentlemen of rank and fortune perished in this massacre; and near ten thousand of inferior condition. Among the former were admiral Coligny, his son-in-law Teligni, Sobize, Rochefoucault, Pardillon, Piles, Lavardin; all persons distinguished by their births and talents, and whose only crime was their religion. Nor was the court of Paris yet satiated with blood. Orders were immediately dispatched to all the provinces for continuing the sanguinary sacrifice. The people emulated the fury of the capital, and the protestants in Meaux, Orleans, Trope, Bourges, Angers, Tholouse, Rouen, Lyons, and other cities, were butchered in the same inhuman manner. Even the young king of Navarre, and his cousin the prince of Condé, were devoted to destruction by the duke of Guise. Charles, however, would not suffer the sentence to be executed; though he obliged them to purchase their safety by a seeming change in their religion.

Charles himself when he came seriously to reflect on this inhuman massacre was shocked with the thought, and endeavoured to conceal from the eyes of the world his barbarous perfidy. He pretended that a conspiracy of the Hugonots against his person, was suddenly discovered, and that the severity they suffered flowed entirely from necessity. He wished to bury in oblivion a transaction that is shocking at once to religion and humanity. Fenelon, the French ambassador at London, abhorred the treachery, and did not hesitate to express his grief. He blushed, he said, to bear the name of a Frenchman. Being, however, ordered to justify the court of France, he demanded an audience of Elizabeth. He repaired to court, which seemed plunged in the abyss of sorrow. An awful silence reigned through all the chambers of the royal apartment. The nobility, clad in deep mourning, were ranged on each side, and allowed him to pass without interruption. Sorrow and indignation were painted in every countenance, and declared, in the strongest language, the sentiments of the English nation. The queen heard his apology with great coolness, and calmly answered, that supposing there had been a conspiracy formed by the protestants, it was not necessary to have recourse to such cruel methods; that the same force that had murdered so many defenceless men, might easily have secured their persons; and that by proceeding in a legal manner, distinctions might have been made between the guilty and the innocent; that Coligny, in particular, who was dangerously wounded, could not have fled from the justice of his prince; that cruel assassins were not the proper executors of justice; the sword should not be put into the hands of a ferocious multitude. She added, the future conduct of the king would more fully display his real intentions; and that, in the mean time, she should proceed no farther than to lament the rigour, with which he had treated his subjects. Elizabeth well knew the power of the Guises, and their attachment to the queen of Scotland. She was therefore unwilling to break with a court that was capable of giving her so much uneasiness.

But though Elizabeth so cautiously avoided coming to extremities with Charles; whose union with the courts of Spain and Rome for the extermination of the protestants, gave her so much anxiety, she afforded protection to all the unhappy fugitives, who, on receiving intelligence of the massacre of their brethren, fled into England; and when the French ambassador made a proposal from his master, to have them delivered up as rebellious fugitives, she plainly told him, that humanity would not suffer her to refuse an asylum to so many wretches, who were driven by the barbarity of their enemies to seek refuge in a foreign country.

Nor did she neglect the necessary measures for her own defence. She prepared for that attack which seemed inevitable from the combined power and violence of the catholics. She fortified Portsmouth; augmented her fleet; exercised her militia; cultivated popularity with her subjects; discharged the sums she had borrowed; and paid the debts which her father and brother had contracted. By these prudent measures she gained the love and esteem of her people, who were willing to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in her defence. The nobility and gentry offered to levy an army of twenty-two thousand foot, and four thousand horse, transport them into France, and maintain them six months at their own expence, in order to assist the Hugonots to retaliate on their perfidious enemies the miseries they had suffered. When a nation is thus united, little is to be feared from the attempts of a foreign enemy.

The same principles which engaged her to assist the Hugonots in France, pleaded strongly in favour of the distressed protestants in the Low-Countries; but the great power of Philip rendered her more cautious in her proceedings. That monarch sent an ambassador to London, with remonstrances against the conduct of Elizabeth. He complained that many of the Flemish exiles, who infested the seas, and robbed his master's subjects, were protected in England, contrary to the treaties subsisting between the two courts. Unwilling to engage in an open rupture with Spain, Elizabeth published a proclamation, commanding all the Flemings, suspected of rebellion, to depart the kingdom. But this was far from answering the views of the Spaniards. Driven to despair, these wretched exiles undertook the most dangerous expedients. William Vandermark, a person of distinction in the Netherlands; having collected a considerable number of his countrymen, left England in the beginning of April, and made himself master both of the Brill and Flushing. This success raised the spirits of the Flemings; they flocked to his standard, and before the end of the year, he was joined by the greater part of the provinces of Holland and Zealand.

William of Nassau, prince of Orange, put himself at the head of the confederates, who formed, in process of time, the most powerful republic in Europe. The duke of Alva, after being repulsed at the siege of Alcaer, resigned his government. Ten thousand protestants delivered up to the executioner in the space of five years, were to him a subject of triumph! So totally insensible was he to every principle of humanity, and to the gentle temper of the gospel of peace! His successors could not heal these wounds, which eternal hatred had taught to rankle.

A.D. 1573. The Hugonots in France were so far from being crushed from the late massacre, that they soon became more powerful and violent than ever. The prince of Condé, and soon after him the king of Navarre, retracted the abjuration that fear had extorted from them. Under these two chiefs the the Hugonots were in a condition of revenging the blood of their brethren; and every thing again relapsed into confusion. The catholics had, for some time, closely besieged Rochelle, the bulwark of the protestants in France. The Hugonots made the most desperate resistance; and the duke of Anjou, who commanded the catholic army, lost twenty-four thousand men, without making any considerable progress in the siege. Anjou now perceived he had undertaken a task he was unable to perform; and sincerely wished that some incident might happen to preserve his honour. His desires were fulfilled. Advice arrived of his being elected king of Poland; and he immediately concluded a treaty with the inhabitants of Rochelle, in which their allies of Nîmes and Montauban were comprehended.

A.D. 1574. Exasperated at this miscarriage, Charles called aloud for new severities; but before he could carry them into execution, he paid the debt of nature on the thirtieth of May, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, after having rendered his name odious to all the world, and thrown an eternal stain of infamy upon his country. He died without issue, and was succeeded in the throne by his brother Henry, duke of Anjou, who had lately been elected king of Poland.

The affairs of Ireland, where the pope's deprivatory bull had very fatal effects, gave Elizabeth great uneasiness. She saw no end to the expence of supporting an army among a ferocious and bigotted people. The earl of Essex, an active young nobleman, offered a proposal to the queen, for putting an end to the troubles in that island. Elizabeth accepted the offer; and it was agreed, that the earl should transport to Ireland two hundred horse, and four hundred foot, and maintain them there at his own expence; that these forces should act against the rebels for two years, the queen furnishing the same number during that period; and that the earl should receive the commission of captain-general for seven years. In consideration of this service, the queen agreed to invest him with half the lordships of Clan-deboy, Ferney, and other lands of a great extent, which he agreed to people with as many soldiers as the queen should think proper to maintain on the other half of these lordships. The expence of maintaining the fortifications was to be equally divided between the queen and the earl. Essex was so fond of this command, which placed him on the footing of a prince, that he borrowed ten thousand pounds of Elizabeth, upon a mortgage of his lands in Essex; and landed in Ireland about the latter end of August, accompanied by the lords Dacres and Rich, three sons of the lord Norris, and many other gentlemen of distinction, who served under him as volunteers. He met with almost every difficulty that could be expected from an attempt of this kind. The lord deputy Fitz-Williams, thinking the command of Essex an encroachment on his own authority, secretly favoured the rebels, and greatly increased the obstructions that naturally opposed the execution of this design. The earl soon perceived that the reduction of the rebels, while clandestinely assisted by the English, was a task beyond his power. He, however, exerted all his abilities, but in vain: he was obliged to return to England, after having spent the greater part of his fortune.

A.D. 1575. Henry III. who ascended the throne of France on the death of his brother, carried on the war with vigour against the Hugonots, who were now more formidable than ever; but soon found himself obliged to grant them a truce for six months, under the mediation of Elizabeth. This was the fifth pacification made with the Hugonots; but the terms were so disgraceful to the crown of France, that the duke of Guise made no scruple to condemn openly the measures and maxims of his sovereign. That old and daring leader embraced this opportunity of forming his party into a regular and consistent body, and laid the foundation of that famous league, which, without paying any regard to the royal authority, aimed at the total extirpation of the Hugonots. Henry saw the consequence, and laboured assiduously to adopt a new plan, by acting as arbitrator between the two parties, and, by balancing their power, to reduce both to a dependence upon himself. But all his attempts were rendered abortive. France was reduced to so wretched a condition by the former severities of her princes, that toleration could be no longer practised; and an edict for liberty of conscience, which would, probably, have satisfied the protestants, inflamed the resentment of the Catholics, and threatened the kingdom with anarchy.

A.D. 1576. The prince of Orange still supported the confederacy of Holland and Zealand against all the attempts of Lewis Zuniga, who succeeded the duke of Alva in the government of the Netherlands. But finding it would be impossible to continue the opposition much longer without some foreign assistance, he sent a deputation to Elizabeth, imploring her protection; and offering to acknowledge her for their sovereign, if she would engage in their defence. The queen rejected a sovereignty which she could not support without carrying on the most dangerous wars; but promised to use all her influence in negotiations with Philip in their favour. An ambassador was accordingly dispatched to the court of Spain; but Philip found means to evade a categorical answer, and the war continued to rage with as much violence as ever. An accident delivered the Hollanders, when they were driven to the very brink of destruction. Zuniga died suddenly; and the Spanish troops, discontented for want of pay, and licentious for want of a proper commander, broke out into the most dreadful mutiny. They sacked and plundered the cities of Antwerp and Maestricht, and massacred near seventeen thousand persons of all ages and sexes; nor was there any possibility of preventing their dreadful outrages. They menaced all the cities of the Low Countries with the same fate. Alarmed at the destruction that awaited them, all the provinces, that of Luxembourg excepted, engaged in an association for their mutual defence; and dispatched a deputation to the prince of Orange, imploring his protection, and requesting that he would put himself at their head. Conferences were immediately opened at Ghent; and an union was formed between the provinces, called the Pacification of Ghent. By this treaty, which was signed on the eighth of November, the contracting parties declared, that they had entered into this union for the defence of the laws and liberties of their country, against the encroachments, oppressions and cruelties, long exercised on them by the Spaniards. At the same time, they declared, that, notwithstanding this treaty, they were still willing to acknowledge the king of Spain's authority, provided he would govern them according to the ancient laws. This union being formed, the fortresses raised by the duke of Alva, to keep the Netherlands in subjection, were every where demolished; and the nobility and clergy soon after assembled at Brussels, and took a solemn oath to observe inviolably the articles of the association. Philip was now reduced to the mortifying alternative of either governing according to the laws established by his predecessors, or content himself with the bare title of sovereign, while the regal authority was exercised by others.

The troubles of Ireland still continuing, the earl of Essex was sent back to that kingdom, with the title of earl-marshal, in the room of Sir Nicholas Bagnal. But he soon perceived, that notwithstanding his new dignity, he was little more than a private officer. He, however, exerted all his abilities to reduce that turbulent people to order, but without effect; and he died a few months after his arrival, not without suspicion of having been poisoned by some of the creatures of the earl of Leicester, who was his declared enemy. What tended to give weight to this conjecture, was the imprudent behaviour of Leicester Leicester himself, who immediately divorced his own wife, and married the widow of the earl of Essex.

A.D. 1577. Don John of Austria, famous for the glorious victory he had obtained over the Turks at Lepanto, was made governor of the Netherlands. He was naturally of an aspiring genius, and, encouraged by the success that had hitherto attended him in all his undertakings, projected a scheme for rendering himself one of the most powerful princes in Europe. After reducing the revolted provinces of the Netherlands to obedience, he proposed, by the assistance of the pope and the king of Spain, to land a powerful army in England, release the queen of Scots, and carry into execution the bull fulminated at Rome for dethroning Elizabeth. The prince of Orange, informed of his design with regard to the Scottish prince, imparted the secret to Elizabeth; who, fearing the consequences of his ambition, no longer scrupled to assist the oppressed confederates, whose liberties seemed now to be intimately connected with her own safety.

But Don John was not formed for healing the disputes in the Netherlands. He scorned to have recourse to lenient measures; and not thinking himself safe in Brussels, seized the castle of Namur. This violent proceeding convinced the states, that they had nothing to expect from their new governor, and prepared to defend their liberties, which it was sufficiently evident Don John intended to wrest from them. They accordingly dispatched the marquis of Hautree, and Adolphus Meetkirck, to Elizabeth, to vindicate their proceedings, and solicit the loan of an hundred thousand pounds for eight months. Elizabeth very readily granted their request, but insisted that certain towns of the Netherlands should be bound for the payment. At the same time, she entered into a treaty with them, whereby it was stipulated, That the queen should furnish them with five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to be paid by the Flemings, but commanded by an English general; that this commander should have a seat in the council of the states; that nothing should be determined concerning war or peace, without previously imparting it either to the queen or to him; that they should enter into no league without her consent; that if any difference happened among themselves, it should be submitted to her arbitration; and that if any prince, on any pretence whatever, should attempt hostilities against her, they should send to her assistance an army equal to that she had employed in their defence.

Elizabeth did not, however, intend to declare openly against Spain. She sent an ambassador to that court, where he presented a memorial on the twentieth of December, importing, that the queen by no means intended to break the ancient alliance concluded with the house of Burgundy; that with this view she had refused the sovereignty of Holland and Zealand, when offered her; had advised the prince of Orange to return to his allegiance, and even threatened him with her displeasure in case of refusal. She added, that she would still continue in the same friendly intentions, and exert all her interest to compromise the present differences, provided Don John, whom she could not but regard as her mortal enemy, was recalled, some other prince, more popular, substituted in his place, the Spanish forces withdrawn, and the Flemings restored to their ancient liberties. If these conditions were accepted, the queen promised, if the Flemings still continued obstinate, to join her arms to those of the king of Spain, and force them to a compliance. Philip, who was far from being pleased with the interposition of the queen, gave an evasive answer, but still continued to furnish Don John with troops and money.

During these transactions on the continent, England enjoyed a profound tranquillity, owing chiefly to the prudence and vigour of the queen's administration, and to the wise precautions she employed in all her measures. Firm, but discreet in her deportment, she supported the church of England without alienating, by persecution, those who refused to embrace its tenets. She established no inquisition into men's bosoms; she imposed no oaths of supremacy, except on those who enjoyed places of trust, or received emoluments from the public. Though the exercise of all religious worship, except that of the church of England, was prohibited, she connived at the meetings of the catholics, shewed less indulgence to the puritans, and never exercised the severity of the laws, but to maintain the public order and tranquillity. Had the courts of France and Spain imitated the prudent conduct of the English prince, they might have derived from it the utmost advantages, both to church and state.

A.D. 1578. Don John had, by this time, conceived so thorough a contempt for the states, and hatred to the English, that he listened to no proposition, but that of a vigorous prosecution of the war. He had even proceeded so far, as to execute Ratcliffe, a person of quality, who had been driven out of England on account of his religion; but was unfortunate enough to be taken for a spy sent by Walsingham to murder Don John. Deaf to all proposals for a cessation of arms, the war was carried on with vigour by the Austrian prince, who was bravely seconded by Alexander, prince of Parma, one of the best soldiers of that, or any other age. John received from Italy and Spain vast supplies both of men and money; but notwithstanding his power daily increased, the prince of Orange found means to prevail on the city of Amsterdam to declare in his favour. Alarmed at this acquisition, the court of Spain offered to recall Don John, and to substitute in his room either the prince of Parma, the archduke Ferdinand, or even the archduke Matthias, provided the states would return to their duty. The offer was refused, and the operations of war were continued with the utmost fury. Don John knew that the army of the states lay in a strong camp at Rimenant, and that they expected a strong reinforcement of French troops, under the command of the duke of Anjou; and that prince Cassimire was advancing to join them, with a German army in the pay of the states. He therefore proposed, in a council of war, to attack the enemy before they were joined by their reinforcements. This motion was strongly opposed by the prince of Parma; but his reasons were not thought sufficient, and it was resolved to attack the confederate army. The battle was fought with amazing perseverance, and the English and Scotch auxiliaries distinguished themselves in a very particular manner: they opposed the whole Spanish forces; and had it not been for the amazing genius of the prince of Parma, Don John's army must have been inevitably ruined.

Philip was now convinced that he had every thing to fear from the power of Elizabeth. He saw that the invasion of England, projected by Don John, was at a vast distance; and therefore entered into a fresh negotiation with the pope, for raising troubles against Elizabeth in Ireland. One Steukley, a native of England, whom the pope had created marquis of Leinster, was engaged to command the expedition, and also to attempt to destroy the royal navy of England. Philip, desirous of concealing his being concerned in this attempt, it was agreed that it should be made in the name of his holiness; and that his natural son, James Boncampagni, should be declared king of Ireland. Steukley, on his arrival in the Tagus, was prevailed upon to accompany Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, in making a descent in Africa against the Moors. This put a final period to the expedition. Steukley and his whole detachment were cut to pieces, and Don Sebastian himself fell by the swords of the infidels. A few of the Spanish and Italian troops, who pursued their course when Steukley entered the Tagus, landed in Ireland, and animated the Irish, who were then zealous catholics, though a barbarous people, to continue in rebellion billion to the English. But the enterprize had no success. The foreign troops were cut in pieces, and about fifteen hundred of the Irish put to death by order of the government; a very cruel execution, and with which Elizabeth was greatly dissatisfied.

A. D. 1580. Hitherto Scotland had been retained in strict alliance with Elizabeth, by the influence of Morton the regent, who had also restored the domestic tranquillity of that unhappy kingdom. But among a people regardless of laws, and agitated with religious controversies, it could not be expected that the authority of a regent could be long supported. Factions were formed among the nobility, who were disgusted with Morton's avarice; while the clergy, whose narrow revenues were still farther invaded, joined the discontented party, and increased the confusion. Alarmed at his dangerous situation, and oppressed with the increasing weight of government, the regent dropt some peevish expressions, implying a desire of being relieved from the care of conducting the administration. This concession, whether real or pretended, was readily seized by the opposite party, and he was dismissed from the regency. Morton, who flattered himself that a general pardon which was now passed, would render abortive all the designs of his enemies, resigned his authority in the hands of the young king, who was then only eleven years of age. James determined to hold himself the reins of government, and conduct, in his own name, the administration of the affairs of the kingdom. The regent seemed at first determined never more to engage in the busy scenes of active life; but seek in domestic affairs that tranquillity which was not to be found in the hurry of a court, and amidst the contentions of turbulent parties. But either his ambition would not suffer him to continue in the shades of obscurity; or he did not find in retirement that tranquillity he expected, for he returned again to court, acquired the ascendant in the council, and directed as before all the affairs of the administration, but without resuming the title of regent. The opposite party saw their danger, and flew to arms, under pretence of rescuing their prince from captivity. Both parties endeavoured to gain the protection of Elizabeth; but that of Morton prevailed, and he was suffered to continue at the head of the administration. The opposite party, however, daily increased, and the power of the regent seemed to be placed on a sandy foundation.

The duke of Guise embraced the opportunity of supporting the party formed against Morton. He sent over the count d'Aubigny, a descendant of the house of Lenox, and cousin-german to the young king's father, to detach that prince from the English interest. D'Aubigny was possessed of all the talents necessary for effecting the projected design. He had been educated in France, was possessed of an insinuating address, and of a pleasing disposition. Guise was not mistaken. D'Aubigny soon gained the affections of the young monarch: and joining his interests with James Stuart, of the house of Ochiltree, a young man of great parts, but of the most profligate manners, who was already in great favour with the king, he insinuated into the tender mind of James, principles of politics and government, very different from those in which he had been educated. He painted, in the most glaring colours, the great injustice of deposing his mother, and detaining her a prisoner in England. James was greatly affected at the sufferings his royal parent had endured, and wished either to resign the administration into her hands, or associate her with him in the government. Alarmed at the great progress daily made by this party in Scotland, Elizabeth dispatched Sir Robert Bowes to Stirling, where James then resided, to warn the king of that danger that would inevitably ensue, if he continued to listen to the false suggestions of d'Aubigny now created earl of Lenox.

Desirous, if possible, of preventing Elizabeth from assisting the party of Morton, James sent excuses to the court of London; but Lenox, perceiving that the English princefs was determined to ruin him, resolved, if possible, to overturn the Scottish government, as the only expedient that remained to support his interest. Morton was considered as the head of the opposite party, and his ruin was therefore necessary. He was accordingly arrested at the council board, committed to prison, accused of being an accomplice in the late king's murder, and condemned to suffer as a traitor. He confessed upon his trial that he was not ignorant of Bothwell's design, but denied his having ever given his consent to that atrocious act. He added, that he should have revealed it either to Henry or Mary, had not the danger to which he must have been exposed, deterred him from pursuing his design; Henry possessing neither resolution nor constancy, and Mary appearing to him to be an accomplice in the crime. Great interest was made in behalf of Morton. The queen dispatched Sir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, and that ambassador exerted all his influence in favour of the late regent. He even engaged the earls of Argyle, Montrose, Angus, Marre, and Glencarne, to enter into a confederacy for protecting, even by force of arms, the life of the prisoner. At the same time, an English army moved towards the frontiers of Scotland, to give weight to the intercessions of the ambassador. The French party saw the danger of delaying the execution of the sentence, and Morton finished his life upon the scaffold. He died with the same constancy and resolution he had always displayed in every action of his life; and had his probity and virtue been equal to his abilities, he might have been considered as one of the most accomplished statesmen of the age.

This revolution in Scotland rendered Elizabeth extremely uneasy. She knew that her inveterate enemy, the duke of Guise, would take every opportunity of supporting the prevailing party; and that the popish faction in England would readily join in any attempt to disturb the government. She was also fearful lest Philip, who seemed desirous of supporting the cause of Mary, might embrace the opportunity of assisting the king's party in Scotland, in revenge for the reinforcements of troops, she had sent into the Low-Countries.

A. D. 1580. During these transactions, the papists were not idle in endeavouring to disturb the tranquillity of England. Seminaries had for some time been established at Douay, Rheims, and Rome, for the education of English youth intended for the priesthood; some species of literature being considered as absolutely necessary to support the doctrines of the Romish church, against the attacks of the protestants. These seminaries sent over every year a colony of priests, who having imbibed all the absurd tenets of the catholics, maintained them with all the force of bigotted enthusiasm. They had imbibed the strongest desire of obtaining the crown of martyrdom, and therefore were not to be deterred from propagating their principles by any dangers, fatigues or sufferings. They endeavoured to persuade the people, that Elizabeth, who had been solemnly and publicly anathematized by the holy father, should be treated as an usurper, a schismatic, a heretic; that no faith should be held with princes whom the church had excommunicated, and that it was lawful to effectuate the purpose by sedition, by rebellion, and even by assassination. Parsons and Campian, two jesuits famous for their abilities in casuistry and prevarication, were the great supporters of these detestable principles. The latter was soon after detected in treasonable practices, and publicly executed.

While England was alarmed by the practices of the catholics. Sir Francis Drake returned from his voyage round the world. This intrepid seaman was a native of Devonshire; and introduced at court by the vice-chamberlain Hatton, on proposing to pass into the South Seas through the streights of Magellan, lan, a voyage till that time unattempted by the English. Drake's fleet consisted only of the five following vessels, for none of them deserved the name of ships: the Pelican, of an hundred tons, commanded by himself; the Elizabeth of eighty tons, under captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of thirty tons, commanded by captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly-boat of thirty tons, under captain John Chester; and the Christopher, a pinnace of fifteen tons, under captain Thomas Moon. On board this small squadron were embarked one hundred and sixty-four men, and the gallant admiral sailed on a voyage, which, with such small ships, would, even in our times, be considered as a very rash undertaking. He soon found that his vessels were too small for the tempestuous seas near the streights of Magellan, and entered the pacific ocean with only his own ship. During his cruises in the South sea, he took a prodigious booty from the Spaniards, who expected no enemy in that distant part of the world. He sacked and plundered the town of Arica, and in one ship took four hundred pounds weight of Baldivian gold. Hardly any opposition was made by the Spaniards; Drake easily loaded the Pelican with gold, silver, and precious stones. But he soon after learned that the vice-roy of Peru had fitted out two large ships, and sent them to cruise near the streights of Magellan, in order to intercept him in his return. A new passage was therefore to be attempted, as he was in no condition to fight the two Spanish ships fitted out to intercept him. He first endeavoured to find a passage by the north of California; but failing in that enterprize, he sailed for the East Indies, and returned safely by the Cape of Good-Hope. The return of Drake animated the English, who were now desirous of sharing in the riches of South America; and his name became celebrated on account of his bold and fortunate attempt.

It was, however, apprehended that this attack upon the Spanish territories in South America, would occasion an open war with Spain, an event which it was thought should, if possible, be avoided at this juncture. It was therefore moved in the council, that the queen should disown the enterprize, punish Drake, and restore the treasure. But Elizabeth rejected the proposal; she loved valour, and determined to protect that intrepid seaman, against all the machinations of his enemies. She accepted a banquet from him on board the ship which had performed so memorable a voyage, and conferred on the commander the honour of knighthood. The Spanish ambassador did not fail to make complaints against what he called the piracies of Drake. But he was told by Elizabeth, that no treaty with his catholic majesty, excluded her subjects from trading in the South Seas; that she could not consider all South America as the property of the king of Spain, as he held it by no better title than a donation from the bishop of Rome, who having no right over those countries himself, could convey none to another, and whose authority both in temporal and civil matters she disowned. She added, that the insignificant ceremonies practised by the Spaniards in taking possession of such immense tracts of land in America, should never preclude her from sending colonies thither, nor would she even submit to suffer the ocean to be claimed as the property of any prince or person. She, however, ordered part of the treasure to be restored to Pedro Sebura, a Spaniard, who pretended to be an agent from the merchants whose effects Drake had seized; but understanding afterwards that Philip had sequestered the money, she refused to make any farther restitution.

A. D. 1581. The great expences that had attended the government, obliged Elizabeth to call a parliament, who granted the queen a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths, and enacted several laws for the security of the government, chiefly against the attempts of the catholics, who had occasioned many disturbances. It was enacted, that whoever reconciled any person to the church of Rome, or was himself reconciled, should be guilty of treason: to say mass was subject to penalty of a year's imprisonment, and a fine of two hundred marks: whoever absented himself during a whole month from the service of the church, was subject to a fine of twenty pounds. The uttering slanderous or seditious words against the queen, was punishable, for the first offence, with the pillory and loss of ears; the second offence was declared felony. The writing or printing such words, was felony, even for the first offence.

Paul Wentworth, brother to the member of that name, who had distinguished himself in the preceding parliament, and who was not to be intimidated by the frown of authority, made a motion for a solemn fast to be observed by the members of the house on the twenty-ninth of January. This motion seems to have been made merely to try the strength of the puritan party, who were disgusted with Elizabeth for the rigorous manner in which she asserted her supremacy, by discouraging all motions for the reformation of discipline and ceremonies in the church. This motion was warmly opposed by the court party, but was carried by a majority of fifteen. The queen was highly offended at this rash proceedings of the commons. She sent for the speaker and severely reprimanded him for suffering a motion of that kind to be debated in that house. This was followed by a message delivered by vice-chancellor Hatton, containing a sharp reproach for their proceedings in a matter which so nearly concerned the supremacy of her majesty, and which she had so often declared she would never suffer them to touch. This message being read, Hatton made a motion, that the house should make a submission to the queen, acknowledge their fault, and promise never more to be guilty of a similar offence. This motion was strenuously supported by the courtiers, and the majority submitted to kiss the rod of power. Some of the puritans, however, opposed it, but in vain: and when one of the members rose to speak for the privileges of the house, the speaker immediately stopped his harangue, declaring he would hear nothing "that might give offence to her majesty." So little power and authority did the commons of England at that time enjoy!

The attention of Elizabeth was now wholly directed towards the Spanish monarchy. Philip had acquired the crown of Portugal, and the prince of Parma made such rapid advances in subduing the Netherlands, that there was little hopes the confederates would be able to resist much longer the formidable armies of Spain, under the command of so consummate a general. The queen flattered herself, that the noble opposition made by the states of the Netherlands, would exhaust the treasure of Philip, and render his attempt at last abortive. But the great accession of riches and naval power, which the Spanish monarch had acquired with the crown of Portugal, convinced her that these flattering hopes were chimerical, and that it was absolutely necessary to seek the protection of some powerful alliance to balance the ambitious designs of the aspiring monarch. The animosity which still subsisted between the king of France and the duke of Guise, who had now entered into a close confederacy with Philip, seemed to point out an alliance between the sovereigns of France and England, while the general apprehensions entertained by all Europe of the fatal consequences that might attend the farther acquisition of Philip's power, seemed to require some great and powerful union to prevent its progress.

A treaty of marriage between the duke of Anjou and Elizabeth had been for some time negotiating, and a resolution was now taken to finish the treaty. The duke had long been convinced that political reasons alone would never be sufficient to answer the intended purpose; and he accordingly sent over Simier, an agent of his own, to act in conjunction with his brother's ambassador. He could not have sent a person more likely to answer his purpose. Simier was artful and intriguing, of insinuating address and agreeable conversation. Instead of entering into the serious reasons of political interest, he entertained the queen with the topics of passion and gallantry. Elizabeth listened to his discourse, and Simier soon insinuated himself so firmly into the queen's favour, that he obtained a more ready access to her person, than even the most favoured ministers of state. Leicester, who had laughed at every preceding treaty of marriage, was now sufficiently alarmed; he feared that the queen was at last caught in her own snare, and that the young Frenchman had really engaged her affections. He was acquainted with the arts of Simier, and exerted all his power to render him odious; he even took advantage of the credulity of the times, and spread reports, that Simier had gained an ascendant over the queen, not by any natural principles of her constitution, but by love potions and incantations. Simier was exasperated at these unmanly proceedings, and determined to ruin the credit of Leicester. He accordingly revealed to the queen a secret which none of her courtiers dared to discover; the marriage of Leicester with the widow of the late earl of Essex, which he had carefully concealed from Elizabeth. The discovery answered the purpose of Simier; the queen was so provoked at this action, that she threatened to send Leicester a prisoner to the Tower, and to prevent the effects of his resentment, took the Frenchman under her own protection.

Encouraged by the accounts he received from his agent, and desirous of finishing a treaty pregnant with so many advantages, the duke of Anjou determined to pass over into England and solicit his suit in person. He accordingly landed at Dover, and secretly visited the queen at Greenwich. Anjou had no reason to be displeased with his visit; he lost no ground in being personally known to Elizabeth. For soon after his departure she commanded Burleigh, now lord-treasurer, Suffex, Leicester, Bedford, Lincoln, Hatton, and secretary Walsingham, to concert with the French ambassadors the terms of the intended treaty. And as Henry, desirous of freeing France from the restless ambition, the enterprising though timid disposition of the duke of Anjou, had given his plenipotentiaries almost unlimited powers to agree to all the demands of the court of England, the conditions of the treaty were soon settled, and the instrument ready for the royal signet. It was agreed, that the marriage should be celebrated within six weeks after the ratification of the articles; that the duke and his retinue should enjoy the free exercise of their religion; that after the marriage was solemnized, the duke of Anjou should enjoy the title of king, but that the management of affairs should continue solely in Elizabeth; that their children, male or female, should succeed to the crown of England; that if there should be two males, the eldest, in case of Henry's death, without issue, should be king of France, and the younger of England; that if there should be one male only, and he should succeed to both the crowns of France and England, he should be obliged to reside eight months every two years in the latter kingdom; that the laws and customs of England should be observed inviolate; and that no foreigner should be promoted by the duke to any office in England.

Though these articles were as favourable as possible to the English, and though there was very little probability that Elizabeth, who was then in her forty-ninth year, should have any children by the duke of Anjou, this treaty spread an alarm through the whole kingdom. It was strenuously opposed by all her favourite ministers, and the queen herself, as a proof of her remaining uncertainty, added a clause by which it was declared, that she was not bound to complete the marriage till farther articles, not specified in the treaty, should be agreed upon between the parties, and till the king of France should be certified of their agreement. Walsingham was, therefore, dispatched to Paris, in order to form the closest connections with Henry, and enter into a league offensive and defensive against the increasing power, and dangerous usurpations of Spain.

But these indications of the queen's irresolution were not sufficient to banish the fears of the English: the dreadful consequences of marrying a catholic were still recent in the minds of the protestants; the idea of the flames of persecution that raged in Mary's reign, excited a detestation in the people against the cruelties of the Roman pontiff and all his adherents. In the mean time Walsingham pursued his instructions with the utmost assiduity; but had the mortification to perceive that the resolutions of Elizabeth were fluctuating and unsettled. Sometimes he received orders to pursue the negotiation for completing the marriage preferable to that of the league; and at others she declared for the league in preference to the marriage. The minister was astonished at this inconsistent conduct in the queen, and the whole privy-council were doubtful what would be the result of this contest between inclination and reason, love and ambition.

The duke of Anjou, who had undertaken the defence of the Low Countries, was now so greatly distressed for want of money, that he had been obliged to put his army into cantonments. This inability of the duke alarmed the confederates. The prince of Orange saw the artful web of policy, he had been weaving so many years ready to be cut in pieces by the sword of the prince of Parma: his last effort was to persuade the states to throw off even their nominal obedience to the crown of Spain. Accordingly, in an assembly of the confederates at Antwerp, he represented the necessity they were under of either submitting to the terms prescribed by the Spaniards, or of shaking from their necks the yoke of a tyrannical and perfidious master, by disclaiming his authority, and uniting under the duke of Anjou, who had already been declared protector of their liberties. He observed, that as the marriage of the duke with the queen of England was on the point of being concluded, there was all the reason in the world to imagine that Elizabeth would look upon his quarrel as her own; that all the rules of good policy engaged his brother, the king of France, to support him in his new acquired dignity; and that Hainault and Artois, together with French Flanders, which was now returned to the Spanish yoke, would then undoubtedly follow the example of the other states, and join in the confederacy. These reasons, however powerful, did not appear sufficient to induce the states to embrace the offer immediately; they did not think the provocations they had received from the king of Spain, could dissolve the allegiance they owed their sovereign. But the imprudent conduct of Philip effected what their leader attempted in vain. He proscribed the prince of Orange, and set a price of twenty-five thousand crowns upon his head. Exasperated at this tyrannical action, the states immediately assembled, and declared, by proclamation, that Philip, king of Spain, had forfeited the sovereignty of the Low Countries, by violating contrary to his oath, the privileges of the people; "That therefore the provinces, in consequence of the permission given them by Philip himself, when they recognized him to be prince of Flanders, and before they owed him any allegiance, voluntarily, and of their own proper motion, had chosen for their prince Philip Valois, duke of Anjou, and brother to the king of France."

This resolution being taken by the states, a formal deputation was sent to the duke, inviting him to come and take possession of the principality of the Low Countries; but before this could be effected, some very alarming difficulties must be overcome. The active prince of Parma had, with incredible expedition, marched his army towards French Flanders, the provinces where the duke's chief interest lay, and sat down before the city of Cambray. Anjou immediately advanced to raise the siege, at the head of a well-a well-disciplined army of twenty thousand men. Parma pushed the siege with great violence; but not being able to make himself master of the place before the duke's arrival, he was obliged to abandon the undertaking, and retreat with some precipitation, his forces consisting only of five thousand foot and two thousand horse. Soon after, Pomponne de Bellievre arrived in the prince of Parma's camp, with letters from the king of France, disowning and disclaiming the duke's behaviour, and offering a cessation of arms till every thing could be accommodated in a friendly manner. But the prince of Parma treated this as a mere artifice; and, upon his retreat, the duke of Anjou drove the Spaniards out of the Cambresis. His success was not, however, sufficient to support his army; money was wanting; and unless a very considerable sum could be procured, all his conquests were in danger of reverting again into the hands of the enemy. The most pressing applications were made to Elizabeth, and she remitted the duke an hundred thousand crowns; which, with his own revenues, and the assistance of his brother and the queen dowager, he was enabled to pay his troops, and extend his conquests.

About the middle of November, the duke of Anjou landed in England, and was received with great magnificence and affection by Elizabeth. Every action betrayed her tenderness. She seemed, at last indifferent about concealing it. The truth is, she seems not to have known how far either ambition or affection would carry her; and notwithstanding all her prudence, to have been deceived by both. In the midst of the pomp which attended the anniversary of her coronation, she was seen, after a long and intimate discourse with him, to take a ring from her own finger, and put it upon his. This unguarded action was construed into an absolute promise of marriage by all the spectators, and that she was desirous of signifying her intentions to all the world. Expresses were immediately sent to every part of the kingdom, as well as to all the courts of Europe. Perhaps Elizabeth, in that critical moment, when she seemed dissolved in softness, was ignorant that ambition would evermore gain the ascendancy in her soul. But she no sooner reflected on the consequences that might possibly result from suffering the softer passions to prevail, than she shuddered at the precipitate step she was going to take; a step by which, perhaps, she was to lose all the glories her wisdom, her courage, and her perseverance, crowned with perpetual success, could impart. She was ready to divide her power, by which all England was obedient to her nod, and all Europe in terror of her frown, with a young man of untried temper, of foreign education, and of a different religion. She was to hear the discontents, the reproaches, nay, perhaps, the curses of her subjects, who, by this marriage, dreaded to see the fair and flourishing fabric of their religion, reared by the toil of princes, and cemented by the blood of martyrs, sink into ruins. She reflected with horror on her sister's misery, who, in the decline of life, married a catholic prince much younger than herself; and she began already to fear a total alteration in the laws and constitution of her country.

The poignancy of these reflections was increased by the extreme aversion which her most favoured courtiers discovered to the marriage. Even the ladies of her bedchamber strongly opposed her resolution with zealous remonstrances. Sir Philip Sidney, the most accomplished young gentleman of the age, ventured to write her a letter; in which he dissuaded her from her present resolution with the strongest reasons, delivered in an elegance of expression then very uncommon. He observed, that the security of her government depended entirely on the affection of her protestant subjects; and that she could not more effectually disgust them, than by marrying a son of Catherine de Medicis, and a brother of the cruel and perfidious Charles, whose hands were embued in the innocent blood of the Hugonots: that the catholics had always been her mortal enemies; and that if they had not yet united in a body against her, it was owing to their being destitute of a leader capable of conducting their dangerous enterprizes; a defect which would now be supplied by her marriage with the duke of Anjou, who was zealously attached to that communion: that the duke himself had discovered a very restless and turbulent spirit; he had often violated his loyalty to his eldest brother and his sovereign; and little hopes remained that he would passively submit to a woman, whom, in quality of husband, he might think himself intitled to command: that the plain and honourable path she had hitherto pursued, of cultivating the affections of her people, had rendered her reign happy and secure; and however her enemies might seem to multiply before her, the same invincible rampart was still able to defend her: and that though the queen might remain childless, and even old age grow upon her, the singular felicity and glory of her reign would preserve her from contempt; the affections of her subjects, and those of the protestants of Europe, would defend her from attacks; and her own prudence, without any other assistance, would baffle all the efforts of her most malignant enemies; her reign would be glorious, and her memory transmitted, with applause, to posterity.

Elizabeth was struck with Sidney's letter: she continued, for some days, in the most painful reflection and uncertainty; but at last her settled habits of prudence and ambition acquired the ascendant over her temporary inclination. She sent for the duke of Anjou, and had a long conversation with him, in which, it is supposed, she made apologies for breaking her engagements. On leaving her, he expressed the most violent disgust, threw away the ring she had given him, and uttered many curses on the mutability of women in general, and of islanders in particular. He returned, soon after, to the Low Countries; but wanting to make himself absolute master of their forts, he was driven away as a traitor and oppressor, and obliged to return to France, where he died. The distracted state of the French monarchy prevented the queen from feeling any effects of that resentment she had reason to dread from the affront so wantonly put upon that royal family. The blind tenderness of Elizabeth for a man more worthy of hatred than of love, can only be accounted for by the weakness of the human heart, which frequently brings genius and superior merit on a level with the vulgar.

A. D. 1582. The troubles in Scotland still raged with all the fury of an enraged multitude. The death of Morton, and the influence of the earl of Lenox, and James Stuart, now earl of Arran, alarmed the enthusiastic preachers. A fast was appointed to be held all over the kingdom, when the pulpits re-founded with declamations against the king's present counsellors. A conspiracy of the nobility was formed for seizing the person of James, who was then at Ruthven, a seat belonging to the earl of Gowry. The utmost secrecy was observed; and the council not having the least intimation of the conspirators' designs, the attempt succeeded without any opposition. The earls of Gowry and Mar, the lords Lindesey and Boyd, the masters of Glamis and Oliphant, the abbots of Dunfermline, Plaistey and Cambuskenneth, were the principal leaders in this enterprize. James wept when he found himself deprived of his liberty. "No matter for his tears," said one of the conspirators, "better that boys should weep than bearded men." James was deeply affected, and could never be prevailed upon to forgive the expression. He, however, prudently submitted to the present necessity, and stifled his resentment. He agreed to issue writs for calling an assembly of the church and a convention of the states, in order to exculpate the associated lords from the crime of treason, and ratify their enterprize. Though the ecclesiastical assembly had no right to meddle with civil matters, yet on this occasion they usurped an authority rity they never enjoyed, and declared that the late attempt was agreeable to all that feared God, or desired to preserve the person of the king, and the prosperity of the realm. They even threatened every person who should dare to oppose the authority of the confederated lords with the severest ecclesiastical censures. The convention ratified these proceedings, and declared the attempt of the associates a lawful act. The earl of Lenox, unwilling to excite a civil war in the bowels of his country, retired into France, where he soon after died. The earl of Arran was confined a prisoner to his own house; and Elizabeth sent ambassadors to compliment the captive king upon his delivery from his late pernicious counsellors.

A.D. 1583. Soon after, two ambassadors arrived from France, to enquire into the situation of the Scottish monarch, make him the strongest professions of their master's friendship, and procure an accommodation between him and his mother, the queen of Scots. This attempt alarmed the fanatical preachers, who used all their interest to render the design abortive. They even proceeded so far by their invectives, that the ambassadors were openly affronted in the streets. James had no power to repress this insolent behaviour; and the ambassadors, finding it impossible to carry on any negotiation with such a bigotted and ferocious people, left the kingdom. About the same time, Mary wrote to Elizabeth a very strong and pathetic letter, complaining of the hardships she had suffered during so many years, without being allowed even the exercise of her religion, without the liberty of corresponding with her only child, whose imprisonment had put the finishing stroke to her misfortunes. Overwhelmed with chagrin, and worn out with sufferings, she asked for nothing more than her liberty, for which she offered to sacrifice her crown, and every other right she possessed.

Elizabeth was affected with Mary's situation, but political motives still obstructed her designs of setting that princess at liberty. She was apprehensive of the consequences, and the hopes of Mary once more vanished. In the mean time, James, impatient of restraint, made his escape from his keepers; and flying to St. Andrews, summoned his friends and partizans to attend him. The confederated lords perceiving that all the opposition they could make would be in vain, made no attempt to recover their authority: some of them accepted a pardon, which was offered them on their submission; and the rest took shelter in Ireland and England. The earl of Arran, a man without either morals or moderation, was recalled; and the king, by this imprudent action, exposed himself to share the hatred that insolent nobleman deserved.

A.D. 1584. James seemed, for a time, to have thrown off his pusillanimity. He summoned a parliament, and caused an act to be passed for preventing the clergy from sowing the seeds of sedition from the pulpit. It was declared, that no clergyman should, for the future, presume to blacken the character of the king, or his ministers, in their sermons, or censure the affairs of the government. This highly provoked the enthusiastical preachers: they said, that the king himself was a papist in his heart, and bestowed the most degrading epithets on his friends and favourites. But all their attempts would, probably, have been rendered abortive, had not the violent conduct of the earl of Arran engaged the people to support them. Gowry, notwithstanding the late pardon, was tried, and executed; and many innocent persons suffered from the tyranny of that favourite. The banished noblemen were persuaded that they had now an opportunity of recovering their honours and estates: they made the attempt, and were successful. Arran was degraded from his authority, deprived of the estate and title he had usurped, and the whole country seemed to have obtained that tranquillity which had so long been sought for in vain.

During these transactions in Scotland, the English were frequently alarmed by the practices of the discontented party. All the prudence of Elizabeth could not secure her from conspiracies. The zeal of the papists grew stronger by restraint. The partizans of Mary were impatient to set her at liberty. A large packet of letters was dispatched, containing the most earnest exhortations to several ladies more immediately concerned about the person of Elizabeth, to imitate the example of Judith, and put a period to the life of a princess anathematized by the holy father. At the same time, assuring them, that they would be powerfully protected by the pope, the king, and the duke of Guise, who had formed an association for restoring the catholic religion in England, and extirpating the protestants. These letters appeared to have been written by one Francis Throgmorton, a young man of good family and excellent parts; who being apprehended, and brought before the council, absolutely denied the accusation; but on being shewn two lists, one of all the ports in England favourable for landing an army, and the other of all the gentlemen who favoured the Romish religion, and were well disposed to assist in an invasion, he retracted his denial, and made the following confession: "That going, some few years since, to the German Spaw, he contracted an intimacy with Jeney and Sir Francis Inglefield, two English fugitives; that their conferences generally turned on the best means of invading England; and that they had delivered him the two lists above mentioned: that after his return, Morgan, another fugitive in France, told him the catholic princes had formed a design to free the queen of Scots from her confinement, and that the care of executing the attempt would be committed to the duke of Guise: that nothing was wanting but to know what assistance might be depended upon from the English catholics: that, in order to form their measures on more certain information, Charles Paget, under the name of Mope, was sent into Suffex, where the duke of Guise intended to land his forces: that he (Throgmorton) himself had imparted the project to the Spanish ambassador, who, he found, had been already entrusted with the secret, and shewed him a copy of the list of the ports where the troops might be landed: that he also acquainted the ambassador with the names of the nobility to whom he might safely open his mind, in order to promote the design; and that conferences had actually been held on the best method of raising troops in England to join the foreign forces on their landing." Throgmorton was immediately sent to prison, and afterwards executed at Tyburn, where he retracted the confession he had made before the privy-council.

Some prudent measures pursued with regard to Ireland, greatly tended to put a period to the troubles in that kingdom. Sir John Perot, lord-deputy, summoned a parliament, in which the estates of many of the most dangerous rebels were sequestered; and the queen granting the earl of Ormond, who had headed the insurgents, some part of his lands, sold the rest, at very easy rates, to adventurers, who undertook to plant and improve the country. Sales were made of intire baronies, into which the Irish counties were divided; and the purchasers, under colour of their general grants, turned the innocent as well as the guilty, out of their possessions. The queen endeavoured to repress this rapacity by a proclamation, by which the injured proprietors, by an instance of good fortune, rare in that country, enjoyed the benefit. The lord-deputy, a person of rigid justice and inflexible integrity, taking care to see it duly executed. No governor of that island was ever more diligent, vigorous and impartial, in administering justice, equally to the English and the Irish. This raised him many enemies among the former, who thought themselves injured in being restrained from oppressing the latter; but by this means he introduced order and regularity into the government, and soon reduced Munster into a state of tranquillity. Nor was he less successful in reducing the native Irish and Scottish highlanders in Ulster to obedience. He forced them to swear allegiance, and submit to hold their lands in vassalage from the queen, pay her majesty a yearly rent, and engage to supply her with a certain number of soldiers in case of a rebellion.

The Spanish ambassador laboured assiduously to render these attempts for reducing the Irish abortive, and to keep up a strong party against the government. He was also very assiduous in stirring up disturbances in England, and blowing the coals of sedition; so that he was now considered by Elizabeth as the most dangerous enemy she had in England. He was accused of being the principal agent in a conspiracy formed against the queen's life. John Somerville, a bigotted catholic of Warwickshire, undertook a journey to London, in order to put the queen to death with his own hand, and actually attacked some of her attendants with his sword. The attempt, however, miscarried: he was easily secured, confessed his intention, and discovered his accomplices, who were all tried, and found guilty of high-treason. This, and other alarming attempts of the popish faction, greatly affected Elizabeth, and the Spanish ambassador was ordered to leave England. Philip considered this as an high affront, and refused to hear any apology from the English princes.

One Creighton, a Scotch jesuit, had been employed by Mary in soliciting twelve thousand ducats promised her by the court of Rome. Creighton, on his return, happened to be taken by a Dutch privateer, and attempted to destroy his papers, by tearing them to pieces, and throwing them overboard; but the wind driving them back into the ship, they were sent, with Creighton, to England. Part of them was lost, but enough was discovered to inform the ministry, that the pope, Philip, and the duke of Guise, had entered into a league to dethrone Elizabeth; to disinherit the king of Scotland, as an open favourer of the reformed religion; to marry the captive queen to some English nobleman; to place him on the throne; and to cause the issue of that marriage to be declared the lawful successors to the crown and kingdom of England.

Mary felt the effects of these associations; she was more closely confined than ever; though it is doubtful whether she really encouraged the secret practices of the catholics, or whether their attachment to her person and religion induced them, without her consent, to withdraw their allegiance and their duty from Elizabeth. The protestants loved the queen as much as the catholics hated her. A kind of confederacy was formed in her favour; and the parliament, which these practices of the papists induced her to summon, set no bounds to the testimonies of their zeal. They even authorized her to establish a committee, with power to judge any person who should make pretensions to the crown, or frame any attempt against her. The jesuits, and other priests of the Romish church, were banished the kingdom; and in case either of their continuance in England, or return thither, they were deemed guilty of high-treason. The same sentence was pronounced against the English students in foreign seminaries, unless they returned within a limited time, and made the usual submissions. From that time popery was no longer tolerated; the laws were executed with rigour; and, in the space of ten years, fifty priests suffered death. But surely excessive severity is not the most eligible method of reconciling the catholics, either to the government or the national religion; lenient and conciliating proceedings seem best adapted to effect the one, and candid reasoning the other.

Besides passing these severe laws against the papists, the commons voted the queen a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths. The only circumstance in which their proceedings were disagreeable to her majesty, was an application which the commons made for a farther reformation in ecclesiastical affairs. Though the majority of the house were puritans, they did not chuse to proceed on this delicate subject in the usual manner: they were afraid of offending the queen; and therefore petitioned the upper house, in order to effect the desired reformation; a measure that shews at once the absolute power of Elizabeth, and how far the commons were, at that time, from asserting those principles which have since acquired them so much dignity and power.

Their petition chiefly regarded an ecclesiastical tribunal, called the High Court of commission, established the preceding year. This tribunal was arbitrary, and may be considered as one of the worst abuses of despotism. The whole kingdom was subject to its decrees. The commissioners, who were forty-four in number, had the power of examining into errors, heresies, and every thing relative either to faith or worship. In order to discover offenders, they had the power of employing odious and illegal methods, particularly the oath ex officio, by which the person cited was obliged to answer all interrogatories, whether they tended to the accusation of himself, a relation, or a friend. They were authorized to punish fornication, incest, adultery, and all irregularities relative to marriage. The punishments they assigned were arbitrary. They were not liable to any arrest of judgment; and three judges were sufficient to pronounce sentences, which were subject to no controul. In a word, the inquisition, execrated by the protestants, detested even in many catholic countries, seems to have been the model of that tribunal, so contrary to all wise legislation. Elizabeth had no authority but her own supremacy for establishing a court so repugnant to all the rights of humanity. But in that age, the right of supremacy was supposed to involve powers, which no law, precedent or reason, could limit or determine.

Notwithstanding the commons had carried their deference even to a weakness, and petitioned the upper house in the most submissive manner, their attempt did not escape censure. The queen, at the end of the session, after thanking them for their zeal for her person and government, failed not to reproach them for their presumptuous imprudence. She told them, that being charged by God himself with the government of the church, one of her principal cares should be to banish error and schism; that she would not suffer the licentiousness of those who, from hasty interpretations of scripture, would introduce new doctrines; and that she knew well how to observe the medium between the superstitions of Rome and the illusions of new sectaries. But notwithstanding the great power of Elizabeth, and the deference paid her by the commons, the puritans were not to be intimidated. Persuaded that their tenets were undeniably founded on scripture; about five hundred ecclesiastics of that persuasion subscribed a book of discipline conformable to their principles; and the force of the laws was unable to prevent presbyterianism from taking root in the bosom of the church of England.

During this session of parliament, a horrid conspiracy against the life of Elizabeth was discovered. William Parry, a bigotted catholic, after receiving the queen's pardon for a capital offence, retired into Italy, where he openly professed his religion, which he had concealed while he continued in England. Happening to contract an intimacy with one Palmio, a jesuit, he too readily listened to the detestable doctrine of that order, and was persuaded that he could not do a more acceptable or meritorious action than that of taking away the life of his sovereign and benefactor. Campeggio, the pope's nuncio, whom Parry consulted on this important question, removed all his doubts, and approved extremely of his pious undertaking. Parry accordingly retired to Paris, whence he proposed to pass over into England, in order to execute his bloody design. Remorse, however, staggered his resolution; it is not sometimes even in the power of fanaticism to silence the remonstrances of conscience. He was desirous of trying every every method in his power to soften the persecutions carried on against the catholics, before he proceeded to extremities. His soul shuddered at the complicated horror of the action he was going to commit. He found means of being introduced to the queen; assured her that many conspiracies were formed against her life; and exhorted her, as the only means of rendering the attempts abortive, to allow the catholics a little more indulgence in the exercise of their religion. Finding all his attempts were in vain, he determined to execute his bloody design, and imparted his intention to Nevil, next heir to the Westmoreland family. He highly approved of the atrocious crime, and desired to share in an action which the interests of the church would sufficiently sanctify.

A book newly published by Dr. Allen, afterwards created a cardinal, confirmed their sentiments; and measures were formed for carrying their infernal design into immediate execution. But while they were waiting for a favourable opportunity, the earl of Westmoreland died; and Nevil, hoping to recover the honours and estates of that noble family, revealed the whole to the queen. Parry was seized, and made no difficulty of confessing the fact; and he suffered the punishment appointed by the law for treasonable practices.

A.D. 1585. The doctrine of putting tyrants to death was now generally asserted; a doctrine the more atrocious, as every prince whom the church of Rome thought proper to excommunicate, or declare a heretic, was called a tyrant, however just or prudent in the dispensations of government. Many great and brave men fell victims to the dagger of sanguinary calumny. Baltazar Gerard, a native of Burgundy, undertook the horrid task of assassinating the prince of Orange. He executed the bloody design with an intrepidity that would have done honour to a better cause. He sacrificed his own life, in order to destroy the famous restorer and protector of religious liberty. This event spread a general consternation through the Netherlands, where the people regarded the prince as their father, and where the prince of Parma had made an alarming progress in re-establishing the authority of Philip. In this deplorable situation the states offered the sovereignty of their country to Henry III. king of France. But the present condition of that monarchy obliged the king to reject so advantageous an offer.

Reduced to extremity, the states sent over a solemn embassy to Elizabeth, imploring the queen to take them under her protection. The business was of a delicate nature; and the council were divided in opinion, whether they should accept or reject the offer. Some considered the Flemings as rebels, whose revolt could not be countenanced without injustice, and whose proposals, if they were accepted, would expose the kingdom to dangers, to which they would bring no adequate advantage. Others represented the unbounded ambition of the king of Spain, his tyranny in the Low Countries, his implacable hatred to Elizabeth, as sufficient motives for accepting the offer. It was said, that the acquisition of the provinces, and the efforts of a brave people groaning under the weight of lawless power, would lessen the danger, by multiplying resources. The queen, always less enterprising than circumspect, thought proper to adopt the medium. She declined the sovereignty, that she might avoid the reproach of being an usurper; but she entered into a treaty, offensive and defensive, with the states, whereby she engaged to send them six thousand men, and maintain them during the war: that the general, and two others, whom she should appoint, should be admitted into the council of the states; that neither party should make peace without the consent of the other; that her expenses should be refunded at the conclusion of the war; and that the towns of Flushing and Brille, with the castle of Rammekins, should be immediately put into her hands, by way of security.

Elizabeth well knew that this measure would immediately occasion a rupture with Spain; but the present power of the ambitious Philip did not terrify her. His late acquisition of the crown of Portugal, with the rich settlements in the East-Indies, and the great increase of his naval power, were not sufficient to deter her from succouring a people distressed, and supporting the liberties of a country threatened with the most arbitrary despotism. The earl of Leicester, who was appointed to command the English forces, embarked on the twenty-third of October, attended by a splendid retinue, composed of the young earl of Essex, his son-in-law, the lords Audley and North, Sir William Ruffel, Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Arthur Basslet, Sir Walter Waller, Sir Gervase Clifton, and a select company of five hundred gentlemen. He was met, on his arrival at Flushing, by his nephew, Sir Philip Sidney, governor of that place; and every town through which he passed discovered the sincerest joy; they considered him as their guardian angel, their deliverer from impending ruin.

Philip II. was one of the most formidable princes of Europe. Besides large acquisitions in America and the East, he was, in some measure, the arbiter of the court of Rome, and the protector of the holy league formed in France against the Hugonots. He made religion a political resource for his unbounded ambition. The idea of his prodigious power alarmed most of the princes of Europe; and the king of Sweden, when informed that Elizabeth had entered into a league with the states-general, highly blamed her conduct, and said she was tearing the crown from her head. But she shewed no less courage in the danger than prudence in the design. She dispatched a fleet of one and twenty sail, under the command of Sir Francis Drake, with two thousand three hundred land forces, commanded by Christopher Carlisle, to attack the Spanish settlements in America, the chief source of Philip's power, and the most defenceless parts of his extensive dominions. The appearance of the English being wholly unexpected in that distant part of the world, they easily made themselves masters of the capital of St. Domingo, reduced Carthagena, and burnt the towns of St. Antonio and St. Helena, in Florida. Drake lost several hundred men in this expedition, but brought home such a prodigious quantity of treasure, as sufficiently rewarded the survivors for their sufferings. At the same time, he displayed the weakness of the Spaniards in the New World in such alluring colours, that his countrymen were animated to attempt other enterprizes of a similar nature.

Leicester, whose merit was not equal to the favour he enjoyed from the queen, had less success in the Low Countries. The prince of Parma, at the head of twenty thousand foot and six thousand horse, made himself master of Grave and Venlo; while, on the other hand, lord Walloughby, governor of Bergen-op-Zoom, cut off a large convoy of provisions belonging to the enemy; and Sir Philip Sidney and count Maurice surprised the town of Axel, in Flanders. The prince of Parma, exasperated at these losses, besieged Rheinburgh, garrisoned by twelve hundred English, under the command of colonel Morgan. Leicester thought this place of too much importance to be neglected, and immediately made dispositions for attacking Zutphen, a town of the greatest consequence to the enemy. The stratagem succeeded: the prince of Parma immediately abandoned the siege of Rheinburgh, and advanced to give Leicester battle before Zutphen. A bloody engagement ensued; but the English, after exerting all their valour, were obliged to retreat. Among others, the celebrated Sir Philip Sidney, a man of the finest genius, and the most heroic virtue, perished in this battle. Being mortally wounded, and almost suffocated with thirst, a bottle of water was offered him; but observing a soldier lying by his side, in the same dreadful situation, he resigned to him the valuable acquisition, with this generous observation, "That man's necessities are still greater than mine."

A.D. 1586. Every day brought Elizabeth fresh intelligence of Philip's designs against her person and government. It was therefore of the last importance for her to secure the friendship of the king of Scotland. Wotton, her ambassador, by consulting only how to please him and gain his confidence, soon became thoroughly acquainted with all the secrets of his cabinet. It is no wonder Wotton succeeded in gaining the ascendant over a prince of so open and unguarded a temper as James: he was a master of profound dissimulation, and knew how to cover, under the appearance of the most careless gaiety, the deepest designs and most dangerous artifices. Elizabeth was fearful lest James should contract an alliance by marriage, that might render him formidable to England: in the present state of the Scottish kingdom there was nothing to fear. But Wotton employed his intrigues to still more dangerous purposes: he formed a conspiracy for seizing the person of the king, and delivering him into the hands of the English princess; who would certainly not have been displeased had it succeeded, though she was intirely ignorant of the scheme. The treachery was, however, discovered, and Wotton fled into England.

Though James was highly exasperated at this design against his liberty, he thought it prudent to dissemble his resentment; and the negotiations were soon after renewed, and a treaty of alliance was concluded between the two kingdoms, for their mutual security, and the defence of the protestant religion, against the open combination of all the catholic powers of Europe. By this treaty it was stipulated, that if Elizabeth was invaded, James should furnish her with a body of two thousand horse and five thousand foot: that Elizabeth, in a similar case, should send him three thousand horse and six thousand foot: that the charge of these armies should be defrayed by the prince that demanded assistance: that if the invasion should be made in England, within sixty miles of the frontiers of Scotland, James should march his whole force to the assistance of Elizabeth; and that the present league should supersede all former alliances of either state with any foreign prince, so far as religion was concerned. By this treaty James was guaranteed not only against the dangers of an invasion, but also against domestic troubles, so much the more to be dreaded in Scotland, as the fanaticism of the presbyterian teachers had lately defied the authority of the king, the parliament, and the church. They had even proceeded to that height of audacity, as to excommunicate the archbishop of St. Andrew's, because he had found it necessary to restrain their licentious conduct; and the primate of the kingdom was constrained to divest himself of his ecclesiastical authority. One of the preachers declared publicly from the pulpit, that the king himself was the chief persecutor of the church; and, as a punishment, denounced against him the curse that fell upon Jeroboam, that he should die childless, and be the last of his race. To such unreasonable heights will religious bigotry sometimes carry its votaries!

The catholics extended their hatred much farther to Elizabeth. Her laws had irritated their zeal; and the anathemas of the pontiff convinced them, that it would be no crime to effect her destruction. The tyrant-killing doctrine did not fail of finding assassins for this implacable enemy of the Roman church. Among others that determined to put this destructive doctrine in execution, was one John Savage, who devoted his life to the service of the church, and undertook to execute this execrable design. Another plot was formed in the English seminary at Rheims; and a priest of that school passed over into England with a resolution to assassinate Elizabeth. He found means to engage in this infernal design one Anthony Babington, a young gentleman of fortune and polite education, who had wit and learning, and courage enough to be ambitious of restoring a captive queen to her liberty; and who was susceptible of that false zeal which believes every thing justifiable in defence of religion. Babington engaged in the conspiracy several catholics of distinction; and it was agreed that a select number should join Savage in the execution of his vow. In the mean time, the papists, in order to carry on their plot with less suspicion, and lull, if possible, the watchful council of the English cabinet into a fatal security, published several hypocritical writings, in which they professed the highest regard for the person and government of Elizabeth, admonished the people of their persuasion not to engage in any practices against the state, but to confine themselves to such weapons as are alone lawful for christians to use, such as tears, prayers, and fastings.

But the watchful Walsingham was not to be deceived: he soon obtained a superficial account of the conspirators designs; and, by the assistance of one Maud, a man of impenetrable dissimulation, who found means to insinuate himself into the favour of Ballard, the minister was regularly informed of every part of the conspiracy. It had been determined, in several of their meetings, to assassinate Elizabeth, place Mary on the English throne, and restore the catholic religion. Babington had, some years before, contracted an intimacy with Thomas Morgan, a pensioner of the queen of Scots, and had by him been introduced to the bishop of Glasgow, Mary's ambassador at the court of France. That prelate strongly recommended him to the captive queen, and he, for some time, managed her correspondence with her foreign friends. But, on her being more closely confined, the connection dropped, and Babington laid aside all farther thoughts of Mary and her concerns. Unfortunately for him, Ballard rekindled all his former zeal for her service; and he undertook, with the assistance of an hundred gentlemen, to deliver the queen of Scots from her confinement.

The plan being settled, Babington wrote to Mary, informing her of all that had passed between him and Ballard; and insisted that the gentlemen, who were concerned in so dangerous an attempt for her service, should be assured of a reward suitable to their merit. This letter was written in the usual cypher which had passed between him and Mary; and was so agreeable to her, that she failed not to answer it in the same cypher, desiring the conspirators to be extremely cautious, lest they should precipitate matters before the return of their English friends from abroad, before they were assured of foreign succours, and before some disturbances were raised in Ireland. At the same time, she pointed out the most natural methods for her own deliverance, which were either by overturning a cart in the gateway of the house where she was confined, setting the stables on fire, or carrying her off when she rode out for the benefit of the air.

These letters were carried to Walsingham, who was still desirous of farther information. Accordingly he added to one of Mary's letters, delivered to him by Maud, his trusty agent, a postscript in the same cypher, requesting Babington to send her the names of the principal conspirators. The stratagem succeeded; and the statesman soon discovered, that Savage, already mentioned; Charles Tilney, a man of family, and one of Elizabeth's pensioners; John Charnock, a gentleman of Lancashire; Edward Abington, whose father had been cofferer to Elizabeth; Chideock Tichburn, a gentleman of Southampton; and one Barnwell, a person of quality in Ireland, were the six engaged by oath to assassinate the queen. At the same time, the ridiculous vanity of Babington furnished Walsingham with another method of discovery, and also an indication of defence. He had caused a picture to be drawn, in which he himself was represented standing amidst the six assassins, with a motto, implying, that they were all embarked in some dangerous enterprize. A copy of this picture was carried to Walsingham by another of his spies, who had found means to insinuate himself into Babington's confidence. Walsingham delivered this copy to the queen, that she might know the the assassins, and be upon her guard if any of them should attempt to approach her person.

Convinced that all delays in enterprizes which depend upon secrecy are dangerous, Babington procured a licence for Ballard, under a feigned name, to pass over to the continent. The real intention of his journey was to hasten the foreign succours, whose arrival was desired with anxiety. And to remove all suspicion, Babington applied to Walsingham himself, pretended the greatest zeal for her majesty's service, offered to go abroad, and employ that confidence which he had gained among the catholics, to the detection and disappointment of their conspiracies. Walsingham desirous of seizing all the assassins, commended his loyal intentions, promised to assist him with his own counsel and advice in the execution, fed him with delusive hopes, and kept up a correspondence with him.

Babington having, as he imagined, gained the favour of Walsingham, began to flatter himself that the whole scheme would succeed according to his wishes. But while he was lulled in this fatal security, Ballard was seized by a warrant from one of the secretaries of state. This incident alarmed the conspirators, and introduced confusion into their councils. Some proposed, as the only method of escaping, to pass immediately over to the continent: while others advised, that Savage and Charnock should execute, without delay, their intended purpose upon Elizabeth. The last proposition was agreed to, and Babington furnished Savage with money that he might purchase cloaths necessary for obtaining the more easy access to the queen's person. The next day they began to apprehend that they had taken the alarm too hastily; and Babington, having renewed his correspondence with Walsingham, the anxiety and concern with which the consciousness of guilt had inspired the conspirators, began to subside; they flattered themselves that the seizure of Ballard was owing entirely to the usual diligence of informers in detecting popish and seminary priests: Babington was even persuaded to take lodgings in Walsingham's house; but observing that all his actions were watched with the most careful assiduity by one Scudamore, he began to be alarmed for his safety. Soon after, as they were sitting at supper, Scudamore received a note from Walsingham, ordering him to watch Babington more narrowly than ever; and Babington by Scudamore's inadvertency, reading the note over his shoulder, was sufficiently convinced of his danger. He rose hastily from table, went out of the room, as if on some sudden occasion, made the best of his way to Westminster, and, after acquainting Charnock and some others with the discovery he had made, they withdrew immediately into the woods, where they concealed themselves for ten days; but were at last discovered near Harrow on the Hill, dressed like countrymen, and brought prisoners to London.

On the thirteenth of September Babington and Ballard, with five of their accomplices, were arraigned, and pleaded guilty; and the next day seven more of the conspirators were convicted on evidence. The first seven suffered the sentence pronounced against traitors in its utmost rigour; but the others were suffered to hang till they were dead. They all behaved with great decency and resignation, and confessed their sorrow for that part of the conspiracy relative to the murder of Elizabeth.

The council having rendered abortive this alarming contrivance, and punished the lesser conspirators, measures were taken for the trial and conviction of the queen of Scots, on whose account, and by whose concurrence, this deep and dangerous plot had been formed against the life of the queen, and the peace of the kingdom. But great difficulties occurred with regard to the manner of proceeding. Scarce a precedent in the history of mankind could be found of a measure of this kind; not one in the annals of England. Some of the council therefore proposed, that no farther proceedings should be carried on against the queen of Scots; thinking that the close confinement of a woman, who was now become very sickly, would be a sufficient security to the government. Leicester advised that Mary should be secretly dispatched by poison: but Walsingham declared his abhorrence of so detestable an action, and insisted that all their proceedings should be open and candid. The majority of the council declared for the same opinion, and a resolution was taken for trying the queen of Scots. The princess was accordingly removed to Fotheringay castle in Northamptonshire, the last scene of her mortal pilgrimage.

She had for some time been so strictly guarded, that she was still ignorant of the detection of Babington's conspiracy; and she received the intelligence of this event with equal surprize and concern, from Sir Thomas Gorges, who had been sent for that purpose by Elizabeth. He chose to give her this information, when he was taking the air on horseback.

Her two secretaries, Nau and Curle, were immediately apprehended; all her papers were seized, and transmitted to the council: many letters from persons abroad, and some from English noblemen, expressing their firm attachment to her person and title. The queen thought proper to take no notice of this last discovery; but the persons themselves, conscious of their guilt, and dreading the punishment due to their crime, endeavoured to atone for their fault by changing their principles, and declaring themselves inveterate enemies to the queen of Scots.

An act had been passed in the last sessions of parliament, relative to the crime of treason, and it was determined to try Mary on this statute, and not by the common laws made against that crime. Accordingly the queen appointed a commission, consisting of forty noblemen and privy-counsellors, and judges, who were empowered to examine and pronounce sentence against Mary, whom they styled daughter and heir to James V. late king of Scotland.

On the eleventh of October, the commissioners repaired to Fotheringay castle, and Sir Walter Mildmay, and Edward Barker delivered to the queen of Scots a letter from Elizabeth, informing her of the commission, and of her approaching trial. Mary read the letter with a countenance more becoming her dignity than her situation, and told them, without the least emotion, that it was very surprizing the queen should command her as a subject, to submit to a trial and examination before persons of a rank far inferior to herself: that she was an absolute independent princess, and would submit to nothing that had a tendency to lessen her royal majesty, the state of sovereign princes, or the dignity or rank of her son: that however her spirits might be broken and oppressed by misfortunes and calamities, she was not yet reduced to that abject state her enemies desired; nor would she ever be prevailed upon to consent to her own degradation and dishonour: that though she had long lived in England, she had lived in captivity; was ignorant of the laws and statutes of the kingdom, destitute of council, and could not conceive who could be called her peers, or sit in judgment on a sovereign princess: that she had never enjoyed the protection of the laws of England, and therefore could not be supposed to have subjected herself to their jurisdiction and authority: that if in her own person every rule of justice should be violated, she should find her revenge in the judgment of the whole world, where her innocence would triumph on a theatre infinitely larger than that of a single kingdom.

This spirited answer to Elizabeth's letter greatly embarrassed the commissioners, who deputed lord Burleigh, the treasurer, Bromley, the chancellor, and Sir Christopher Hatton, the vice-chamberlain, to prevail upon her to relinquish her plea with regard to her royal dignity, and submit cheerfully to a trial which was now absolutely impossible to be avoided, even though her acquiescence could not be obtained. Various arguments were urged on this occasion, but those which chiefly prevailed on Mary to lay aside her plea of royalty, were those advanced in the following speech made by vice-chamberlain Hatton: "You are, Madam, (said he) accused, but not condemned, of having conspired the destruction of our lady and queen anointed. You say, you are a queen: but in such a crime as this, and such a situation as your's, the royal dignity itself is not sufficient, either by the civil or canon law, or the law of nature and nations, to exempt you from judgment. If you are innocent, you injure your reputation by avoiding a trial. We have heard your protestations of innocence; but queen Elizabeth thinks otherwise, and is heartily sorry for the appearances that lie against you. She has therefore appointed commissioners, honourable persons, prudent and upright men, to examine your cause. They are ready to hear you with equity, and even with favour; and will rejoice if you can clear yourself of the imputations which have been thrown upon you. Believe me, madam, the queen herself will rejoice; for she affirmed to me at my departure, that no misfortune had ever given her so much uneasiness, as that you should be suspected of a concurrence in these criminal enterprizes. Laying aside, therefore, the fruitless claim of privilege from your royal dignity, which can now avail you nothing, trust to the better defence of your innocence; make that appear in open trial, and leave not upon your memory that stain of infamy which must attend your obstinate silence on this occasion." These arguments produced the desired effect: Mary gave up her plea of royalty, and agreed to appear before the court of commissioners.

The trial had the appearance of great order and solemnity. At the upper end of the room was placed a chair of state for the queen of England, under a royal canopy: over against it, at some distance, stood a chair for the queen of Scots: by the walls, on both sides, benches were placed for the commissioners. As soon as the court was opened, the chancellor, turning to Mary, told her, "that she was accused of conspiring the destruction of the queen, the realm of England, and the protestant religion; and that they were commissioned to examine into the truth of the accusation, and to hear her answer. Mary replied, "that she came into England to crave the assistance which had been promised her: that she was a queen, and no subject to Elizabeth; and if she appeared before them, it was only to secure her honour and reputation." The chancellor denied that any assistance had been promised her; and declared, that her protestation was in vain; for since the law, upon which the accusation was founded, allowed of no distinction in the person of the transgressor, it could not be admitted. The commissioners, however, accommodated matters, by ordering both her protestation and his answer to be recorded.

This contested point being settled, the crown lawyers opened the charge against Mary queen of Scots. They accused her of offering to cede to the king of Spain the right to the crown of Scotland, if James, her son, refused to be a convert to popery. Mary did not attempt to exculpate herself from this accusation; she only answered, that she had no longer a kingdom at her disposal, but had still power to give what belonged to her, and was not responsible to any person. Strong proofs were produced, that she had formed a resolution of disinheriting her son as an heretic; that the late alliance of that prince with Elizabeth had heightened these prejudices; and that her maternal tenderness was abated by time, resentment, and religious zeal.

But these facts no way affected Mary's life: she knew this, and took no pains to confute the assertions. The great business was to prove the capital charge of the impeachment, that Mary had concurred in the conspiracy for assassinating Elizabeth.

In order to establish this accusation, copies of the intercepted letters between her and Babington were produced, in which her approbation of the murder was clearly expressed; the evidence of her two secretaries, Nau and Curle, who, even without being threatened with the torture, had sworn, that she both received these letters from Babington, and that they had wrote the answers by her order. The confession of Babington also corresponded with the depositions of her secretaries. Mary was incapable of making a satisfactory defence before the commissioners: her reply consisted chiefly in her own denial. She asserted, that as Nau and Curle had taken an oath of secrecy and fidelity to her, their evidence could not be credited; and that if these men had received any letters, or wrote any answers, the imputation could never lie upon her. She added, that it was easy to forge the hand writing and cypher of another.

But if we reflect on the enterprising character of Mary, on the odious treatment she had received, on her hatred to Elizabeth, on the prevalence of the tyrant-killing doctrine, and on the established opinion, that it was lawful to make use of any violence against a prince excommunicated by the pope, and separated by the church, we may believe, without difficulty, that Mary might concur in a measure so advantageous to herself. Many reasons render the thing more than probable. To say that Mary's two secretaries held a correspondence with Babington, wherein she was not concerned; or that they should betray their mistress, without so much as having been suspected themselves; or that Walsingham, a minister of integrity, if ever there was one, had forged the letters, and counterfeited the hand, would be to start so many indefensible propositions. In short, the only circumstance in her defence, which to us may appear to have some force, was her requiring that Nau and Curle should be confronted with her, affirming, that they would not, to her face, persist in their evidence. However agreeable this demand was to natural justice, it was observed to her, that in cases of high-treason, the laws and customs of England did not admit of confronting the evidence with the prisoner, and that the judges were not empowered to grant any indulgence.

The trial being finished, the commissioners adjourned from Fotheringay castle to the star-chamber in London; where, after taking the oaths of Mary's two secretaries, who voluntarily attested the authenticity of the letters produced at the trial, they pronounced sentence of death against the queen of Scots. At the same time, a declaration was published, importing, "That the sentence against Mary no way derogated from the title and honour of James, king of Scotland; but that he was in the same place, degree, and right, as if the sentence had never been pronounced."

Elizabeth had now sufficiently humbled her hated rival; but she was too politic to express her joy on this occasion. Majesty, in the very abyss of distress, was not an object of exultation. She affected to be deeply interested in the fate of an unfortunate relation; declaring, that however injurious her designs might be to herself, she was willing to bury them for ever in the gulph of forgetfulness; and that the safety of her people alone, which was nearly interested in the fate of the queen of Scotland, induced her to withhold a pardon. She summoned a parliament; that while she indulged the most implacable hatred, she might appear to be guided solely by the voices of her subjects. She well knew, that she should not want the most earnest solicitations from that assembly, to consent to a measure so agreeable to her secret inclinations. She was not deceived: the two houses confirmed the sentence pronounced against Mary, and requested the execution of it with all the ardour she could desire. Elizabeth failed not to support, with great propriety, the part she acted: she made a parade of humanity and hypocritical moderation, would promise nothing, and left the world in uncertainty with regard to her real sentiments. She complained of her own unfortunate situation; expressed her uneasiness from the importunity of her parliament; renewed her expressions of affection for her people; but still refused to declare her real intention with regard to the fate of the captive princess. She, however, complied with the request of the parliament, with regard to the publication of Mary's sentence. The lord Buckhurst, and Beale, clerk of the council, were sent to notify to the queen of Scots the sentence pronounced against her, its ratification by the parliament, and the earnest applications made by that assembly for its being carried into execution, from a persuasion that their religion could never, while she was alive, attain a full settlement and security. Mary received the news with joy, the idea of dying a martyr for the catholic faith supported her spirits in this melancholy moment. "I can hardly believe (said she, smiling) that the queen, my sister, has consented to my death; but if her will be such, that death, which will put an end to my sufferings, cannot be unwelcome to me: and I think that foul unworthy of celestial happiness, that should shrink in passing through the gloomy valley of the shadow of death."

Great efforts were, in the mean time, made by foreign powers, to prevent the execution of the sentence pronounced against Mary. The ambassadors of France and Scotland made vehement remonstrances, though it has been pretended, that the opposition made by the king of France was not sincere: but however that be, it had no weight with Elizabeth; she still persisted in her former resolution. Her ministers, indeed, strenuously opposed every argument that had a tendency to make her hesitate. They enlarged on the troubles and conspiracies that had been excited by the queen of Scotland. They observed, that she was already degraded from her rank; and that, in natural equity, every person, much more a sovereign, had a right to justice against those who should attempt his life. They added, that while Mary lived, every thing was to be feared from the attempts of the catholics; that things were now come to such a crisis, that the death of one of the two queens was necessary to the security of the other; and that, in this extremity, prudence and justice demanded the punishment of Mary.

We shall not be surprised at this strenuous opposition of the ministry, when we consider the situation of England at that critical juncture. No successor to the crown was declared; the heir by blood, to whom the people were most likely to adhere, was, by education, an enemy to the national religion; and, from multiplied injuries, an implacable enemy to the ministers and principal nobility. Hence their personal safety, as well as the security of the government, seemed to depend solely on the queen's life, who was now somewhat advanced in years, and perpetually exposed to the dagger of assassination. No wonder, therefore, that Elizabeth's counsellors, who knew themselves so obnoxious to the queen of Scots, endeavoured to push every measure to extremity, in order to prevent her ever mounting the throne of England.

Elizabeth, however, still continued to conceal her sentiments, though her actions sufficiently indicated that she had malice in her heart; and her duplicity furnished her with new artifices. Rumours of invasions, rebellions, and assassinations, were spread with great address. The people were terrified at their danger, and the death of Mary was considered as necessary to restore the tranquillity of the nation. The captive princess, however, supported herself with such placid dignity, as does honour to her memory. When Sir Amias Paulet took down her canopy of state, she bore the insult with the utmost patience; and when he told her, that she could now be considered only as a dead person, and incapable of any dignity, she only answered, that she received her royal character from the hands of the Almighty, and no earthly power could ever wrest it from her. She wrote a very pathetic letter to queen Elizabeth, requesting, "that after the fatal sentence was executed, her body might be sent to France, there to be interred near the sacred reliëts of her mother, and accompanied to the grave with those rites and ceremonies which her religion required: that the execution of her sentence might be public; in the sight of all the world; and that her servants, after they had done her the last offices; and been witnesses of her perseverance in the faith, and of her submission to the will of heaven, might be suffered to depart without molestation, and enjoy the legacies bequeathed to them by their dying mistress."

A.D. 1587. Elizabeth now proceeded to the last act of this affecting tragedy. As many intreaties had been used, as many delays had interposed, and as many alarms had been spread among the people, as were thought necessary, or decency required; but even in taking her final resolution, Elizabeth thought some new artifice necessary. She sent for secretary Davison, a man of great parts, but easy to be deceived, and commanded him to make out a warrant for the execution of Mary queen of Scots. He obeyed the order; the queen signed the warrant, and told him to carry it to the chancellor, in order to its having the seal affixed to it. The next day, she sent him a message by Killigrew, enjoining him not to execute her former commands till farther orders. Davison came immediately to court, and informed the queen, that the warrant had already passed the seals. She seemed offended, and blamed him for his precipitation. Alarmed at this inconsistency of conduct, Davison informed the council of the whole transaction; declaring, at the same time, that he would proceed no farther without their participation. They all requested that the execution might be hastened; declaring, that if the queen was offended, they would all equally share the blame; and Beale was accordingly dispatched with the warrant, addressed to the earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, and Cumberland, commanding them to see it carried into immediate execution.

On the seventh of February, the earls of Shrewsbury and Kent reached Fotheringay castle, and informed Mary of their commission; adding, that she must prepare for death the next morning by eight o'clock. She received the summons with great calmness and composure. She confessed, indeed, that she did not expect to die so soon; but all her gestures, looks and words, were full of cheerful resignation. She desired that she might have a conference with her almoner, confessor, and Andrew Melvil, the master of her household; but they refused her request with regard to her confessor. They, however, recommended to her the dean of Peterborough, who would very readily assist her in making preparations for her passage into eternity. She replied, that his assistance was not necessary; and as they had thought proper to deny a request for which the dictates of humanity so strongly pleaded, she would endeavour to supply the defect by her own prayers. To the exercises of a spirited devotion she joined the tenderest care of all her domestics. She made them a proper recompence for their services, wrote letters in their favour to the king of France and the duke of Guise, and took her leave of them in a flood of tears. She had long expected that she should not be permitted to exercise the rites of her religion, and had procured a consecrated wafer from pope Pius, and reserved the use of it for this last period of her life.

She rose in the morning with her usual serenity, and dressed herself in a rich habit of silk and velvet, the only one she had kept for herself; and on receiving the summons from the sheriff, appeared with a composed and cheerful countenance: her head was covered with a veil, extending to the ground; her beads hung at her girdle, and she held a crucifix in her hand. In the porch she was received by the earls and other gentlemen, and met by Sir Andrew Melvil, her steward, who bewailed his unhappy fate, in being appointed to carry the fatal tidings of her death to Scotland. Mary was deeply affected at the affection of her servant, and endeavoured to comfort him. She observed, that there was more reason to rejoice than to lament, as he would soon behold the sorrows and miseries of his queen and mistress at an end; and after kissing him, with her face bedewed with tears, she bid him farewell. Then turning to the noblemen, she desired that her servants might be permitted to attend her in her last moments. The earl of Kent refused this favour. Touched with his cruelty, she cried, "I am the cousin of your queen; I am descended from the royal blood of Henry VII. I have been queen of France by marriage; I have been anointed queen of Scotland!" Striking expressions at that dreadful crisis! The rest of the noblemen were affected, and it was agreed that she might carry some of her servants with her.

She now entered the hall, where a scaffold, covered with black, was erected; and she beheld, with uncommon fortitude, the two executioners, and all the preparations of death. Here the warrant for her execution was read to her by Beale, clerk of the council: she kept a profound silence during the ceremony, but seemed wholly unaffected, while the numerous spectators that crowded the hall were dissolved in tears. The dean of Peterborough began a tedious discourse, in which he exhorted her to abjure the catholic religion, and acknowledge the justice of her sentence, threatening her with eternal perdition if she refused. She answered, with great vivacity, "Give yourself no farther trouble; I was born, have lived, and will die a catholic." The earl of Kent was greatly offended at a crucifix she held in her hand, and desired her to part with that popish trumpery, as he called it; adding, that she should carry Christ in her heart, not in her hand. She replied, with great presence of mind, that it was not easy to have such an object in the hand without the heart's being affected.

Her private devotions being ended, she began, with the assistance of her women, to disrobe herself; on which her servants burst into tears and lamentations. She turned about, laid her finger on her lips, as a sign of imposing silence, gave them her blessing, and requested their prayers. After which one of her maids covered her eyes with a handkerchief; and, without fear or trepidation, she laid herself down; and, amidst the tears and mournful silence of the spectators, received the fatal stroke. The dean of Peterborough alone exclaimed, "So perish all the enemies of queen Elizabeth!" And the earl of Kent was the only person who replied, "Amen."

Thus died Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland, in the forty-fifth year of her age, and the nineteenth of her imprisonment in England; a princess of consummate beauty, uncommon understanding, and distinguished by such qualities of mind, both natural and acquired, as rendered her the most lovely of women. But her connections with the profligate Bothwell, joined to the effects of a blind and headstrong passion, betrayed her into actions which nothing can excuse, nothing can alleviate; and afford us a striking instance of the inconstancy of the human heart, and the frailty of our nature. The rigorous treatment she met with from Elizabeth, seems to authorize her to lay schemes for regaining her liberty, but not to conspire against her life. The prevalent spirit and principles of that age, together with a bigotted zeal for the catholic religion, which she had acquired during her long captivity, induced her to join in a design repugnant to humanity.

When Elizabeth was informed of the death of the captive princess, she affected the utmost grief and rage. None of her ministers dared to approach her. She openly declared, that the execution had been done without her knowledge, and contrary to her inclinations. She wrote a very pathetic letter to the king of Scotland, calling heaven and earth to witness, that it was her resolution to have spared the blood of Mary. She committed Davison to prison, and ordered him to be tried in the star-chamber for his offence. The minister well knew the danger of a contest with his sovereign; he acknowledged his guilt, and sued for pardon. The queen was inexorable; a tedious imprisonment, and a fine that reduced him to beggary, were the reward of his services. No body was deceived by this behaviour of the queen; they knew that dissimulation cost her nothing. Davison wrote an apology to his friend Walsingham, containing many curious anecdotes. He declared, that on the departure of the French and Scottish ambassadors, who had made strong representations in favour of Mary, she commanded him to deliver her the warrant for the execution of that princess. She signed it readily, ordered it to be sealed, and appeared in such good humour on the occasion, that she said to him, in a jocular manner, "Go tell all this to Walsingham, who is now sick, though I fear he will die with sorrow when he hears it." At the same time, she blamed Paulet and Drury, that they had not before eased her of this trouble, and wished Walsingham would bring them to a compliance in that particular. "I told her (says Davison) that Paulet had absolutely refused to act any thing inconsistent with the principles of honour and justice." The queen was very angry, and accused him and others of perjury, in having taken the oath of association, whereby they had bound themselves to revenge her wrongs, and yet refused their assistance when it was wanted. "But (added she) there are others who will do it for my sake."

The grief of the king of Scotland was real; he gave way to the most violent complaints and menaces, and abandoned himself to the wildest resolutions. He refused to admit Cary, who brought the letter of Elizabeth, into his presence. He recalled his ambassadors from the English court; war and vengeance seemed to have taken possession of his soul. Great part of the nobility caught the flame, and a rupture with England seemed inevitable. When the court went into mourning, lord Sinclair appeared in a suit of armour, and said, his dress only was the proper mourning for the queen of Scotland. Elizabeth was alarmed at these warlike appearances; and, as soon as the first flame was abated, she had recourse to conciliating measures. Walsingham wrote a long letter to James, in which he intimated the dangers to which Scotland would be exposed in a war with England; the inconveniences that must attend his receiving succours either from France or Spain; and how absurd it would be for James to risque his expectations of the crown of England, by irritating the people. These considerations, joined to the peaceable temper of the young prince, prevailed over his resentment, and a good correspondence with the English court was gradually restored.

Having thus dissipated the northern storm that threatened to discharge its fury on England, Elizabeth was more at leisure to watch the motions of Philip of Spain, a far more formidable enemy, who had, for some time, been making preparations for invading England. A prodigious number of ships were equipping in his ports; and though he had not yet declared war against England, no body was deceived in his intentions. But the navy of Elizabeth was able to dispute the prize of victory with the sovereign of the New World. Drake was sent, with a strong fleet, to insult the coasts of Spain, intercept the supplies of naval and military stores continually sending to Cadiz, and destroy the shipping of the enemy in their own harbours. Drake executed his commission with great courage and success, burning and destroying above an hundred sail of ships, most of them laden with provisions and military stores; and after taking the town of St. Vincent, and bombarding Lisbon, he failed for the Western Islands, in order to intercept a rich carrack, or galleon, called the St. Philip, then on her return from the East-Indies. He succeeded, and returned to England with an immense booty. But the most valuable acquisition was a packet of papers found on board the galleon, by which the English learned the nature of the the oriental commerce, and inspired them with the thoughts of establishing an East-India Company.

Soon after this successful expedition, Thomas Cavendish returned from his voyage round the world. He was a gentleman of Devonshire, who having spent his fortune at court, resolved, if possible, to retrieve it by an attempt against the Spanish settlements in the New World. He fitted out three ships at Plymouth; one of an hundred and twenty tons, another of sixty, and a third of forty. With those small vessels he ventured into the South Seas, and committed great depredations on the Spaniards. He took no less than nineteen vessels richly laden; and returning to England by the Cape of Good Hope, entered the Thames in triumph. His sailors and soldiers were dressed in silk; his sails were of damask; his top-sails cloth of gold; and his booty proportional to this magnificence. It is easy to imagine that such remarkable success must animate others to attempt expeditions of a similar kind.

But the English were not equally successful in the Netherlands. Leicester had intrusted the command of Zutphen and Deventer to Stanley and York, two of his creatures; who, instead of defending those important posts, treacherously delivered them up to the duke of Parma. Alarmed at these practices, the states sent an embassy to the English court, requesting that the government might be taken from the earl of Leicester, and given to some more able and prudent general. Elizabeth, notwithstanding her partiality for her favourite, recalled Leicester; and Maurice, the young prince of Orange, being appointed governor of the United Provinces, soon shewed himself worthy of his father. The lord Willoughby was made general of the English forces in the Low Countries, and received orders to submit to the authority of prince Maurice.

A.D. 1588. But the preparations of Philip of Spain principally engaged the attention of Elizabeth. That hypocritical monarch, though he had not yet declared his intention, was preparing to take his revenge, and to seize the crown of England. Pope Sixtus V. not less ambitious than Philip, excited him to the enterprize: he again excommunicated the queen, and published a crusade against her, with the usual indulgences. All the ports of Spain resounded with preparations for this alarming expedition; the Spaniards seemed to threaten the annihilation of the English. Elizabeth, who was well informed of the storm that was gathering against her, took every precaution to render the attempts of the enemy abortive: she augmented her navy, and exercised her militia. Nothing was neglected; fear was a stranger in the English council.

Philip had spent three years in preparing for an invasion of England; and his fleet, which, on account of its prodigious strength, was called the Invincible Armada, was now completed. A consecrated banner was procured from the pope, and the gold of Peru was lavished on this occasion. This tremendous armament consisted of the following particulars: nineteen thousand two hundred and ninety soldiers; eight thousand two hundred and fifty seamen; two thousand and eighty galley-slaves; and two thousand six hundred and thirty pieces of ordnance. The marquis of Santa Croce, an officer of great reputation and experience, was appointed to command the armada; and by his counsels and directions all the naval preparations were conducted. There was hardly a noble family in Spain, but sent either a son, a brother, or a nephew, on board this fleet, in order to acquire riches and estates in England, which was considered as an easy conquest. The duke of Parma, in order to insure success, was ordered to provide transports sufficient to embark an army of twenty-five thousand men, and land them in England as soon as the Spanish fleet appeared on the coast of Flanders. Ships were accordingly provided, and the duke quartered his troops in the neighbourhood of Gravelines, Dunkirk, and Nieuport.

The magnanimity of Elizabeth was remarkable on this trying occasion. Her fleet at that time consisted of no more than twenty-eight sail, and those, for the most part, small vessels; but the alacrity of her subjects sufficiently atoned for the weakness of her navy. The maritime towns, the nobility and gentry, testified the greatest zeal on this occasion. The city of London fitted out thirty ships, though fifteen only had been required. The gentry and nobility hired and armed forty-three ships at their own expence. Lord Howard of Effingham, a man of great courage and capacity, was lord admiral, and took upon him the command of the navy: Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher, the most renowned seamen in Europe, served under him. The main fleet was stationed at Plymouth; while a smaller fleet, consisting of forty vessels, under the command of lord Seymour, lay off Dunkirk, in order to intercept the forces commanded by the duke of Parma.

The English land forces were superior in number to those of Spain; and though inferior in discipline and experience, they were ready to sacrifice their lives in defence of the liberties and laws of their country. Twenty thousand men were cantoned along the southern coasts of England; another body of disciplined forces encamped at Tilbury, near the mouth of the Thames, under the command of the earl of Leicester, whom the queen, on this occasion, created general in chief of all her forces; and the lord Hunsdon commanded a third army, consisting of thirty thousand men, for the defence of her majesty's person. Arthur, lord Grey; Sir Francis Knowles, Sir John Norreys, Sir Richard Bingham, and Sir Roger Williams, men renowned for their valour and experience, were consulted about the management of the war; and, pursuant to their advice, all the landing-places on the coast from Hull to the Land's-End, and thence to Milford-Haven, were fortified and garrisoned. The militia of the country were armed and regulated under proper officers, who received instructions for interrupting the disembarkation of the enemy, wasting the country before them, attacking their rear, and keeping up a continual alarm in their army, till a sufficient force could be assembled to give them battle. Sir Robert Sydney was sent into Scotland, in order to induce James to continue firmly attached to the English interest. The Scottish monarch was sufficiently disposed to cultivate an union with Elizabeth, and even to march, at the head of all the forces of his kingdom, to the assistance of the English. Her authority with the king of Denmark, and the connection resulting from their common religion, prevailed upon that prince to seize a squadron of ships, which Philip had either purchased or hired in the Danish harbours. But her chief hopes of success were placed on the affections of her people. The very papists themselves, though they knew the pope had absolved them from their oaths of allegiance, exerted themselves on this occasion. Conscious that they could not expect to be intrusted with authority, several of the young nobility served as volunteers, either in the fleet or army: some equipped ships at their own expence, and gave the command of them to protestants; while others were active in animating their tenants and vassals in support of their sovereign. Party distinctions were forgotten, and every man exerted himself in the defence of his country.

The queen, to excite the martial spirit of the nation, appeared on horseback in the camp at Tilbury, harangued her army, and expressed an entire confidence in their loyalty and courage. She assured her troops, that the weakness of her sex should not prevent her marching at their head against the Spanish invaders; that she would behold and reward their bravery herself; and that she would sooner perish on the field of battle than live to see the slavery of her people. "My arm (said she) is but the arm of a woman; but I have the heart of a king, and, what is more, of a king of England." The whole army caught the heroic ardour of the queen; they were impatient to meet the enemy, and convince the haughty Spaniards that they still possessed all the spirit of their ancestors.

The death of the marquis of Santa Croce prevented the sailing of the armada. The duke of Medina Sidonia, a nobleman of great family, but wholly unacquainted with maritime affairs, was appointed admiral in his room. This interval was employed by Elizabeth in making new preparations for rendering the design abortive. At length the invincible fleet sailed from Lisbon on the twenty-ninth of May; but being overtaken with a dreadful tempest, the fleet was obliged to put into the Groyne, having received considerable damage. After a delay of two months, the armada sailed once more to prosecute the intended enterprize. The fleet consisted of one hundred and thirty ships, of which near a hundred were galleons, and of a greater burden than any that had ever before appeared on the coast of England. The Spanish admiral was ordered to sail as near the coast of France as possible, in order to join the prince of Parma, and avoid meeting the English fleet, which might occasion some delay in the enterprize; for it was never imagined that they could make any effectual opposition. But an accident induced the Spanish admiral to neglect this prudent advice. He took a fishing-boat in his passage, the master of which informed him, that the English admiral, persuaded that the late storm, which scattered the armada, had prevented any attempt being made this season, had laid up his ships, and discharged the greater part of his seamen. Deceived by this intelligence, the Spaniard determined to destroy the English ships in Plymouth harbour before he joined the prince of Parma. He accordingly steered towards that port, hoping to obtain an easy victory. The armada was disposed in the form of a half-moon, and stretched to the distance of seven leagues from the extremity of one division to that of the other. The ocean seemed to groan beneath its burden, and the winds to be tired with impelling so enormous a weight. But this tremendous appearance dismayed not the English; they knew their huge vessels were so ill constructed, and so difficult to be managed, that they would not be able to support themselves against the repeated attacks of ships at a distance. Experience soon convinced them that they were not mistaken. Two of the largest ships in the Spanish fleet were soon after taken by Sir Francis Drake; and while the enemy advanced slowly up the channel, the English followed their rear, and harassed them with perpetual skirmishes. The Spaniards now began to abate in their confidence of success: the design of attacking the English navy in Plymouth was laid aside; and they directed their course towards Calais, in order to join the prince of Parma.

The alarm had now reached the coast of England, and the nobility and gentry hastened out with their ships from every harbour, to join the admiral, who soon found his fleet amounted to one hundred and forty sail. He still hung upon the rear of the Spaniards, and distressed them with repeated attacks. At last the armada came to an anchor before Calais, in expectation of being joined by the prince of Parma; but before that general could embark his troops, all hopes of success vanished, by a stratagem of the English admiral. He filled eight of his smaller ships with combustible materials, and setting them on fire, sent them, one after another, into the midst of the enemy's fleet. Terrified at this appearance, the Spaniards cut their cables, and betook themselves to flight in a very precipitate and disorderly manner. In the midst of this confusion, the English fell upon them with so much fury, that twelve of their largest ships were taken, and many more greatly damaged.

The Spaniards were now convinced that the intention of these prodigious preparations was entirely frustrated; and would willingly have abandoned the enterprize, and returned immediately to their own ports; could they have done it with safety: but this was impossible: the wind was contrary; and the only chance of escaping, was that of making a tour of the whole island, and reaching at last the Spanish harbours by the ocean. But a violent storm soon overtook them, and completed the destruction of the invincible armada; not half the number of vessels returned to the ports of Spain. It is said that Philip, being informed of these disasters, fell on his knees, to thank heaven for leaving him so much; while the Spanish clergy, confounded at an event so contrary to their expectations, assigned a very ridiculous cause for it, namely, that some infidel Mahometans were suffered to continue in a catholic kingdom.

A public thanksgiving was ordered by Elizabeth; and she herself repaired, in great solemnity, to St. Paul's, to perform that sacred duty; and eleven standards taken from the enemy were hung up in the church, as trophies of the success of the English. The queen bestowed rewards on many of her officers who had so nobly exerted themselves in defence of their country; and the whole kingdom was one continued scene of joy.

Soon after the dispersion of the Spanish armada, Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester, the queen's great, but unworthy favourite, paid the debt of nature. He had discovered no conduct in any of his military enterprizes, and was even suspected of cowardice; yet he was entrusted with the chief command of the English at a time when the Spaniards were expected to invade the kingdom; a partiality that might have proved fatal to Elizabeth, had the prince of Parma landed his troops in England. But the queen's affections seemed to terminate entirely with his death: she caused his goods to be exposed to sale, in order to reimburse herself for the money she had lent him.

A. D. 1589. Nothing is more seductive than victory. The English having defeated the Spanish armada, attempted to take the kingdom of Portugal from Philip, and give it to Don Antonio, a bastard of the house of Braganza. Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Norris were the leaders of this romantic enterprize. About twenty thousand volunteers engaged in the service. The ships were hired, as well as the arms and stores provided, at the expence of the adventurers. The queen contributed only six ships and sixty thousand pounds towards this expedition.

The fleet sailed from Plymouth on the fifth of April, arrived safely at the Groyne, and soon became masters both of the place and harbour. They now sailed for the coast of Portugal; and in their passage were met by the young earl of Essex, who had equipped a few ships at his own expence, and sailed on a cruise against the Spaniards. This reinforcement revived the spirits of the adventurers; they seized the town and castle of Panicha, and determined to march to Lisbon by land, Drake promising to follow with his fleet. On their arrival, they became masters of the western suburb of Lisbon without opposition; but the next day a large body of Spaniards sallied from the citadel, and cut off several of the English, with some of their best officers. The earl of Essex behaved with the most surprising courage on this occasion: he led the English against the assailants, and drove them back to the citadel. A revolt of the citizens was every moment expected; but after waiting two days, without any appearance of an insurrection being made in favour of Don Antonio, the English abandoned the enterprize, and marched to Cascaris, a little town at the mouth of the Tagus. Here they found their fleet under the command of Drake, who had not been able to enter the river, the passage being defended by all the Spanish galleys, and a battery of fifty pieces of cannon. It was now determined not to make any farther attempt upon the capital; and, after blowing up the castle of Cascaris, and burning Vigo, they returned to England, after losing a great number of men by sickness and fatigue.

In the mean time, the parliament met at Westminster, and voted double supplies to the queen; who knowing that the puritans formed a majority in the house of commons, laid a strict injunction on the members not to meddle with ecclesiastical matters. A motion was, however, made, for restraining the tyranny of the ecclesiastical commission: but the fear of displeasing the queen had so great an effect on the members, that the motion was not seconded. Nor were the commons successful in their attempts to rectify the abuses of purveyance, by which the officers of the crown took up at discretion, for the queen's service, or rather under pretence of that service, whatever provisions and carriages they thought necessary. The price was fixed much lower than the current value, and the payment always distant and uncertain: Hence the most enormous abuses were continually practised on the subject. But Elizabeth put a stop to their proceedings: she told them, that she had already given orders for making a strict enquiry into the abuses complained of, and would shortly complete the design; but would not permit them, by laws moved without her consent, to bereave her of the honour attending these regulations.

The affairs of England were now in a state of tranquillity. The Scots, since the death of Mary, were no longer terrible. James, surrounded by factions, invested with little authority, and naturally inclined to repose, was so far from being able to give the English any disturbance, that he found it his interest to maintain a good correspondence with Elizabeth. He had lately married a daughter of the king of Denmark, and by that means lost the favour of the catholic party. Philip of Spain had sufficiently seen his error, to attempt a new invasion: he was not so fond of enterprize to squander the treasures of his kingdom in enterprizes big with abridgment. Elizabeth was therefore now able to assist the Hugonots in France; who were still persecuted by the league. The duke of Guise, more absolute than Henry III. had compelled that prince to take up arms against them, and also against the king of Navarre, the presumptive heir of the crown. Elizabeth furnished the latter with large sums; and, by her assistance, he had gained a victory over the league at Coutray. He could not, however, maintain his advantage, because the Germans, who were marching to his assistance, were defeated by the duke of Guise. Unforeseen events, however, changed the face of things in France. The inhabitants of Paris, intoxicated with the admiration of Guise, and strongly prejudiced against the king, took up arms against him, and Henry was obliged to fly from his capital for safety. He, however, dissembled his resentment, entered into a negotiation with the league, and loaded Guise and his partizans with offices and favours. Deceived by these appearances of friendship, Guise, and his brother, the cardinal of Lorraine, came to court, and were both assassinated by the king's orders. This perfidious conduct rendered the league more furious and formidable than ever. The citizens of Paris renounced their allegiance, and were followed by those of many considerable places in the kingdom. Henry finding it impossible to resist the storm that was gathering round him, was obliged to have recourse to the Hugonots for assistance; he joined the hero whom he had been obliged to treat as an enemy. At the same time, he enlisted large bodies of Swiss infantry and German cavalry; and being still supported by his chief nobility, he assembled an army of near forty thousand men, and advanced to the gates of Paris, threatening the severest revenge against the inhabitants. But the city was saved by the resolution of Jaques Clement, a Dominican monk. Inflamed by the bloody spirit of bigotry which distinguished this century, he embraced the resolution of sacrificing his own life to save the church from the persecutions of an heretical tyrant. He found means to be admitted into the king's presence, and plunged a dagger into the breast of his sovereign, who expired on the first of August.

The king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. ascended the throne, but found he had a kingdom to conquer, and subjects to subdue.

Towards the close of this year died the famous Sir Francis Walsingham, secretary of state, one of the most able and accomplished ministers that ever appeared in this or any other country, and not more distinguished by his great abilities than his unfulfilled virtues. Though he had passed through many great employments, and had been very frugal in his expences, he died so poor, that his family was obliged to give him a private burial. He left only one daughter, who was first married to Sir Philip Sidney, and afterwards to the earl of Essex, the great favourite of queen Elizabeth.

A. D. 1590. Elizabeth perceiving that Philip aimed at universal monarchy, and that the first step towards accomplishing that alarming design was the deposition of Henry IV. she sent that prince a body of troops, which did him signal service. The famous sieges of Paris and Rouen, which the duke of Parma had the honour of raising, deceived, however, the hopes of the queen. She seemed dissatisfied with the conduct of her ally, and complained of his exposing the English too much on every occasion; a complaint that seems not to have been well founded, as it was undoubtedly owing to the valour of those troops, especially to their officers, who, under the command of the young earl of Essex, risked every thing for glory. But while the English were gathering laurels in the fields of France, the queen sustained an irreparable loss, by the death of Sir Christopher Hatton, lord high chancellor of England. He was a person of great abilities, unshaken probity, firmly attached to the constitutions of his country, and a munificent patron of learning.

A. D. 1591. Desirous of depriving Philip of part of the treasure of the Indies, the true source of all his power, Elizabeth resolved to distress him in that part of the world. Accordingly the lord Thomas Howard was dispatched, early in the spring, to the Azores, or Western Islands, with a squadron of seven ships, to intercept the galleons in their return to Europe; but the Spanish monarch, apprized of her design, fitted out a fleet of fifty-five sail, and sent them to the Azores, to convoy the India ships. Howard, who knew nothing of this strong fleet, escaped with difficulty. His little squadron was riding at anchor in the harbour of Flores when the Spanish fleet appeared. He, however, found means to put to sea, by which the enemy were disappointed in their hopes of taking him and his whole division. Sir Richard Grenville, in the Revenge, was not so fortunate: he was surrounded by the enemy, and all hopes of escaping were cut off. In this desperate situation he attempted to break through the Spanish fleet, but was disappointed; and after an engagement of fifteen hours with the whole force of the enemy, he was obliged to surrender, but not before he was mortally wounded. The rest of the squadron returned to England, disappointed, indeed, in their expectations of acquiring part of the riches of the New World, but not in essentially distressing the enemy; for the Plate fleet had been so long detained at the Havannah, through fear of the English, that they were obliged to put to sea at an improper season; in consequence of which, the greater part of them were lost before they reached the ports of Spain.

A. D. 1592. Though Henry IV. had obtained some advantage over the league, the catholics were far from being intimidated: they made the most violent efforts against their sovereign, and the cardinal legate published the pontiff's bull for the election of a popish king. They intended to have given the crown to Philip; and the duke of Parma marched a powerful army into France, to over-awe the assembly, which the Spanish party proposed to be held at Rheims or Soissons. But the duke of Mayenne, sensible of the consequences, ordered the assembly to be held at Paris. This, in some measure, disconcerted the plan of the prince of Parma; and Henry drew all his troops out of Normandy, in order to fight the Spanish general before he could advance into the heart of the country. What the consequence would have been, it is impossible to say; but all the vast designs of Philip were rendered abortive by the death of the prince of Parma, who paid the debt of nature in the forty-fifth year of his age. Even Elizabeth herself is said to have dropped some generous expressions to the memory of that great man; and, perhaps, few princes ever excelled him in virtue, in civil, and in military accomplishments. His great merits were soon conspicuous after his death. No other general had authority sufficient to maintain a proper discipline in the Spanish troops. The soldiers mutinied, and a great number of them deserted.

Elizabeth, though she assisted Henry, did not lay aside her favourite scheme of humbling the pride of Philip, by cutting off the sinews of his strength in the West-Indies. Sir Walter Raleigh was sent with a squadron of fifteen men of war, either to attack Panama, or intercept the Plate fleet in their return to Europe. No man was ever better adapted to enterprises of this kind than Sir Walter: his schemes were great, but difficult, if not impracticable to any capacity but his own: his learning was not inferior to his knowledge, his constancy to his courage, nor his virtue to his genius, which was equal to the greatest undertakings. Having been detained too long in port by contrary winds, he sailed three months later than he intended; and after passing the Land's-End, he learned, that orders had been sent from Spain to stop the return of the Plate fleet to Europe that season. This intelligence, together with a violent storm which separated his fleet, obliged him to alter his plan of operations. He sent one part of his squadron, under Sir Martin Forbisher, to cruise on the coast of Spain; and another part under Burroughs, a brave sea officer, to the Azores. The earl of Cumberland was also at sea with three men of war, and had chased a galleon into Flores, just as Burroughs arrived at that island; while the Spanish fleet, which was then at sea, went in search of Forbisher. Burroughs would have made himself master of the galleon which had taken shelter in Flores, had not a dead calm succeeded, and given the Spaniards an opportunity of unloading the treasure, and setting the ship on fire. He had, however, the good fortune, soon after, to take another galleon, after a desperate engagement, in which the greater part of the Spanish crew, consisting of six hundred men, were either killed or wounded. The English gained both riches and honour by this capture. The money publicly known amounted to one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, and the embezzlements were thought to be at least equal in value. But though Elizabeth exerted all her power to recover the riches that had been secreted, no discovery was made.

A. D. 1593. The expences of these expeditions amounted to one million two hundred thousand pounds, so that Elizabeth, notwithstanding her strict economy, could not support so heavy an expence without the assistance of parliament. But however pressing her wants might be, she supported all her haughtiness towards the parliament. When the speaker of the house of commons demanded for the members assembled in parliament, personal security, freedom of debate, and access to the throne, she answered, by the mouth of the lord-keeper, that their persons should be safe while they abused not this privilege; that liberty of speech was granted the commons, but they must know in what that liberty consisted: it was not a liberty of saying what they pleased; it extended no farther than Yes or No; and that she would not refuse them access to her person in weighty and important matters, at a convenient season, and when the cares of government would permit. At the same time, she enjoined the speaker, if he perceived any idle heads so negligent of their own safety, as to attempt any reformation in the church, or innovation in the commonwealth, to refuse the bills offered for that purpose, till they were examined by such as were better qualified to consider of those things, and more able to judge of their propriety.

But notwithstanding the imperious and menacing air of this speech, the puritans were not intimidated. Peter Wentworth ventured to transgress the imperial orders of Elizabeth. He presented a petition to the upper house, requesting that they would join with the commons in a supplication to her majesty, that she would be pleased to entail the succession of the crown. Elizabeth was offended at this attempt, however respectful and cautious. Wentworth was sent to the Tower; and Sir William Bromley, who seconded the motion, to the Fleet prison. Even this arbitrary proceeding could not repress their farther attempts for freedom. Morrice, attorney of the court of wards, exposed, in their proper colours, the enormous abuses of the ecclesiastical commission, and made a motion for redressing these grievances. Exasperated at the temerity of Morrice, the queen sent for the speaker, and told him, that she had assembled the parliament for two purposes only; to maintain the uniformity of the national religion, and to provide for the defence of the kingdom against the enormous power of Spain; that their deliberations must turn intirely on these points; that she had already enjoined them not to meddle either with the affairs of the state or religion; and wondered how any person could be so assuming as to attempt a subject so expressly contrary to her prohibition. Morrice felt the weight of the queen's resentment: he was seized in the house by the serjeant at arms, discharged from his office, disabled from acting in his profession, and confined some years in Tilbury castle. So determined was the queen to support her prerogative, and so strong was the love of liberty and independence in the puritan party.

A severe bill was soon after passed against the non-conformists of all persuasions. It was enacted, that any person above sixteen years of age, who obstinately refused, during the space of a month, to attend the public service of the church of England, should be committed to prison; that if, after being condemned for this offence, he persisted three months in his refusal, he must abjure the realm; and that if he either refused this condition, or returned from his banishment, he was to suffer capitally as a felon, without benefit of clergy. Both catholics and puritans had reason to complain of this law, which, under almost any other reign, might have occasioned a civil war. But the imperious Elizabeth had subdued the people, partly by fear, and partly by the esteem she had gained by her magnanimity. The commons seemed intirely passive under this haughty treatment; they granted extraordinary supplies without the least difficulty.

The king of France, notwithstanding all his heroic qualities, and the great assistance he received from the English, soon perceived that arms alone would never make him master of his kingdom. He found it impossible to triumph over the rage of a party, whom religious zeal had rendered the most obstinate rebels. A conspiracy was even formed in his own court, for electing some catholic prince to fill the throne of France, if Henry any longer delayed to embrace the established religion. The more sensible among the protestants perceived the necessity of satisfying the catholics. Henry accordingly abjured Calvinism, either from conviction, or, as it is rather supposed, from political motives. But however that be, the papists triumphed greatly in gaining so illustrious a proselyte; and the dreadful disputes which had for so many years deluged France with blood, began to subside. Elizabeth, who was herself chiefly attached to the protestants by political reasons, reproached Henry for this interested conversion in a very angry letter. Sensible, however, that the league and the king of Spain were still their common enemies, she listened to his apologies, and continued her her assistance: she even entered into a new treaty with him, whereby it was stipulated, that no peace should be made but with the consent of both parties.

Philip confined not his intrigues to England only; he endeavoured to excite fresh disturbances in Scotland; and large supplies were promised by the governor of the Netherlands, if the catholics would attempt to wrest the sceptre from James, and give it to a prince of the Romish persuasion. The project was, however, principally levelled against England; for though the Spaniards promised to send an army into Scotland, it was only to cover their enterprize against Elizabeth, whom they intended to assassinate; and, during the general consternation, which they imagined must attend her death, they proposed to invade England, which would then become an easy conquest. They proceeded so far in this detestable scheme, that several of their agents were discovered and executed. Elizabeth complained loudly of these base attempts in every court of Europe, and determined to take a noble revenge in the field of battle.

A. D. 1595. While the queen was making preparations for carrying the war into the territories of Spain, several noble achievements were performed at sea by the English; but the most remarkable was an expedition of Sir Walter Raleigh to Guiana, a large tract of land in South America, rather possessed than inhabited by the Spaniards. He had, at his own expence, sent one Whiddon to view the coast, and make all the observations in his power. His report confirmed Raleigh in his resolution of endeavouring to wrest that extensive country out of the hands of the Spaniards. His undertaking was so generally applauded, that both the treasurer and admiral of England contributed to the expences of fitting out a fleet for carrying the design into execution. Accordingly, on the sixth of February, Sir Walter sailed from Plymouth; and on the twenty-second of March, took the city of St. Joseph, in the island of Trinidad, and made Boreo, the Spanish governor, prisoner. Having procured all the information possible with regard to the strength and riches of Guiana, Raleigh manned his long-boats with about a hundred men, and proceeded above four hundred miles up the river Oroonoko; but met with so many difficulties from the navigation and the heat of the climate, that he did not reap all the advantages so brave and dangerous an undertaking deserved. It is certain, however, that he made great discoveries; and though we have no authentic account of the riches he acquired in this undertaking, there is sufficient reason to believe they were very considerable. He was received with the highest applause on his return, and a very pompous account of his voyage was published.

A. D. 1596. The necessary preparations being made for carrying the war into the very heart of Spain, a powerful fleet, consisting of one hundred and ninety vessels, having on board six thousand three hundred and sixty soldiers, a thousand volunteers, and six thousand seven hundred and seventy-two seamen, sailed from Plymouth on the first of June. The fleet was commanded by lord Effingham, and the land forces by the earl of Essex. The lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Coniers Clifford, had commands in this expedition, and formed a council to the admiral and general.

Every precaution was taken to render the expedition successful. The general rendezvous was appointed at Cadiz, and armed tenders were dispatched before the fleet, to intercept every ship that could carry any intelligence to the enemy. Near Cadiz they took an Irish vessel, by which they learned that the harbour was full of merchant ships of great value; and that the Spaniards lived in perfect security, without the least apprehensions of a visit from an enemy. This intelligence greatly encouraged the English, and promised a fortunate issue to the enterprize.

Sir Walter Raleigh proposed to attack the ships and vessels in the bay; and was strongly seconded by the young earl of Essex, who burnt with an eager desire of signalizing his courage on this important occasion. The motion was agreed to; and it was determined that Raleigh should lead the attack in the Warpsite, and be seconded by Sir George Carew in the Mary Rose, Sir Robert Southwell in the Lion, Sir Francis Vere in the Rainbow, vice-admiral Crois in the Swiftsure, Sir Coniers Clifford in the Dreadnought, and the lord Thomas Howard in the Nonpareil.

The Spaniards, in order, if possible, to render the attempt of the English abortive, ranged their galleys under the walls of the city, so as to flank the English ships as they passed: some culverins were planted to secure the channel of the harbour; and the artillery, both of Fort St. Philip and the curtain of the fortification, were brought to bear on the English fleet. Besides these, the Spaniards had put guns on board all their large galleons, which were covered by Fort Punta, situated in the middle of the harbour.

At break of day Sir Walter, at the head of the English van, advanced to the attack, and received the fire from Fort St. Philip, the curtain, and seventeen galleys; but he answered only by a flourish of his trumpets, pursuing his course with amazing intrepidity, in order to encourage the ships that followed him, and reserve his fire for the body of the enemy. After a long and most desperate engagement, Sir Walter prepared to board the Spanish admiral, a ship of fifteen hundred tons; but the Spaniards perceiving his intention, ran her on shore, and set her on fire. Three other galleons followed the example of their admiral, but two of them were saved, and brought away by the English boats.

During this engagement, the earl of Essex, with five hundred men, landed at the Puntals, and marched directly to Cadiz. Five hundred Spaniards advanced about four hundred paces from the city to meet him; but were struck with a panic, retired into the city with the utmost precipitation, and were closely followed by the English. Cadiz was now in the utmost consternation; and before any measures could be taken for making a proper defence, the English had forced the gate, and were soon in possession of the market-place. The garrison and inhabitants retired to the castle and town-house, but soon offered to capitulate; and it was agreed that their lives should be saved on their paying seventy thousand ducats. A prodigious quantity of silver was found in the place, and sent immediately on board the English fleet.

While Essex was employed in the reduction of Cadiz, Sir Walter Raleigh was sent to burn the merchant-ships at Port Real. The Spaniards offered to pay two millions of ducats for their ransom; but Raleigh rejected the offer, saying, that he came to destroy, and not to ransom the ships of the enemy. The Spaniards, however, found means to unload some of their ships, and set fire to others, in order to deprive the English of their riches. Besides the merchant-ships, two galleons, thirteen men of war, eleven ships freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others, were taken by the English; besides which, they destroyed a prodigious quantity of military and naval stores prepared for an intended expedition against England. The whole loss was estimated at twenty millions of ducats.

No Englishman of note perished in this memorable conquest, so glorious to the English and fatal to the Spaniards, except Sir John Wingfield, who was killed in the city; and the victory was obtained with the loss of two hundred men only. Besides the vast riches lost by the Spaniards, and the ruin of their trade to the New World for that year, they were obliged to submit to the mortifying conditions of seeing one of their principal sea-ports in the hands of an enemy whom they hoped to conquer.

This success was regarded by Essex only as a step to farther conquests. He insisted on keeping possession of Cadiz, and undertook, with four hundred men and three months provisions, to defend the place against all the attempts of the enemy, till succours could arrive from England. But this offer was rejected; nor were his schemes for intercepting the carracks at the Azores, assailing the Groyne, or taking St. Andero and St. Sebastian, accepted. All the other seamen and soldiers, satisfied with the honour they had acquired, were impatient to return home in order to secure their plunder. Essex complained of their want of spirit in this enterprize, and the queen herself was not pleased at their return without attempting to intercept the India fleet: but the great success of the enterprize against Cadiz covered all their miscarriages. Effingham was created earl of Nottingham, a promotion which gave great offence to Essex, because it was said, in the preamble to his patent, that this dignity was conferred upon him for his good services in taking Cadiz, a merit which Essex insisted belonged principally to himself; and even offered to maintain his claim by single combat, against Nottingham, his son, or any of his family.

A. D. 1597. Exasperated by the losses he had sustained by the taking of Cadiz, Philip determined to make another effort for the conquest of England. He accordingly assembled a formidable fleet early in the spring, at a time when Elizabeth thought him absolutely disabled from executing any scheme of revenge. His fleet rendezvoused at Ferrol, and having taken on board the land forces destined for the expedition, steered directly for England; but before they reached the channel, a violent storm dispersed the fleet, and rendered the attempt abortive for that year. In revenge for this attempt Elizabeth determined to attack Tercera, the principal island of the Azores, and, if possible, intercept the Spanish fleet, in their return from the West Indies. A large armament, consisting of one hundred and twenty-two ships, was accordingly fitted out with the utmost expedition, and six thousand land forces were embarked. The command of the whole expedition was given to Essex, together with one of the divisions of the fleet; the second division was commanded by lord Thomas Howard, and the third by Sir Walter Raleigh: lord Montjoy, was appointed lieutenant-general under Essex; and Sir George Carew, lieutenant of the ordnance. The principal volunteers were the earls of Rutland and Southampton, the lords Grey, Cromwell, and Rich.

The destination of the fleet, which sailed on the ninth of July, was first against Ferrol and the Groyne, in order, if possible, to surprize the Spanish fleet in these harbours; and afterwards against the Azores. But contrary winds, storms, and a fatal quarrel between the earl of Essex and Sir Walter Raleigh, broke these measures, and the fleet returned to England about the end of October, without having performed any memorable action.

The war with Spain though successful, exhausted the queen's treasure, and she was obliged to call a parliament to obtain supplies. These were readily granted; but the commons, notwithstanding their former attempts miscarried, ventured to present a petition to the queen against the abuse of monopolies. Her answer was conceived in general terms, without promising to redress the evil. But on dismissing the parliament she told them, in her speech from the throne, "That with regard to exclusive patents, she hoped her loving and faithful subjects would not take away her prerogative, the chief flower in her garden, and the principal pearl in her diadem; but that they would rather leave these things to her disposal." It was hardly to be expected, that the liberties of the people of England could gain ground under a government supported with so much vigour and ability.

A. D. 1598. France was now reduced to the most deplorable situation. Torn in pieces by discord, fanaticism, and civil wars, a peace became in some measure necessary for Henry, who had nothing so much at heart as the happiness of his people. He communicated to his allies the proposals of the court of Spain, and signified his desire of concluding a general treaty of peace. Elizabeth and the States general were alarmed at this design, and sent ambassadors to oppose the pacific sentiments of the French monarch. He shewed them at once the solidity of his reasons and the rectitude of his views; and as Philip would not treat with the Hollanders upon the condition of acknowledging them a free people, nor Elizabeth negotiate without their concurrence, he concluded, at Vervins, a separate peace; whereby he recovered possession of all the places seized by Spain during the course of the civil wars, and procured himself leisure to attend the domestic settlement of his kingdom. Some of the chiefs of the English ministry, particularly lord Burleigh, who best merited the queen's confidence, advised her to embrace pacific measures; but all his reasons were urged in vain. That spirited princess, at other times so attentive to the prevention, now listened not to the ears of adverse fortune. She no longer dreaded the attempts of the Spaniards; the armada's of Philip had lost their terror. Animated with the hopes of sharing in the riches of America, and deeply interested in the fate of the new republic, she preferred an honourable war to the advantages of a peace, which must have entailed misery and slavery upon Holland. The earl of Essex encouraged her in these sentiments. He represented to her, that the defence of the Hollanders was the original cause of the war; and that it was at once unsafe and dishonourable to abandon the cause he had undertaken to defend, till she had placed them in a state of greater security, and procured them that liberty for which they had so long and so nobly contended.

The arguments of Essex, whose person was very agreeable to the queen, prevailed: the favourite seemed daily to gain the ascendant over the minister. That nobleman was no less distinguished by his understanding than by his birth and figure. He was bold, generous, sincere, a firm friend, active, and passionately fond of glory; but carried away by his passions, and incapable of submitting to the rein of prudence. These passions at last proved his destruction. The Hollanders considered Elizabeth as their guardian angel, and readily submitted to any terms she pleased to require. The debt they owed the queen was now fixed at eight hundred thousand pounds; of which sum they agreed to pay thirty thousand pounds a year during the continuance of the war, and these payments were to be continued till they had paid four hundred thousand pounds. They also agreed to pay the garrisons of the cautionary towns while England continued the war with Spain; and that if Philip should attempt an invasion of England, to assist the queen with a body of five thousand foot and five hundred horse.

This treaty was ratified on the eighth of August, and soon after Philip II. of Spain expired at Madrid, in the seventy-third year of his age, and the forty-third of his reign. The satisfaction of Elizabeth at this event was greatly lessened by the loss of lord Burleigh, her zealous and faithful counsellor. That truly great man had long and earnestly requested his mistress to grant him some moments of interval between business and the grave; but he asked in vain. He continued immersed in all the fatigues of office till death, on the fourteenth of August, gave him that repose which was denied him by Elizabeth. Lord Burleigh was now on the verge of eighty, and though many ministers have lived with less envy, none ever died with greater reputation. He was chiefly distinguished for solidity of understanding, probity of manners, and indefatigable application to business; he had been regarded as the chief minister near forty years, and his death, by a rare instance of fortune, was equally regretted by his sovereign and the people.

Nothing but his own imprudence could now have shaken the credit of Essex; but his lofty spirit could ill submit to that implicit deference which Elizabeth's temper required, and which she had ever been accustomed to receive from all her subjects. Disputing, one day, on some affair with the queen, he carried matters so high, as to turn his back upon her with an air of contempt. Elizabeth's anger, which was naturally prompt and violent, rose on this provocation, and she instantly gave him a box on the ear. The passion of Essex was too violent to be restrained. He laid his hand upon his sword, and swore that he would not have taken so gross an affront from her father Henry himself. The admiral and vice-chamberlain interposed between the sovereign and the subject, and prevented any farther consequences at that time; but Essex left the court, with a seeming resolution never more to return. His friend Egerton, the chancellor, exhorted him to repair his indiscretion by proper acknowledgments, to acknowledge his faults, and consider his duty and his fortune. He conjured him not to give that triumph to his enemies, that affliction to his friends, which must ensue from his supporting a contest with his sovereign, and deserting the service of his country. Essex answered, in a letter full of resentment, and which breathed all the violence of his haughty soul; but was, at the same time, so spirited, that it would be injustice not to lay it before the reader. "My very good lord, Though there is not that man this day living whom I would sooner make the judge of any question that might concern me, than yourself, yet you must give me leave to tell you, that in some cases I must appeal from all earthly judges; and if in any, then surely in this, when the highest judge on earth has imposed on me the highest punishment, without trial or hearing. Since then I must either answer your lordship's argument, or abandon my own defence, I will force my aching head to do me service for an hour. I must first deny my discontent, which was forced, to be an humorous discontent; and that it was unreasonable, or has so long continued, that your lordship should rather condole than expostulate with me. Natural seasons are expected here below, but violent and unreasonable storms come from above. There is no tempest equal to the passionate indignation of a prince; nor at any time so unreasonable, as when it lighteth on those that might expect a harvest of their lawful and painful labours. He that is once wounded, must needs feel the smart till the hurt is cured, or the part become senseless: but cure I expect none; her majesty's heart being obdurate against me; and senseless I cannot be, because formed of flesh and blood. But you say, I may aim at the end: I do more than aim; I see an end to all my fortune; I have put a period to all my desires. In this course do I any thing more for my enemies? When I was at court, I found them absolute; and therefore I had rather they should triumph alone, than have me attendant upon their chariots. Or do I leave my friends? When I was a courtier, I could yield them no fruit of my love; and now I am a hermit, they shall bear no envy for their love of me. Or do I forsake myself, because I enjoy myself? Or do I overthrow my fortunes, because I build not a fortune of paper walls, which every puff of wind bloweth down? Or do I ruin my honour, because I leave following the pursuit, or wearing the false badge or mark of the shadow of honour? Do I give courage or comfort to the foreign foe, because I reserve myself to encounter with him? Or because I keep my heart from business, though I cannot keep my fortune from declining? No, no, my good lord, I give every one of these considerations its due weight; and the more I weigh them, the more I find myself justified from offending in any of them. As for the two last objections, that I forsake my country when it has most need of me, and fail in that

"indissoluble duty which I owe to my sovereign; I answer, that if my country had, at this time, any need of my public service; her majesty, who governs it, would not have driven me to a private life. I am tied to my country by two bonds; one public, to discharge carefully and industriously that trust which is committed to me; the other private, to sacrifice for it my life and body; which have been nourished in it. I am freed from the first, by being dismissed, discharged, and disabled; by her majesty; from the other nothing can free me but death; and therefore no occasion of my performance shall sooner offer itself, but I shall meet it half way. The indissoluble duty which I owe to her majesty, is only the duty of allegiance, which I never have, nor ever can fail in: the duty of attendance is no indissoluble duty. I owe her the duty of an earl and lord-marshal of England: I have been content to do her majesty the service of a clerk, but I can never serve her as a villain or slave. But yet you say I must give way to the times: so I do; for now I see the storm approaching, I have put myself into the harbour. Seneca says, we must give way to fortune: I know that fortune is both blind and strong, and therefore I go as far as possible out of her way. You say the remedy is not to strive: I neither strive nor seek for remedy. But you say, I must yield and submit: I can neither yield myself to be guilty, nor allow the imputation laid upon me to be just. I owe so much to the Author of all truth, as I can never yield truth to be falsehood, nor falsehood to be truth. Have I given cause, you ask, and yet take scandal when I have done? No, I gave no cause, not so much as Fimbria's complaint against me, for I received the whole sword into my body: I patiently bear all, and sensibly feel all that I then received, when this scandal was given me. Nay more, when the vilest of all indignities is done me, does religion enforce me to sue for pardon? Doth God require it? Is it impiety not to do it? Why? Cannot princes err? Cannot subjects receive wrong? Is an earthly power infinite? Pardon me, my lord, I can never subscribe to these principles. Let Solomon's fool laugh when he is stricken; let those that mean to make their profit of princes, shew no sense of princes' injuries: let them acknowledge an absoluteness on earth, that do not believe an absolute infiniteness in heaven. As for me, I have received wrong, I feel it: my cause is good, I know it; and whatever happens, all the powers on earth can never exert more strength and constancy in oppressing, than I can shew in suffering every thing that can or shall be imposed upon me. Your lordship, in the beginning of your letter, makes me a player, and yourself a looker-on; and me a player of my own game, so you may see more than I. But give me leave to tell you, that since you only see, and I am alone the sufferer, I must, of necessity, feel more than you."

The friends of Essex imprudently shewed this spirited letter; but notwithstanding this additional affront, the queen's partiality for that young nobleman was so strong, that she forgot every provocation. He soon became the only confidant of Elizabeth, and the sole director of the affairs of the kingdom. But few are capable of enjoying the height of prosperity; it darkens the eye of wisdom, and becomes the precipice of destruction to folly. Essex was no sooner established in the queen's favour, than he abused it. The troubles which still subsisted in Ireland opened a new scene for his ambition, and he rashly engaged in an undertaking which terminated in crimes and misfortunes.

The strict œconomy of the queen had hitherto prevented her from keeping a sufficient force in Ireland to subdue the rebels; and the policy of legislation, the only means of forming conquered savages into useful subjects, had been entirely neglected.

They

They were treated rather like wild beasts than men; and the Irish, in return, thought nothing so glorious as that of shaking off the yoke of the English. Their firm attachment to the church of Rome heightened their aversion to their protestant oppressors; while their bogs and inaccessible woods afforded them retreats, and formed ramparts impenetrable to the enemy.

Hugh O'Neill, whom the queen had created earl of Tyrone, and whose treachery was equal to his ferocious valour, excited a great rebellion; and having received assistance from the king of Spain, gained advantages considerable enough to make the court of London very uneasy. He had already assumed the character of the deliverer of his country, and the patron of Irish liberty. It was therefore determined to prosecute the war with vigour, and subdue the rebels by extraordinary efforts. The queen cast her eyes on Charles Blount, lord Mountjoy, as a man, who, though hitherto less accustomed to arms than to books and literature, was endowed with talents that would sufficiently atone for his want of experience. Jealous of every occasion that offered for distinguishing himself, Essex represented, that this expedition required a man of birth, experience and reputation, much superior to those of Mountjoy, and at last procured the appointment for himself. Had he listened to the advice of his enemies, he could not have engaged in a more fatal undertaking. But Essex was incapable of caution; he imagined that every difficulty would give way before him; and that his presence, at the head of a numerous army, would be sufficient to hush the ferocious Irish into peace. The queen's preparations were equal to the tenderness she cherished for her favourite, and her desire of subduing the flagitious rebels. She raised an army of twenty thousand men; a force considered as abundantly sufficient for finishing the war in a single campaign. Essex was created lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and furnished with a commission more ample than any that had hitherto been granted. He was empowered either to continue or finish the war; to pardon the earl of Tyrone, and other rebels; an authority never granted to any of his predecessors.

A.D. 1599. Essex set out for his government about the middle of March, accompanied by a numerous train of nobility and gentry, who, from an affection to his person, had attached themselves to his fortunes; and attended by the acclamations of the populace, by whom he was greatly beloved. The first act of his authority in Ireland was an indiscretion, though of the generous kind. He appointed his friend, the earl of Southampton, general of the horse, though the queen had enjoined him not to employ that nobleman; and even repeated orders were hardly sufficient to induce him to revoke the commission. Any other man would have fallen a victim to such temerity. The rest of his conduct was conformable to this beginning. Instead of leading his powerful army into Ulster against Tyrone, and putting an end to the rebellion, by reducing the chief, he suffered himself to be persuaded by the Irish council to march into Munster, situated at the other extremity of the kingdom. He indeed reduced the rebels to submission, but he lost a very considerable part of his army in the attempt; and had no sooner left the country, than they again revolted. By this time the season was considerably advanced, his army sickly, and greatly reduced in their numbers; so that he was obliged to request a reinforcement of two thousand men, in order to enable him to march against Tyrone. The troops were immediately sent by Elizabeth, and Essex at last advanced into Ulster against the chief of the rebels. Tyrone, though at the head of an army greatly superior in numbers to that of the English, wisely avoided a decisive action, and proposed a conference with Essex; in order, as he pretended, to put a stop to the flames of civil discord, which had so long wasted Ireland. The offer was accepted, and the two generals met without any of their attendants. Tyrone behaved, during the conference, with the greatest submission, and a cessation of arms was concluded till the first of May. By this treaty the expensive expedition of Essex was rendered abortive, and affairs continued on the same footing as before. The queen did not fail to let him know that she was highly dissatisfied with his conduct, but commanded him to continue in Ireland till farther orders.

The haughty Essex was now sufficiently alarmed. Persuaded, that if he continued any longer at a distance from the court, he should lose all his influence with the queen, while his enemies enjoyed the malignant satisfaction of triumphing in his fall, he determined to disobey the orders of Elizabeth. He accordingly left Ireland, and arrived at London before any one was the least apprized of his intentions. He immediately repaired to court, and presented himself before the queen, covered with dust and sweat. Whether Elizabeth's tenderness awaked at the sight of her favourite, or whether surprize prevented her from attending to proprieties, she gave him a very kind and flattering reception; and, on his departure, he was heard to thank God, that though he had met with many troubles and storms abroad, he had found at home a sweet and pleasing calm.

But this placid interval was deceitful. Like the momentary cessations in a storm, the tempest returned with all its force. Essex soon learned how much his presumption and his faults had weakened his influence over Elizabeth's heart, which was less tender than haughty. She ordered him to be confined to his chamber, and to be twice examined before the privy council. His answers were calm and submissive, but not sufficient to satisfy Elizabeth: she committed him to the custody of the lord-keeper; and none of his friends, not even his counsellors, were permitted to visit him. This disgrace seemed to humble his pride; he dropped many expressions of humiliation and sorrow, none of repentment. He fell sick, and his life was thought to be in danger. The queen appeared greatly interested in his recovery: she sent him a message by Dr. James, that if she thought such a step consistent with her honour, she would herself pay him a visit. This proof of her tenderness had the most salutary effect, and the favourite nobleman soon recovered his health.

The departure of Essex from Ireland revived the courage of Tyrone. The English army, now without a leader, was not sufficient to stop his progress: he reduced the whole province of Ulster to obedience; and being encouraged by a bull sent from pope Clement VII. granting him and his adherents the same indulgences as those who fought against the Turks in the recovery of the Holy Land, he flattered himself with being soon master of the whole kingdom. He was also promised a supply of men and money from Spain; and having received a consecrated plume from the pope, he called himself the champion of the catholic religion.

A.D. 1600. Alarmed at the progress of the rebels, the queen sent lord Mountjoy into Ireland. The whole island, at his arrival, was in a very desperate situation; but being a man of capacity and vigour, he was not discouraged. He advanced immediately into Ulster against Tyrone, and soon penetrated into the heart of that county, the principal seat of the rebels. He drove them from the open fields, and obliged them to take refuge in their bogs and forests. Sir George Carew had equal success in Munster, and the queen's authority was once more established in Ireland. The success of Mountjoy rendered the conduct of Essex less excusable at court, though his popularity increased with his misfortunes. The ministry was accused of malice, and the queen herself of injustice. Alarmed at the prejudices of the people, Elizabeth determined to bring Essex to an open trial before the privy council. Coke, the attorney general, opened the cause against him, and treated him with the cruelty and insolence which that great lawyer usually usually exercised on the unfortunate. Essex made no defence; he declared he would never have any contest with his sovereign; and that he should readily submit to any judgment they might think proper to pronounce against him. The chancellor's sentence, on this occasion, is remarkable: "If the earl of Essex (said he) had been tried in the star-chamber, my sentence must have been for as great a fine as ever was set upon any man's head in that court, together with perpetual imprisonment in the Tower; but since we are now in another place, and in a course of favour, my sentence is, that the earl of Essex is not to execute the office of a counsellor, nor that of earl-marshal of England, nor of master of the ordnance; and to return to his own house, there to continue a prisoner till it shall please her majesty to release this, and all the rest of his sentence." The celebrated Sir Francis Bacon was ordered by the queen to draw up a narrative of the whole proceedings, in order to satisfy the nation that she had acted with the utmost lenity. Bacon, who was firmly attached to Essex, gave the whole transaction a very favourable turn for his patron: he painted, in the most elaborate expressions, the dutiful submission made by that nobleman before the council. The queen, when Bacon read the passage to her, could not forbear smiling; and observed, that old love could not easily be forgotten. He replied, that he hoped her majesty meant it of herself.

Essex received his chastisement with so much humility, that the queen, persuaded that it was sincere, gave him proofs that she had not entirely withdrawn her countenance from him. She gave orders that his sentence should not be recorded, and restored him to his full liberty; but at the same time advised him to be cautious of giving farther offence, and ordered him not to appear at court. Essex immediately prepared for his departure into the country; but before he set out, he wrote a letter to the queen, in which he told her, that he kissed her majesty's hands, and the rod with which she had corrected him; but that he never could recover his usual cheerfulness till she deigned to admit him to that presence which had ever been the chief source of his happiness and enjoyment; and that, in the mean time, he would retire into a country solitude, and labour assiduously to atone for his former offences. Pleased with these sentiments, the queen replied, that she wished his actions might be conformable to his expressions; but as he had so long abused her patience, she would take some time to try his sincerity. She added, "That if the furnace of affliction produced such good effects, she should ever after have the better opinion of her chemistry."

A. D. 1601. Happy had it been for Essex, could he have conformed to that submission he knew so well how to describe; but his restless passions were too powerful to be guided by the rein of prudence. Though blessed with the society of an amiable and sensible wife, with whom he perused the writings of the ancients, so capable of healing the diseases of the mind by lessons equally solid and agreeable, he could not escape the illusions of ambition; he cherished a passion that preyed upon his repose. Elizabeth reflected not, that this haughty spirit, when driven to extremities, was capable of trampling under foot every species of duty, as well as the laws of his country. By pushing her precautions too far, she inflamed his resentment. He lost all hopes of her favour, forgot her former kindnesses, and flew to revenge. He imprudently followed the interested counsels of some needy friends who lived upon his bounty, and determined to have recourse to violent measures. To increase the number of his partizans, he paid his court to the catholics, and secretly solicited the king of Scotland's assistance. He acquainted him, "that whatever appearances the English court affected, a resolution was formed to place the Infanta of Spain on the throne of England; that to facilitate this design, all places of power, all posts of importance, were in the hands of those who were sworn enemies to the Stuart family; the lord high-admiral had the command of the navy and army; Buckhurst was at the head of the treasury; Cobham was warden of the cinque ports; Cecil lord-lieutenant of the north; Raleigh governor of the islands of Guernsey and Jersey; and Carew president of Munster; places very favourable for landing the Infanta." He added, "that the queen's understanding was so greatly impaired, that she was incapable of acting for herself, and was entirely guided by her ministers; that it was therefore absolutely necessary for him to act openly against this conspiracy; by sending ambassadors immediately to the English court, to demand a public declaration of his title to the succession, and the removal of his enemies; all creatures and pensioners of Spain, from the court and council."

But Essex placed his chief dependence for support on the puritans, whose manners he now entirely adopted. The most celebrated preachers of that sect resorted to his house, which now became a kind of pulpit, where the fervours of fanaticism constantly discharged themselves. The genius of the age was so entirely devoted to these rhapsodies, that the language of the reformation had more attractions for the people than pleasure itself: nothing more effectually ingratiated an ambitious leader with the public than these religious entertainments. The ambitious Essex spared not the queen in his discourses; he represented her as an old woman, whose temper was as crooked as her person. Elizabeth was informed of these liberties, which highly incensed her against him. He could not have attacked her in a more tender part. Elizabeth was always fond of flattery, and loved to be complimented on her beauty; nor could either her own good sense, or old age itself, cure her of this preposterous infirmity.

Essex had now formed a select council of male-contents, consisting of the earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Sir Christopher Blount, Sir John Davis, and John Littleton of Frankel. The rest of his friends, according to a list he produced at Drury-house, the usual place of their meeting, consisted of one hundred and twenty of the first noblemen and gentlemen in the kingdom. Here all their plans were laid, and all their resolutions formed. Among other criminal projects debated in this assembly, was that of the most proper method of taking up arms; and it was at last agreed, that the first attack should be made upon the palace; that Sir Christopher Blount, at the head of a choice detachment, should take possession of the gates; that Davis should seize the hall; Danvers the guard and presence-chamber; and that Essex, attended by a select number of his partizans, should rush in from the Meuse, oblige the queen to remove his enemies, assemble a parliament, and settle a new plan of government.

Elizabeth was informed of all these resolutions; and took the necessary precautions to render them abortive. Essex never doubted but the citizens of London, by whom he was greatly beloved; would take up arms at the first signal. He was, however, mistaken. The court had taken measures to prevent it; and when he appeared in the city, accompanied with about two hundred men, he found that his seditious exhortations had no effect. They gazed at him as he passed along the streets, but none took up arms in his defence. Disappointed of assistance, he returned to his own house, which was soon surrounded by a detachment of the guards commanded by the admiral. He at first determined to defend himself to the last extremity, and perish like a soldier with the sword in his hand, rather than by the axe of a base executioner. But he soon after abandoned this resolution; and, notwithstanding all his bravery, submitted at discretion.

Elizabeth, who had behaved on this occasion with the greatest tranquillity and presence of mind, soon gave orders for trying the most considerable of the prisoners. The earls of Essex and Southampton were arraigned on the nineteenth of February. The trial was soon finished: the crime was notorious. Far from making any defence, Essex gave himself up entirely to the sentiments of religion, which he had before politically affected, and not only acknowledged himself guilty, but also impeached his friends; a circumstance, which at other times, he would have considered as the most infamous baseness. The celebrated Sir Francis Bacon, is reproached with having pleaded on the trial against Essex his friend and benefactor, without being obliged to it by any office. Blemishes appear in the characters of the greatest men; Bacon was at this time ambitious of making his fortune.

It now remained with Elizabeth to pardon or execute her favourite nobleman, and she long balanced between justice and clemency. She felt all the force of an ill-extinguished passion, and if the earl had solicited her pardon, love would certainly have granted it. She considered this obstinacy as the consequence of contempt, and signed the warrant for his execution. He suffered in the court-yard of the Tower, pursuant to his own request, on the twenty-fifth of February. His behaviour in his last moments were conformable to his condition, penitent and resigned. He reflected not on his enemies, but prayed for the life of the queen and the prosperity of his country.

Thus fell Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He was descended from a royal lineage on the female side, and endowed with superior talents and heroic qualities. He was generous, liberal, and humane, a patron of learning, in which he himself held a considerable rank, a warm friend and an open enemy. His foibles were, vanity, ambition, and an impetuosity of temper which he could not restrain. He ruined himself for want of knowing how to enjoy good fortune with moderation. The people, by which he was too much beloved, were irritated by his death; and the queen, who was accused of cruelty, no longer heard the usual acclamations when she appeared in public.

Henry IV. of France, desirous of forming a close connection with Elizabeth, in order to establish a plan for effecting a perpetual balance of power in Europe, made a journey to Calais; and Elizabeth, in hopes of having a personal interview with a prince she so highly esteemed, repaired to Dover. Some considerations, however, prevented their meeting; but the queen expressing a desire of conferring on some business of importance with a minister in whom an entire confidence might be placed, Henry sent over Roissy, afterwards duke of Sully. What appears very extraordinary is, that both these princes, without communicating their sentiments to each other, had conceived the same design of humbling the house of Austria, and establishing a just equilibrium between the powers of Europe. It principally consisted in uniting the seventeen provinces of the Low Countries, into one republic. But the wounds which France had received during the civil wars were not yet healed; the attention of Henry was still necessary to recover the languishing state of his country. The execution of this design therefore was put off, and never after resumed.

The death of Philip II. did not put a period to the designs of the Spaniards for disturbing the peace of Elizabeth. The same councils still continued, and the same measures continued to be pursued. The preparations for an expedition against Ireland had been for some time finished, but suspended on account of the troubles that broke out in Spain. These having now subsided, Don John d'Aquila was sent at the head of a body of troops into that kingdom, and made religion a pretence for the enterprizes of ambition and rebellion. He assumed the title of "General of the Holy war, for the preservation of the faith in Ireland." Care had been taken to authorize these measures by bulls from Rome; and d'Aquila endeavoured to persuade the people, that a queen deprived of her authority by the pope, had no longer any right to the crown; that her subjects, absolved from their oaths of allegiance by the holy father, ought to take up arms against her, and drive her from a throne of which she ought to be considered as an usurper. He added, that the sole intention of his coming was to assist them in that religious undertaking, and to deliver them from the dominion of the devil. Mountjoy saw the gathering storm, and exerted all his abilities to break its force. The Irish shewed every where signs of a general insurrection, and the utmost vigour was necessary to prevent it. He immediately laid siege to Kinsale, which the Spaniards had taken immediately after their landing; but he had hardly began his operations before he received intelligence, that another body of two thousand Spaniards, under the command of Alphonso Ocampo were landed, and had taken possession of Baltimore and Berehaven. He found himself therefore obliged to detach Sir George Carew to oppose the progress of the enemy. Tyrone immediately advanced to the relief of Kinsale; but Mountjoy, having received information of his design, advanced to meet him at the head of part of his army, totally defeated the rebels, and took several of them prisoners. Tyrone himself escaped into Ulster, but was utterly incapable of giving the English any farther disturbance. The Spanish general now perceived that all resistance would be in vain, and immediately offered to surrender all the places held by the Spaniards in Ireland, and evacuate the kingdom. The conditions were accepted, and the Spaniards embarked for their own country. This defeat struck the rebels with terror. They saw the foreign forces on whom they so greatly depended, incapable of giving them any support, and despaired of being able to make head against the English.

But notwithstanding Mountjoy's success, the war in Ireland was very burdensome to the queen, and she was obliged to call a parliament in order to obtain supplies. No opposition was made to the request of her majesty; but the commons revived the great question with regard to monopolies, so destructive to trade and burdensome to the people. The small revenues of the crown being insufficient for the queen to confer favours or rewards on those that had served her faithfully, she supplied the defect by lavishing exclusive privileges; and those who were provided sold them to others. In consequence of these monopolies, almost every kind of merchandize was advanced at the pleasure of individuals; and that liberty which constitutes the very soul of commerce was no longer known. The effects were visible by a continual decline of trade; and the nation felt all the vexatious effects of avarice, supported by the royal authority. Nor was the abuse confined to the common necessities of life; salt, oil, vinegar, paper, cloths, iron, lead, skins, bottles, brushes, and many other articles; when this astonishing list was read in the house of commons, one of the members asked, with great vivacity, "Is not bread among the number?" And observing that the house seemed astonished at the question, "Yes, bread!" added he, if things continue on the same footing, we shall see that monopolized before the next parliament." But it appeared useless to complain, as absolute authority was then considered as the basis of the English government. The courtiers, accordingly, supported that tenet with all their eloquence. Bacon asserted that the royal prerogative ought neither to be contested nor examined; that it gave the sovereign the power of extending what was restrained by the laws, and of restraining what the laws had made free and open. Another observed, that it would be a frivolous attempt to bind up the queen's hands by act of parliament; because she was possessed of an unlimited dispensing power, and consequently could extricate herself self whenever she pleased; and even if the statute should contain a clause exclusive of that power, she could equally dispense with that clause, and consequently with the statute itself. One of the members went so far as to declare, that the Deity had given to princes the power that belonged to himself; and attempted to prove his assertion from a passage in the Psalms, "I have said that ye are Gods." But notwithstanding these strange positions of the courtiers, many of the members strongly opposed this alarming abuse; and the last parliament having presented a petition to the throne without effect, they proposed to pass a bill against all monopolies whatever. The queen perceived this resolution, and wisely avoided the blow. She was unwilling to refuse the royal assent to a bill, that however it might lessen the prerogative of the crown, could not fail of being very advantageous to her people. She therefore sent for the speaker, and ordered him to acquaint the house, that she would immediately suppress all such exclusive grants as were most burdensome to her subjects.

Struck with astonishment at the goodness and condescension of the queen, the joy of the commons was excessive. They had always been used to the tone of absolute authority, and haughty refusal, and could hardly contain themselves within the bounds of decency, at finding the royal prerogative at last given way to the interest of the nation. One of the members observed, that this message from the queen was a kind of gospel of glad tidings, and ought to be written in indelible characters on the tablets of the heart. They voted, that the speaker, at the head of eighty members, should return her majesty their humble thanks for this instance of parental regard. The speech delivered by the speaker on this occasion, was more proper to be addressed to the Supreme Being than an earthly monarch. So fulsome was the language of flattery! Nor did they wait till she had satisfied them with regard to the particular monopolies she meant to abolish, they immediately voted her four times the usual supply. An instance then without example. But they well knew the imperious disposition of the queen, and that by giving even the most distant hint of their being dissatisfied with her promise, would have forced her into a denial of their requests. Thus Elizabeth, by prudently receding in time from what was then considered as the right of the crown, maintained her dignity, and preserved the affections of her people. Her successors imitated not her example in this particular: they wanted her address as well as her power, to triumph over the principles of liberty.

A.D. 1602. The remaining events in the reign of Elizabeth are neither very numerous, nor very important. Exasperated at the Spaniards for having involved her in so many difficulties by fomenting the rebellion, and assisting the insurgents in Ireland, she resolved to find them sufficient employment at home. She accordingly ordered a squadron of nine ships to be fitted out, under the command of Sir Richard Leveson and Sir Richard Monson, with orders to sail on an expedition to the coast of Spain. This fleet left England early in the spring, and soon after part of the squadron fell in with the galleons loaded with treasure; but were not strong enough to attack them with any prospect of success. The other division also met with a fleet of very rich ships, and was, for the same reason, obliged to let them pursue their course unmolested. These disappointments induced the two admirals to join the little squadrons, and pursue the design of the expedition in company. For some time they met with no ships of the enemy, and it was determined, in order to prevent the expedition from being entirely fruitless, to attack the harbour of Coimbra in Portugal; where they were informed a rich carrack had taken shelter. The harbour was defended by a castle mounted with heavy pieces of cannon; eleven galleys were moored near the entrance, and the militia of the country, amounting to near twenty thousand men, appeared on the shore.

But all these indications of a powerful opposition was not sufficient to intimidate the English. They broke into the harbour, dismounted the guns of the castle, sunk, burnt, and put to flight the galleys, and made themselves masters of the carrack. With this prize they returned to England, where her loading was valued at near a million of ducats; a very sensible loss to the Spaniards, and a still more considerable supply to Elizabeth.

Though the catholic religion was not tolerated in England, great numbers of people still professed the tenets of Rome; the kingdom was full of priests of that persuasion; and a very rancorous quarrel now broke out between the jesuits and the secular clergy, on the following occasion: one Blackwell, a person entirely devoted to the interest of the jesuits, had been placed over these seculars as their superior. Not content with exercising the common jurisdiction, he oppressed them in the most cruel manner; and when they appealed to the pope for redress, the superior represented them as schismatics and heretics. The most bitter invectives were published by both parties, and the whole body of the catholic clergy seemed to be engaged in this furious contest. Whether the whole affair was serious, or a scheme to lull the government into a fatal security, while the Spaniards struck some decisive blow, is now impossible to be known; but it is certain that the bishop of London, from political motives, fomented this division, which at last rose to such a height, that the council of state thought proper to interpose their authority; and perceiving that their disputes were incompatible with the peace of the nation, commanded them all to depart the kingdom immediately.

During these transactions lord Mountjoy improved so well his late victory in Ireland, that Tyrone and his friends were soon reduced to the greatest distress; and many of them, after concealing themselves in woods and morasses; where they lived rather like beasts than men, thought proper to abandon their retreats, and submit to the mercy of the English government. They were received with kindness, and the terms imposed upon them were so mild and generous, that Tyrone himself, seeing all hopes either of succeeding in escaping to the continent, were vanished, applied, in the most abject manner, both to the queen herself and the governor, for pardon. The queen was long resolved not to shew the least favour to that ferocious and perfidious rebel, but being continually importuned by her council, who represented the prodigious expence she had been at, in maintaining an army in Ireland to pursue the rebels, and that by shewing clemency to the great leader in every insurrection, she would infallibly restore tranquillity to that distressed kingdom, and introduce a proper legislation among the people; she was at last prevailed upon to recede from her resolution. She signed his pardon, and sent it to Mountjoy; sacrificing her resentment to the peace of her subjects, who had so long felt all the dreadful effects of civil discord.

A.D. 1603. The terms to which the lord-deputy was restrained were, however, thought so severe by the council, that they apprehended Tyrone would never submit to them. Had that furious leader perceived even the smallest prospect of supporting himself against the English, there is not the least doubt but he would have rejected the conditions with disdain; but he was deprived of every resource, and enjoyed only the wretched alternative of accepting the queen's pardon on her own terms, or perish with hunger. He chose the former, and on the thirteenth of March, repaired to Mellefont; where he presented himself upon his knees before the lord-deputy, and in that submissive posture received his pardon. O'Rourke, another active chief in the late insurrections surrendered about a month after Tyrone; and thus that dreadful rebellion which had raged in Ireland with the utmost violence during eight years, and had cost the queen near four hundred thousand pounds annually, was entirely suppressed; the whole kingdom was reduced to a state of subjection, and tasted the pleasures attendant on tranquillity.

Elizabeth was not long capable of enjoying the satisfaction of seeing this considerable part of her dominions in a state of peace. She had, for some time, fallen into a state of melancholy, was observed to be continually in tears, and to labour under some extraordinary affliction. She had always been particularly careful of her health, but now obstinately refused all the remedies prescribed by her physicians. Her council used every method in their power to prevail upon her to recede from this fatal resolution, but in vain. The archbishop of Canterbury, and secretary Cecil, begged her, on their knees, to take what was necessary for her sustenance and relief; but she refused their request, and, in an angry tone of voice, desired they would leave off their importunities, and suffer her to die in quiet.

Various opinions have been formed with regard to the cause of this profound melancholy: some ascribed it to her repentance for having granted a pardon to Tyrone; others to the chagrin of seeing her courtiers turn their eyes upon the king of Scotland as the presumptive heir to the English crown, and their shewing dispositions to neglect her at a time when she laboured under the debilities of age and infirmities; while others attributed it to her passion for Essex, which a very remarkable incident had lately revived. After his return from his expedition to Cadiz, she made him a present of a ring, which she desired him to keep as the pledge of her affection; at the same time assuring him, that whatever disgrace might attend him, or whatever prejudices she might entertain against his conduct, yet, on sight of that precious pledge, she would recollect her former tenderness, be ready to give him a favourable hearing, and to listen candidly to his apology. Essex, notwithstanding all his misfortunes, preserved this pledge of her majesty's affection; and, when under sentence of death, resolved to try the experiment. He accordingly prayed the counts of Nottingham to carry the ring to Elizabeth; but the earl, her husband, the capital enemy of Essex, would not suffer her to execute the commission. The queen waited for this ring with the most passionate anxiety, and construed her not receiving it as a mark of contempt. Exasperated at what she considered as the highest affront, she signed the warrant for his execution. Some time after, the counts being seized with a violent illness, was stung with the deepest remorse for her conduct; and having obtained a visit from the queen, she revealed the fatal secret. Astonished at this alarming confession, Elizabeth burst into the most violent passion of grief and rage. She struck the dying counts in her bed, telling her, "That God might pardon her, but she never could." This remarkable fact has been rejected by many historians as romantic; but from the proofs collected by Dr. Birch, in his memoirs of this princess, the truth of it seems to be sufficiently established.

From that moment Elizabeth abandoned herself to the deepest and most incurable melancholy, without discovering the cause which preyed upon her spirits. A miserable languor soon reduced her to the utmost extremity, and it was visible to all about her that her end was approaching. The council had frequent meetings, and seriously deliberated on the necessity of fixing the succession. The counsellors themselves were in general firmly attached to James; but they were fearful of the consequences that might result from the intrigues of the catholic and puritan factions; and therefore reasonably concluded, that Elizabeth's own declaration in favour of the Scottish monarch would greatly tend to strengthen his title. The lord high admiral declared, that when she was first seized with this dreadful distemper, she had said the following words to him in private, "My throne has always been filled by a succession of princes, and ought only to go to my next heir." This declaration was not considered as sufficiently explicit; and it was thought proper, that the lord high-admiral, the lord keeper, and secretary Cecil, should, in the name of the whole council, intreat the queen to reveal her intention with regard to the person she wished to wear her crown. They found her on the very brink of eternity, and almost speechless; but she had strength sufficient to repeat the substance of her former declaration to the lord high-admiral, "that she herself had filled a royal throne, and desired to have a royal successor." Cecil thought that even this declaration was not sufficiently explicit, and requested her to make a farther explanation. "I desire (said she) that a king should succeed me; and who should that king be, but my nearest kinsman, the king of Scotland?" This declaration being made, the archbishop of Canterbury desired her to put her whole trust in the Almighty, and fix her thoughts on that great and merciful Being, who alone could support her in the hour of death. She answered, that she did put her whole trust in him, nor had her thoughts in the least wandered from him. Soon after, her voice failed, and she fell into a lethargic slumber, which continued some hours; and she expired without one struggle, pang, or convulsion, in the seventieth year of her age, and the forty-fifth of her reign.

The character of Elizabeth has been often drawn; both by the pens of adulation and satire. But notwithstanding all her faults, and all her vices, she will always be ranked, by the candid and judicious, among the greatest monarchs in Europe. Her vigour, her constancy, her indefatigable vigilance, her heroic fortitude in danger, her unavaricious œconomy, her penetration, and address in difficulties, add a lustre to her reputation that all the efforts of her enemies have never been able to tarnish; they were hardly ever equalled, perhaps never surpassed by any monarch, ancient or modern. At the same time, the meanness of vanity, the weakness of love, the transports of jealousy and anger, the artifices of duplicity, and the thirst of despotism, have exposed her memory to very just reproaches. But it should be remembered, that in the midst of all her attempts to become arbitrary, she still secured the affections of her people. She even, on many occasions, gave them proofs of her confidence. "I will never believe any thing of them (said she) that parents will not believe of their children." In a word, her private character is very exceptionable, but her princely qualities render her the object of undisputed applause.

Those who are desirous of forming an adequate idea of the ancient constitution of England, would do well to study the reign of Elizabeth, as there remain monuments sufficiently numerous to ascertain the most noted acts of her administration. At the same time, the great popularity she always enjoyed, sufficiently demonstrates, that she did not infringe the established liberties of the people. During the reign of the Tudors, the principles of despotism took deep root in the kingdom. Elizabeth found these principles confirmed when she ascended the throne; and though she carried them to their full extent, she was better beloved by her subjects than any of her predecessors. The constitution was swallowed up by the prerogative, and every attempt against it was termed rebellion. Arbitrary courts of justice, established and maintained by that prerogative, were the terrible supports of despotism. The star-chamber, a court which every true Englishman now reflects upon with horror, extended its jurisdiction to all manner of offences, contempts, and disorders, not cognizable by the common law. Penalties, fines, imprisonment, or corporal punishment, were there inflicted at discretion. The judges were mere dependants upon the court, because they were removable at pleasure. They only gave their opinions when the sovereign was present, he being then the only judge. The court of high commission was equally formidable to the subject, and equally destructive to liberty. Its principal object was that of heresy, a subject on which so many rash judgments are continually formed. The manner of proceeding, and the sentences promulgated mulgated against even opinions which were not justly punishable, rendered it a powerful instrument of tyranny. The martial law was not only exercised on military people, but on all without distinction, in cases of insurrection and public disorder: it was even extended to those who brought bulls from Rome, foreign libels, or prohibited books. Nothing could be more arbitrary than that rigorous law; nothing more repugnant to the principles of genuine justice. In a word, Elizabeth wanted no power but that of imposing taxes; and even that her prerogative supplied, by granting monopolies, requiring forced loans and free gifts, by purveyance, embargoes on merchandize, and many other burthenome expedients. The parliament, indeed, assumed the legislative power, but the crown, in fact, exercised it, by edicts and proclamations. At the same time, even the laws themselves were rendered uncertain, by virtue of the dispensing power of the sovereign. We may judge of the despotic authority of Elizabeth by the following curious anecdote preserved by several of our historians. Dr. Haywarde having dedicated an historical performance to Essex during the time of that nobleman's disgrace, the queen was so highly offended at his presumption, that she enquired of Bacon, whether the book contained any thing that might impeach the author of high-treason? "I find nothing of that," replied the sage, "but there is sufficient matter to convict him of felony." "Which are the passages?" asked the queen hastily. "The author" said Bacon, "is guilty of theft, having translated many passages from Cornelius Tacitus, and inserted them in his text." This answer did not satisfy the queen; she pretended that the person who had put his name to the performance was not the writer; and added, that she would have him racked, in order to oblige him to produce the real author. "No, madam," answered Bacon, "it is not the writer but the style that ought to be put to the torture. Let the doctor have pen, ink, paper, and books, and let him be enjoined to continue the story; and I will undertake, on comparing the style, to determine whether he is the real author or not." Thus an innocent man of letters would have been put to the torture, for no other crime than that of having given to Essex, that munificent patron of the learned, a public testimony of his respect, had not the wit and address of Bacon prevented it.

The absolute authority of the crown was not, however, without its advantages, both in maintaining the internal tranquillity of the kingdom, and in giving vigour to the councils, and expedition to the business abroad. But, at the same time, it was found, by melancholy experience, that arbitrary power is by no means so well calculated as regular justice to maintain good order, and restrain licentiousness among the people.

Before we conclude these observations on the reign of Elizabeth, it is but justice to say something with regard to her œconomy, in which she surpassed most of the English princes. Her ordinary revenue did not exceed five hundred thousand pounds a year. During the whole course of her reign, she received no more from parliament than twenty subsidies, and thirty-nine fifteenths. It is not easy to compute the exact value of these subsidies, because they were always decreasing: they fell, during the course of this reign, from one hundred and eighty-two thousand pounds sterling, to eighty thousand. The war with Spain cost, in two years, one million three hundred thousand pounds; and that in Ireland, during ten years, more than three millions. It is astonishing how Elizabeth could undertake and execute such great things with such small resources. The foreign trade of England considerably increased; but monopolies and exclusive privileges greatly injured the inland trade of the kingdom. The navy, though considerably augmented, was very weak in comparison of what it became afterwards. Before the reign of this princess, it was usual for the monarchs of England to have recourse to the city of Antwerp for voluntary loans; but their credit was so low, that, besides the exorbitant interest of ten or twelve per cent. they were obliged to make the city of London join in the security. Sir Thomas Gresham, one of the greatest and most enterprising merchants of that age, engaged the company of merchant-adventurers to grant a loan to the queen, and the money was regularly paid. This established her credit in the city, and she was no longer obliged to have recourse to foreigners for assistance. In the year 1660, the queen granted the first charter to the East-India Company.

The state of the English manufactures was very low at this period, and foreign wares of almost all kinds were preferred. The persecutions in France and the Low Countries afterwards drove a great number of foreigners into England; and, by their assistance, both the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom were greatly improved. It was then that Sir Thomas Gresham built, at his own expence, the magnificent fabric of the Exchange, for the reception of merchants. The queen, highly pleased with his public spirit, visited the structure, and gave it the appellation of the Royal Exchange.

A remarkable revolution in the manners of the people happened during this reign, but it by no means contributed to augment the power of the crown. The old hospitality of the nobility every day declined, and even their houses were far less numerous. The queen, by proclamation, obliged them to observe a restriction in that article, and from that moment their influence declined. They had fewer retainers, and, consequently, were less able to form plots and conspiracies. A taste for luxury prevailed among them, by which their fortunes were soon impaired; while the merchant and mechanic were enriched at their expence and prodigality. In consequence of this, the towns became more populous; and the country people, by means of agriculture, acquired an independency, which rescued them from the yoke of the nobility. The barons were now no longer formidable to the crown; but what it gained on one hand, it lost on the other. The commons grew more jealous of their privileges: they encroached upon the prerogative, and gave, at last a mortal blow to monarchy. We shall see how this was effected in the subsequent reigns of the Stuarts.

The English began early to cultivate maritime affairs, and made discoveries in various parts of the world. In the year 1536, Henry VIII. encouraged a society of merchants to send two ships, in order to make discoveries in the northern parts of America, where it was hoped a passage to India might be found. The attempt proved abortive with regard to the principal intention, but it laid the foundation of that beneficial fishery which the English still carry on at Newfoundland.

Edward VI. was very desirous of making discoveries in the north-east parts of Europe; and encouraged a company of English merchants to send Sir Hugh Willoughby with three ships, in order to open a new passage to Russia by the northern ocean, and, if possible, to pursue their course to China. The attempt proved unfortunate to the commander in chief, who being obliged, by the sudden approach of winter, to take shelter in an obscure harbour of Russian Lapland, was there, with his whole crew, frozen to death. One of the ships, commanded by Richard Chancellor, was more fortunate, by reaching the White Sea, on the coast of Russia. Chancellor landed at the abbey of St. Nicholas, near Archangel, in order to wait of the Czar John Basilowitz, then engaged in the Livonian war. At this time the Russians had neither harbours nor shipping on the shores of the Baltic; their rich furs, hemp, &c. were carried into Livonia, and thence distributed to the different parts of Europe. Chancellor reached the Czar's court at Moscow, and was kindly received by the emperor; who, desirous of opening a trade from one of his own ports with the English, granted the merchants of that kingdom very extensive privileges.

The trade to Turkey was begun in 1583, and a company established for carrying it on with spirit and advantage. Before that time, the emperor of the Turks had always considered England as a province of France. The power and reputation of Elizabeth destroyed this erroneous opinion: he gave the English a kind reception, and granted them even larger privileges than those he had before given to the French.

Notwithstanding the attempt made in 1536 for finding a north-west passage to India proved abortive, the English were not discouraged. Sir Martin Forbisher made a second attempt, and penetrated much farther than any European before his time. He discovered the Streight which still bears his name; and made so many flattering discoveries, that though he succeeded not in his principal design, a second voyage was attempted some years after, but no north-west passage could be found.

The first attempt of the English for establishing a trade to the coast of Guinea was made by Mr. John Hawkins, about the year 1562. He purchased a considerable number of negroes in Guinea, and carried them to Hispaniola, where he disposed of his slaves and English merchandize, and loaded his vessels with hides, sugar, and ginger; commodities that found a quick sale in England, and rendered the voyage very lucrative to the merchants.

Two attempts were made, during the reign of Elizabeth, for settling colonies in America, and both proved abortive. One was attempted by Sir Humphry Gilbert in Newfoundland, and the other by Sir Walter Raleigh in Virginia. Raleigh procured a charter from the queen in 1584: but notwithstanding all the attempts of that great man, who seemed born for making discoveries, he succeeded not in his design; all the settlements in America owe their establishments to later times.

Soon after the revival of learning in Europe, it was cultivated with attention by the princes and nobility of England. Henry VIII. was considered as one of the most learned persons of his time. Queen Catherine Parr translated a very useful treatise into English in the beginning of the reign of Edward VI. Lady Jane Gray, considering her age, her sex, and her station, may be considered as a prodigy of learning. She was familiarly acquainted with the writings of the ancients, and caught their noble sentiments at a very early age. Elizabeth wrote and translated several books, and was familiarly acquainted both with the Greek and Latin languages. But cardinal Wolsey may be considered as the father of revived learning in England. Wolsey had a soul exquisitely susceptible of the glory arising from a patronage that gives a surer immortality than power or titles can communicate. The fame of Leo X. who restored the arts in Italy, excited his emulation; he was desirous of disseminating the seeds of literature in his native country. The learning of the English was then useless and heavy; they were totally strangers to taste. Wolsey saw this, and had the virtue to attempt the improvement of the one, and the introduction of the other. He was himself well acquainted with many branches of learning, as well as master of all the qualities of a fine gentleman and a polite courtier. But it was not enough for Wolsey to confine his love of learning and the muses to his own example and munificence, without planting those seminaries which, in succeeding ages, were productive of many of the noblest fruits of study. He searched for men of genius and letters, as the lord of the soil does for a mine of treasure. His house, like Cicero's Tusculanum, was the retreat of the learned. Whenever he found a foreigner celebrated for his literary acquisitions, he settled on him a handsome salary, and invited him to England. He intended to procure copies of all the MSS. in the Vatican for his college at Oxford; which, if finished according to his plan, would have been the noblest foundation in the world.

Henry Howard, earl of Surry, was one of the greatest ornaments in the court of Henry VIII. He was famous for the tenderness and elegance of his poetry, in which he excelled all the writers of his time. His great merit excited the jealousy of Henry; and, after the formality of a trial, he was condemned and executed for high-treason on the nineteenth of January, 1547.

Archbishop Warcham shone as a divine, a lawyer, and a statesman; but was at last supplanted in the king's favour by Wolsey. Erasmus makes honourable mention of this prelate, whom he esteemed a perfect model of the episcopal character. He died on the 23d of August 1532.

Archbishop Cranmer was one of the most learned persons of his age, and has been justly esteemed one of the chief ornaments of our church and nation. He was in high esteem with Henry VIII. for his learning, his sincerity, his prudence, and his moderation. But he fell a sacrifice to the bigotted fury of queen Mary, on the 21st of March, 1556.

Cuthbert Tunstall, bishop of Durham, was a polite scholar, and one of the most perfect characters of his age. The celebrated Erasmus, one of whose excellences consisted in doing justice to the merit of his friends, tells us, that he was comparable to any of the ancients.

John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, was one of those great men that assisted in the revival of learning in England. No higher testimony need be given of the merit of Collet, than his great intimacy with Erasmus. There was a remarkable similitude of manners, of studies, and of sentiments in religion, between these illustrious men, who ventured to withdraw the veil of ignorance and superstition, and expose them, in their genuine colours, to the eyes of the world; and to prepare the minds of the English for that reformation in religion, and the restoration of learning, which soon after followed. Collet, Lynacre, Lilly, Grocyn, and Latimer, were the first that revived the literature of the ancients in England. He founded St. Paul's school, and died in 1519.

William Tindale, canon of Christ-church, Oxford, and deservedly styled the English apostle, was the first that translated the New Testament into English from the Greek. This work appeared in 1526; and three or four years after, he published an English translation of the Pentateuch from the original Hebrew, and intended to have gone through with the whole: but his attempt provoked the catholic clergy, and he was burnt for heresy at Wilford, near Brussels, in 1536.

Sir Thomas More was a great master of the elegant learning of the ancients. His Utopia, a kind of political romance, which gained him the highest reputation as an author, is an idea of a perfect republic, in an island supposed to be newly discovered in America. He was beheaded, for denying the king's supremacy, on the sixth of July, 1535.

Sir Thomas Smith, Sir John Cheke, and Roger Ascham, tutor to queen Elizabeth, were the politest scholars of their time in the university of Cambridge. Among other useful attempts for the improvement of learning, they introduced the true pronunciation of the Greek in that seat of the muses.

Richard Hooker, some time master of the Temple, and afterwards rector of Bishop's Bourn, in Kent, was one of the most celebrated writers of the age in which he lived. His "Ecclesiastical Polity", which is a defence of the government of the English church against the cavils of the dissenters, is written with a classic simplicity, and esteemed one of the completest works, both for style and argument, that ever appeared in the English language. Queen Elizabeth used to call him "The judicious Hooker", an epithet by which he is still distinguished. He died on the second of November, 1600.

Sir Philip Sidney was the delight and admiration of the court of Elizabeth. He was the ornament of the university; and appeared with equal advantage in a field of battle; at a tournament; in a private conversation among his friends, or in a public character as an ambassador. His talents were equally adapted to prose or verse, to original composition or translation. His Arcadia was not only admired for its novelty, but continued to be read longer than such compositions generally are, and has passed through fourteen editions. He died the sixteenth of October, 1586.

John Stow was one of the most industrious antiquaries this kingdom has produced. He was bred a taylor, but quitted his employment to pursue his beloved study of the history and antiquities of England, to which he had an invincible propensity. His principal works are his "Survey of London", his "Additions to Hollinghed's Chronicle", and his "Annals". The folio volume, commonly called "Stow's Chronicle", was compiled from his papers after his decease. He died the fifth of April, 1605.

Sir Thomas Bodley deserves to be mentioned here, as a man of letters; but much more for the ample provision he has made for literature, by the library he founded at Oxford, and in which he stands unrivalled. In 1599, he opened his library, a mausoleum which will perpetuate his memory as long as books themselves endure. He died the twenty-eight of January, 1612.

John Gertarde, a surgeon of London, was the greatest English botanist of that age. He published his herbal in 1597, which has, ever since its first appearance, been considered as a very useful work.

Edmund Spenser, the celebrated author of the "Fairy Queen", was the father of the English heroic poem, and of true pastoral poetry in this island. He stands distinguished from almost all other poets, by that faculty by which a poet is distinguished from other writers, namely, invention; and excelled all his cotemporaries in harmonious versification. The stanza of Spenser, and the old words which constantly occur, contribute to give that great poet an air of peculiarity; and hence all the imitations of him resemble the original. But Parnassus proved a very barren soil to Spenser. Elizabeth was far from having a just sense of his merit. After the death of Sir Philip Sidney, he languished without a patron, and died, in want of bread, in 1599.

Besides the writers already enumerated, many others flourished during this period of history. John Rogers, a clergyman of Lancashire, translated the Bible into English, with notes. Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins translated the Psalms into metre, as we still hear them sung in many of our churches. John Leiland, the famous antiquarian, flourished in this period. Fairfax translated Tasso with ease and elegance; and Harrington, Ariosto with tolerable accuracy.

Several discoveries, some of them very useful to this kingdom, were made during this period of history. One Owen is noted, as being the first who cast brass cannon in England, some specimens of which are said to be still in the Tower of London. They were cast about the year 1536. Musquets, or hand-guns, were introduced in the year 1521. These superseded the practice of bows and arrows, which were soon after laid aside.

About the year 1535, glasses were first manufactured in England: the finer sort of it was made in Crutched-Friars, London; and the flint glass, little inferior to that of Venice, at the Savoy-house in the Strand.

The first manufacture of knives in England was begun in 1563, by Thomas Matthews, on Fleet-bridge, London. Before that time, they were imported from Germany; but the art was soon improv'd by the English, and large quantities were soon after exported to different parts of the world.

In the year 1589, William Lee, M. A. of St. John's college, Cambridge, invented an engine, or steel-loom, called the Stocking-frame, for knitting or weaving of stockings. This was not above twenty years after the English had been taught the art of knitting them with wires or needles, by the Spaniards. Mr. Lee's invention has been of great advantage to the stocking manufacture, by enabling the English to export vast quantities of all kinds to foreign countries.

We have the best authority for fixing the first manufacturing of sail-cloth in England to the year 1599, being the preamble of an act made for encouraging that useful manufacture. Before that time it was imported from France and Germany.

About the same time, that useful instrument, the telescope, was discovered by one Janssen, a spectacle-maker at Middleburgh, in Zealand. He knew not, however, the theory, on which the instrument depended, and therefore never made them of any considerable length: eighteen inches was the utmost extent of his instruments. Galileo, astronomer to the grand duke of Tuscany, was the artist that perfected the discovery; and rendered it of the greatest service in astronomical observations; and hence the telescope has acquired the name of Galileo's tube.

The progress made in the mathematical arts was chiefly confined to the studies of Dee, and one or two more, who were patronized by Burleigh.

B O O K XI.

From the beginning of the reign of James I. to the restoration of Charles II.

J A M E S I.

A.D. 1603. THE heirs male of the house of Tudor failing, James, king of Scotland, great-grandson of Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII. had an incontestible right to the crown of England. The will of Henry VIII. had, indeed, set aside the claim of that family; but the testament was now odious to the nation, and Elizabeth had named James as her successor. The whole nation appeared greatly interested in favour of their new monarch, he was received in the capital with the greatest rejoicings, and crowned at Westminster on Monday the twenty-fifth of July, by Whitgift, archbishop of Canterbury, amidst the acclamations of the people. But James, though far from disliking the adulation of his subjects, hated the bustle of a mixed multitude; he was much fonder of ease and tranquillity.

He was not, however, insensible to their affections; and began his reign with lavishing a profusion of titles on his courtiers; no less than two hundred and thirty-seven persons received the honour of knighthood, within six weeks after his ascending the English throne. By so indiscriminate a method of bestow-favours, he imprudently lessened the rewards of merit. Titles were no longer marks of distinction; and being distributed without choice or deliberation, they were considered rather as proofs of the facility and good nature of the prince, than the marks of any determined friendship and esteem. To ridicule this imprudent manner of lavishing titles, a pasquinade was affixed to the gate of St. Paul's, advertising that an artist had discovered the best method of retaining, in weak memories, the names of the new nobility.

The greater part of these honours were conferred upon the Scots, at which the English were offended, and it might have occasioned national quarrels, had not James prudently resolved to employ only Englishmen in the administration. Among these secretary Cecil, created successively lord Effendon, viscount Cranborne, and earl of Salisbury, was always regarded as prime minister and chief counsellor. He was the son of the famous Burleigh, whose name, it was natural to suppose, must be odious to James, as the declared enemy of his mother, and the chief cause of her tragical catastrophe; but Cecil had taken care to make his peace with James before the death of Elizabeth. Skilled in the arts of cunning and duplicity, he had for some time before the queen's decease, kept up a correspondence with James, and informed him of every thing transacted in the English council that regarded his interest. Sir Walter Raleigh, lord Grey, and lord Cobham, who had not taken the wise precautions of Cecil, and had been at the head of the faction which brought the earl of Essex to the scaffold, immediately felt the effects of the new monarch's prejudice, and were dismissed from their employments.

The eyes of all the sovereigns of Europe were fixed in anxious expectations upon James, from the moment of his ascending the English throne; they beheld in him the son of a prince who died a martyr to the cause of popery, and who had suffered a long series of troubles in a kingdom whither she had fled for protection. The hopes of the catholics and the fears of the protestants were equally excited on this occasion; and ambassadors from almost all the princes and states of Christendom soon appeared at the English court, in order to compliment the king on his new acquired dignity, and to conclude with him new treaties and alliances. Besides envoys from Venice, Denmark, and the Palatinate, Henry Frederick of Nassau, assisted by the famous pensionary Barnevelt, represented the states of the United Provinces; Aremborg was sent by the archduke Albert, and Taxis was soon expected from Spain.

Henry IV. of France could not reflect, without concern, that James, in one part of his life, had entered into negotiations with Spain, and thought he had every thing to dread from such an union, especially if James, whose real disposition was as yet unknown, should discover an enterprising genius. The marquis of Rosny, afterwards the famous duke of Sully, a minister worthy of Henry IV. was charged with the affairs of France at the English court. That able statesman proposed a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the northern crowns, in order to invade the territories of the house of Austria on every side, and humble the exorbitant power of that ambitious family. But the genius of the English monarch was little adapted to such vast enterprizes; the love of peace was his ruling passion, and Rosny found James to be master of so much art and dissimulation, that all his address was insufficient to discover the real intentions of the English monarch. He refused to make any declaration but in general terms, of his sincere desire of living in friendship with France. A solemn conference was, however, at last held, and it was agreed that the Dutch should have the liberty of levying forces both in France and England; that the two monarchs should supply that republic with the sum of one million four hundred thousand livres a year for the maintenance of their forces; that the whole sum should be advanced by the king of France, but that one third of it should be deducted to discharge a debt due from that monarch to Elizabeth; and that if the Spaniards attacked either the territories of France or England, the contracting princes should assist each other, Henry with a force of ten thousand, and James with that of six thousand men.

The tranquillity which reigned in England was now disturbed by a conspiracy said to have been formed in the kingdom against the government. The design was to place Arabella Stuart, a near relation of James, and descended equally with him from Henry VII. on the English throne. She had been long a state prisoner in the Tower, and possibly never knew that the least design was formed for her liberty. Indeed the whole conspiracy is still a mystery; time itself has afforded no clue that will help us to unravel it. But however that be, Sir Walter Raleigh, with his friends the lords Cobham and Grey, Sir Griffith Markham, Sir Edward Parham, Sir George Brooke, Bartholomew Brooksby, and Anthony Cappely, with two priests, Watson and Clarke, were sent to prison. The trial of these conspirators, it indeed any conspiracy spiracy ever existed, was imperfect and confused; no signs of guilt appeared; no regular plot had been formed. A few passionate words, flowing from the disappointed ambition of the dismissed courtiers, composed perhaps their whole crime. Sir Edward Coke, the celebrated lawyer, who managed the prosecution on the part of the crown, used the most violent and opprobrious terms on this occasion. He called Raleigh a traitor, a monster, a viper, a spider of hell; terms that sufficiently point out the manners of the age, and will for ever throw a stain on the character of that famous pleader. Raleigh, however, defended himself with surprizing temper, eloquence, and courage; but notwithstanding all the force of his arguments, he was found guilty by his jury, contrary to all law and the principles of equity. The two priests were executed, Cobham, Grey and Markham were pardoned, after they had laid their heads upon the block. Raleigh also was reprieved, but not pardoned, and he continued many years after in confinement.

Secure from this danger, James turned his thoughts towards secular controversies, of which he was much fonder than of the duties of a king. The severities of Elizabeth had restrained the partizans of the Roman church; but the fanaticism of the puritans was not to be subdued. These fiery disciplinarians expected better treatment under a prince who had been trained up by their own sect in Scotland. But James was too well acquainted with their independent principles, was too jealous of his new authority, and too much a friend to pleasure, to shew them any favour in a country where they were not the predominant party. He was, however, very willing that a conference should be held at Hampton-court, where he himself undertook to preside in person.

A. D. 1604. The conference was opened on the fourteenth of January, and James, in quality of president, displayed his uncommon talents in disputation. They disputed not upon doctrine, the proper object of controversy, but on simple ceremonies, the sign of the cross in baptism, the wedding-ring, the surplice, and the bowing at the name of Jesus; these were the topics debated before this assembly, and these were the mighty particulars that had excited so violent a misunderstanding between the two parties, and set the whole nation in a flame. Great expectations were formed by the leaders of both parties on the issue of this debate; but surely they must have been totally unacquainted with the dictates of the human heart, who could expect that a candid indifference, and a sincere search after truth, would be observed in a theological enquiry, so long and warmly debated in the kingdom. It must, however, be owned, that the king from the first opening the controversy, was strongly biased in favour of the episcopal party; he frequently said, with a decisive tone of voice, "No bishop, no king;" and the prime observed, that his majesty, doubtless, spoke by the Spirit of God. The alteration of some few passages in the liturgy were the only fruit of this conference. Each party retained their former prejudices, increased by the animosity of a public disputation.

James was persuaded that in supporting the episcopalians, he supported his own prerogative. They admitted a series of subordination, and acknowledged the king as supreme head of the church; whereas the dissenters were infected with the levelling principles, and considered all men as equal. The love of liberty had taken considerable root in Europe, especially in England, where it was carefully nourished by the puritan party. This is, with great probability, attributed to the taste that now prevailed for letters, which enlarged at once the ideas and the views of men. The works of the ancients, and the history of so many celebrated commonwealths, could not fail of cherishing a republican spirit, in proportion as they cultivated the understanding.

The parliament, whose meeting had been deferred on account of the plague, which raged so dreadfully in London, that no less than thirty thousand persons died of it in one year, assembled on the nineteenth of March, when James opened the session with a speech from the throne. Though few productions of that age surpassed this speech, either in style or matter, yet it is destitute of that majestic reserve, which should always be observed by a king in his addresses to the great council of the nation. The general propositions are, however, just, and the following passage demands the applause of every lover of English liberty. "When I have done all that I can do for you, I do nothing but what I am bound to do, and am accountable to God should I do the contrary; for I acknowledge that the most essential difference between a lawful king and an usurping tyrant, consists in this; that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant thinks that his kingdom and people are only ordained for the gratification of his desires, and unreasonable appetites, the righteous and just king, on the contrary, acknowledges, that he himself is only ordained for promoting the wealth and prosperity of his people; and that his greatest and principal happiness must consist in their prosperity. If you are rich I cannot be poor; if you are happy I cannot be unfortunate: and I protest that your welfare shall be the constant object of my study and attention. That I am a servant is most true; and that as I am head and governor of all the people in my dominions, considering them in number, and in different ranks; so, if we will take the people as one body and mass, then as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head, so must a righteous king acknowledge himself to be ordained for his people, and not his people for him: For though a king and people are relative, yet can he be no king if he is destitute of subjects; but there are many people in the world, that are without a king. I shall therefore never be ashamed to confess it my principal honour to be the great servant of the commonwealth, and ever think the prosperity thereof to be my greatest felicity." The rest of the speech was calculated to effect an union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; and in expressing his favourable intentions towards the Roman catholic party, he even dropped some severe expressions against the puritans.

This speech produced not the desired effect. The protestants were alarmed at the advances made towards the catholics, and the puritans were enraged to hear the king profess himself their open enemy. The commons determined now to shake off that pusillanimity which had rendered them so subservient to the orders of the crown in the preceding reign, and to assert their privileges with spirit and firmness. A calf soon offered for carrying their design into execution. Sir Francis Goodwin having been declared duly elected knight of the shire for the county of Bucks by the committee of elections, after a full hearing on a petition of Sir John Fortescue, the king commanded the commons to re-consider the case, and to consult the judges on the occasion. This the commons absolutely refused, and a breach between the king and his parliament would probably have been the consequence, had not the moderation of Goodwin disengaged the king from an affair which might have been attended with fatal effects. It had been the common practice during the late reign, when any person was declared disqualified to sit in the house, by the chancellor, for him to issue his writ for a new election. The house now opposed this act of prerogative, as injurious to the freedom of elections and the privileges of parliament. They asserted, that they alone had the right of issuing writs for filling vacancies; and the crown made no difficulty of confirming it. Happily James possessed neither capacity to perceive the consequence, nor sufficient art and vigour to check the first attempts of liberty.

Nor was the privileges of elections the only grievance the commons attempted to remove. They endeavoured to free trade from the shackles of monopoly, which the imperious, and in this instance, the ill-judged tyranny of Elizabeth had laid upon it. Their endeavours failed indeed of success; but the very very design deserves to be remembered with applause. The same fate attended a similar attempt to free the people from the burden of purveyance. They offered the king fifty thousand pounds a year if he would consent to abolish it. James refused to comply, and the design became abortive.

The same spirit of independence urged the commons to oppose the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, which true policy must have considered as the greatest advantage to both. The king was very desirous of completing this union. He told the parliament, "that he justly regarded it as the peculiar felicity of his reign, that he had terminated the bloody animosities of these hostile nations, and reduced the whole island under one empire, enjoying tranquillity within itself, and security from all foreign invasions." He added, "that while his subjects of both kingdoms reflected on the disasters of former times, he hoped they would entertain the strongest desire of securing themselves against a return of similar calamities, by a thorough union of laws, parliaments and privileges." But these reasons, however powerful when considered without prejudice, lost their effect. The commons ascribed the excessive zeal of the king to that partiality in favour of his ancient subjects, of which, on other occasions, they thought they had sufficient reason to complain. So strangely will prejudice warp the reasoning faculty of human beings!

When the question of a supply was brought before the house, the same spirit of opposition appeared among the commons. The smallest supply, however reasonable and necessary, appeared to them unreasonable and exorbitant. James, desirous of concealing his wants from the parliament, and determined not to suffer the mortification of a refusal, sent a message to the commons, informing them, that he desired no supply. This conduct of the parliament displayed the principles which were now taking root in the nation. James foresaw not the consequences: he relied upon the rights of the crown, without imagining that his subjects could have any rights to throw in the opposite scale against them.

Soon after the prorogation of the parliament, the peace with Spain was finally concluded. This treaty contained some articles not at all favourable to the states of the United Provinces; but as they were never executed, nor any complaints made on that head by the Spaniards, it is natural to imagine, that, by some secret agreement between the contracting parties, they were never intended for any thing more than mere form. Soon after the conclusion of this treaty, the town of Ostend capitulated, after a three years siege. The Spaniards found nothing in the place but heaps of ruins to recompense them for the vast sums of money, and the incredible number of lives they had lost in making the conquest. James gave himself no concern about the loss of this fortress, resolving to improve his present connection with Spain. He accordingly dispatched the earl of Nottingham, lord high-admiral, with the character of ambassador extraordinary, to that court, attended by a numerous and magnificent retinue. The Spaniards were extremely surprized on their arrival, when they beheld the blooming countenances, and graceful appearance of the English, whom their bigotry, inflamed by their priests, had represented as to many monsters and demons from the infernal regions.

We come now to relate an event which has not its parallel in history; namely, the gun-powder plot, which affords a striking instance of the human mind, when blinded by religious prejudices. The catholics, persuaded at first that the son of Mary Stuart would mitigate the severity of the laws in their favour, were enraged to find themselves treated with the same rigour: they forgot the real duties of religion to indulge the principles of a blind and headstrong zeal. Catesby, a gentleman descended from an ancient family, of good parts, and master of a considerable estate, had formed a plan for overturning the English government; and in order to carry the design into execution, had made several journeys to the court of Philip, in order to procure an army of Spaniards to land in England: but the late peace having rendered his plan of an invasion abortive, he formed a most extraordinary method of revenge; and declared his intention to Piercy, a descendant from the illustrious house of Northumberland. The hardships under which the catholics laboured was often the subject of their conversation; and Piercy, in a fit of enthusiastic zeal, hinted a design of assassinating the king. Catesby answered, that the attempt, if successful, could not possibly remove the evil; that a more general revenge was necessary, in order to restore the catholic religion in England. The whole royal family, the nobility, and the parliament, are (said he) equally infected with the same heresy, and must all be destroyed, before a catholic prince can be placed upon the throne, and religion restored to its ancient purity. Nor is this undertaking either impossible or difficult. They will all assemble on the first meeting of the parliament, and afford us an opportunity of a sure and ample vengeance. A mine may easily be run under the parliament-house; and a few barrels of powder, properly placed, will bury all our enemies in one common ruin." Piercy was highly pleased with the contrivance of Catesby; and it was agreed between them to communicate the design to a few of their friends, and, among the rest, to Thomas Winter, who was immediately dispatched to Flanders in search of Guy Fawkes, an officer in the Spanish service, with whose zeal for the catholic religion, and courage to execute any desperate enterprize, they were well acquainted.

Thus far every thing had succeeded according to their wishes. Fawkes was found, and entered into the conspiracy with all the ardour of bigotted enthusiasm. A house was hired in Piercy's name, adjoining to that in which the parliament was to assemble; and it was agreed to carry a mine from the cellar under the room in which the parliament met; and the very moment when the king was delivering his speech to both houses, to set fire to the magazine, and destroy the whole assembly by one dreadful blast: thus making the very spot, where the edicts for proscribing the catholic religion had received their sanction, the scene of this dreadful catastrophe.

A.D. 1605. These consultations were held in the month of December of the preceding year; and it being expected that the parliament would meet in February, the work was immediately begun, and carried on with astonishing perseverance. They never desisted from their labour, relieving one another by turns; and that no alarm might be given to the neighbourhood, they entered Piercy's house by night, and carried with them provisions sufficient to support them till the mine was completed. They had also provided themselves with fire-arms and ammunition, fully determined, in case of being discovered, to perish rather than be taken.

On the second of February they had nearly pierced the wall through three yards thick; and were greatly terrified at hearing a noise, which they knew not how to account for, as it seemed to proceed from the other side of the wall. A discovery was now greatly feared, and the conspirators prepared to defend themselves to the last extremity; but, upon inquiry, it was found, that the place from whence the noise proceeded was a large vault under the house of lords, filled with coals, which were now selling off, and that the vault was to be left to the highest bidder. This opportunity was not to be neglected; Piercy immediately hired the place, deposited in it thirty-six barrels of powder, and covered the whole with faggots. Every thing was now ready for the dreadful blast; but the parliament being prorogued to the fifth of November, the conspirators had more time to finish that diabolical undertaking. More faggots were carried into the vault, and the doors boldly thrown open, as if it contained nothing dangerous, or that ought to be concealed.

The success that had hitherto attended their undertaking rendered them confident of success; and they began to deliberate on the best method of executing the remaining part of the project. The duke of York, whose tender age would not suffer him to be present at the opening of the parliament, must be secured, as well as his sister the princess Elizabeth, then at lord Harrington's house in Warwickshire. Percy undertook to secure or assassinate the duke; and Sir Everard Digby, Rookwood, and Graunt, who were now let into the secret of the conspiracy, engaged to assemble their friends, under pretence of a hunting-match, seize that princess, and immediately declare her queen. Some proposed to apply immediately to foreign courts for assistance; but this was thought too dangerous; and it was resolved to make no application of that kind till the plot had taken effect.

At last the day for carrying this infernal scheme into execution approached; and the conspirators, without the least remorse of conscience, waited with impatience for its arrival. The secret, though known to above twenty persons, had been kept with the utmost caution. Not a syllable had transpired, nor one of the conspirators had abandoned the enterprise, either through fear of punishment, or the hopes of reward. Religious frenzy had stifled at once the voice of conscience and the soft whispers of humanity. A bigotted partiality to preserve a professor of the catholic religion, at last saved the kingdom from destruction.

The following letter was sent, about ten days before the meeting of the parliament, to lord Monteagle, son to lord Morley, a catholic peer. "My lord, Out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation. Therefore I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse to shift off your attendance at this parliament; for God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. And think not slightly of this advertisement, but retire yourself into your country, where you may expect the event in safety: for though there be no appearance of any stir, yet I say they will receive a terrible blow, this parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you good, but can do you no harm: for the danger is past as soon as you have burned this letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it, to whose holy protection I commend you."

This letter gave Monteagle some uneasiness. It had been delivered to his servant by an unknown hand, and seemed to contain some mystery which it was not easy to explain. Had his own safety alone been concerned, in all probability, he would have slighted the notice, as he was inclined to think it was nothing more than an attempt of his enemies to prevent his attendance in parliament; but fearing lest the king's life might be in danger, he carried it directly to lord Salisbury, secretary of state. The minister was also inclined to treat it with neglect; but as the words seemed to convey an ambiguous meaning, he determined to lay it before his majesty. The king was of a different opinion: he conjectured, from the serious and earnest style of the letter, that something very dangerous and important was intended; and that the effect, which was represented to be at once both sudden and terrible, seemed to denote some contrivance by gun-powder. He was, however, of opinion, that either nothing should be done, or enough to prevent the danger; and that therefore the search should be deferred till the day before the meeting of the parliament, when the vaults under the parliament-house should be carefully inspected. Accordingly, on the fourth of November, the lord chamberlain, who was obliged by his office to see every thing in readiness for his majesty's coming, visited all the places about the parliament-house.

He slightly inspected the cellar, in one of the corners of which stood Fawkes, who passed for Percy's servant. The lord chamberlain was struck with the appearance of the man, in whose countenance all the marks of ferocious courage were conspicuously painted. Percy was known to be a very rigid papist, and to reside very little in town: the large quantity of fuel was, therefore, considered as a little extraordinary; and it was thought necessary to make a more particular inspection of the cellar; but, at the same time, it was resolved, that this search should be made in such a manner as should render it effectual, without giving the least alarm. These resolutions being taken, Sir Thomas Knevet, a justice of the peace, with proper attendants, was sent about midnight to examine the cellar, under pretence of searching for stolen goods. Fawkes had just finished all his preparations, and was coming out of the cellar when Knevet arrived. The daring conspirator was immediately seized; and, after removing the billets, the barrels of powder were discovered. Fawkes had a dark lantern in his hand; and the matches, with every thing necessary for setting fire to the powder, were found in his pockets. The guilt of this determined conspirator was now sufficiently apparent; and knowing that all denial would be in vain, he avowed the design, and that it would have been executed on the morrow; at the same time, expressing the utmost regret that he had lost the opportunity of setting fire to the powder; and of softening his own death with the pleasure of perishing with his enemies. He expressed the same intrepid boldness when examined before the council. He shewed not the least concern but for the failure of the enterprise; nor could the threats of torture prevail upon him to discover his accomplices. This obstinacy continued two or three days; but being closely confined in the Tower, and the rack placed before him, his courage at last forsook him, and he made a full discovery of the whole contrivance, and named all his accomplices.

The conspirators who then resided in town, though they knew that the letter to Monteagle had alarmed the ministry, and even that a search was intended to be made by the lord chamberlain, never abandoned their hopes of success till they heard that Fawkes was taken. It was then, indeed, too evident that the whole plot was discovered; and they fled immediately into Warwickshire, where Sir Everard Digby, persuaded that the attempt had succeeded, was already in arms to seize the princess Elizabeth, who had prevented their design by flying to Coventry. The whole county was now alarmed; and Sir Richard Walsh, high constable of Worcestershire, assisted by a great number of the inhabitants, surrounded the conspirators in Holbeach. Their number, including all their attendants, never exceeded eighty; but notwithstanding their inferiority, they prepared for a vigorous defence, determined either to perish or escape. But misfortune still pursued them. A quantity of powder laid before the fire to dry, taking fire, disabled them from making any defence. The people rushed in upon them. Catesby and Percy were killed by a single shot: Winter, Digby, Rookwood and Bates, were taken, and carried to London, where they made a full discovery of the conspiracy, and, together with Garnet the jesuit, died by the hands of the common executioner.

The earl of Northumberland was fined thirty thousand pounds, under pretence of his having been acquainted with the conspiracy, though the only grounds of suspicion were, his having admitted Percy, his kinsman, into the number of gentlemen pensioners, without tendering him the oath of supremacy. The lords Mordaunt and Sturton, two catholic noblemen, were also tried in the star-chamber, and fined, the former in ten thousand, and the latter in four thousand pounds. The lord Monteagle had a grant of two hundred pounds a year in land, and a pension of five hundred pounds for his life, as a reward.

reward for discovering the letter which occasioned the whole conspiracy to be rendered abortive. Some Roman catholic authors have maintained that the gunpowder plot was nothing more than an idle chimera; but their assertions are founded on no historical evidence; the fact is certain; and however incredible it may appear that the human mind should be capable of forming so horrid a contrivance, the whole is founded on proofs impossible to be invalidated.

This astonishing discovery occasioned the meeting of parliament to be put off till the ninth of November, when the king opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which he endeavoured to restrain the fury of the English against the catholics. He observed, that it would be highly unjust, it would be criminal, to involve the whole body of catholics in the guilt of a few; that it could not be supposed they were all disposed to engage in committing such horrid barbarities; that all men who embraced the tenets of the Roman church, should not be considered as supporters of the pope's power of dethroning kings, or sanctifying assassination; for though the wrath of heaven is denounced against crimes, yet innocent error may obtain favour. "For my own part, added he, conspiracy, however atrocious, shall never alter my plan of government: while I punish guilt with one hand, I will support and protect innocence with the other."

A. D. 1606. The moderation of James was not, however, agreeable to his subjects, particularly the puritans, who represented his lenity as a proof, that his heart was inclined to the doctrines of Rome. But this suspicion was not sufficient to alienate the hearts of his subjects from him; the commons even laid aside their parsimonious tenets and granted him a considerable supply. But while the parliament were closely engaged in the business of the nation, and the passions of the people warmed by the recent guilt and obstinacy of the conspirators, a report was suddenly spread, that James and his principal favourites were assassinated at Oking, about twenty miles west of London. The account was very circumstantial; James was said to have been stabbed with a poisoned knife, and that the murderers were composed of English Jesuits, Scots in disguise, Frenchmen and Spaniards. The court and city gates were instantly shut; the guards at both were doubled; the citizens were put under arms; and Sir William Wade, lieutenant of the Tower, made the necessary dispositions for preventing a surprize, and standing a siege. The parliament was sitting when the report arrived, and all business was immediately suspended. Sir Maurice Berkley and two other persons were dispatched to know the truth, while terror and confusion seemed to have seized every order and rank of men. A small space of time was, however, sufficient to remove this universal consternation. In about two hours the report became doubtful, and in three a proclamation was published by the privy-council, informing the people that no unfortunate event happened. James himself reached London about two in the afternoon, and was met at Hyde-park by the whole house of commons, with the speaker at their head.

The supply, though very considerable, obtained from parliament, was soon squandered by the king's profusion. What considerably increased the royal expence, was a visit he received from his brother-in-law the king of Denmark. The whole court was employed in feasting and revelry, in masques and interludes. In the midst of these rejoicings, the prince of Vaudemont, third son to the duke of Lorraine, attended by seven earls, ten barons, forty gentlemen, and one hundred and twenty domestics, arrived at court, and greatly increased the splendor that then reigned in every part of the palace.

The parliament met again at Westminster on the eighteenth of November, when the project for an union between the two kingdoms was again the object of parliamentary discussion. James was very desirous of completing this union; and pointed out, in an excellent speech, the advantages that both kingdoms must receive from so necessary a treaty. But all his reasonings were in vain; the parliament, swayed perhaps by the vulgar motive of national antipathy, resisted all his efforts, and the projected treaty became abortive. It was left to later times, and to an age more capable of perceiving the real advantages of the nation, to complete an union of so much importance to both kingdoms.

A. D. 1607. Though the principal subject debated in parliament during this session, was the union between the two kingdoms, it was not the only one; the puritans exerted themselves as usual in bringing in bills against pluralities; restraining the execution of ecclesiastical canons not confirmed by parliament; and moved for a toleration of those who opposed the ceremonies of the church: but all their efforts were in vain: James had too severely felt the effects of suffering that sect to gain an ascendancy in the government. In the mean time an insurrection happened in the counties of Northampton, Warwick, and Leicester, occasioned by large tracts of land being inclosed, whereby the people were deprived of their right of commonage. A body, consisting of three or four thousand men, roved about the country, demolishing inclosures, and laying open the lands that had been taken from them. They were headed by one John Reynolds, a person of very low condition, but who had acquired great authority among the multitude. Several proclamations were published, and the sheriffs raised the posse of their respective counties against them, but carefully avoided a general engagement. At last James published a conciliating proclamation, expressing his unwillingness to proceed against them by martial law, and promising them mercy, and redress of their grievances. This produced the desired effect: the people laid down their arms, and returned to their respective habitations. A few weeks after this commotion subsided, James, though no supply had been granted him by the parliament, paid a debt of sixty thousand pounds contracted by Elizabeth, who, about nine years before, had borrowed that sum of the citizens of London, and left it undischarged at her decease.

A. D. 1608. Nothing memorable occurs in the transactions of this year, but the death of Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorset, lord high-treasurer. He was succeeded in his office by Robert Cecil, earl of Salisbury, a nobleman of great talents, and every way qualified to instruct James in the methods used by former kings for raising money without the assistance of parliament.

A. D. 1609. Early in the spring was concluded, by a truce of twelve years, that memorable war, which had, for near half a century, been carried on with the utmost fury, between Spain and the states of the United Provinces. Every stratagem had been tried, and every force exerted to annihilate a people who had made such uncommon efforts in defence of their independence. At last the haughty Spaniard, finding the commerce of his kingdom entirely ruined, and his provinces exposed to the most imminent danger from the maritime forces of the states, consented to acknowledge as a free people, those whom he had so long treated as rebellious subjects, and solemnly to relinquish all pretensions to sovereignty over them. This event was at once mortifying and dissatisfactory to James, who always considered the Hollanders as rebels. It was his avowed maxim in all debates concerning his prerogative, that subjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their princes on any account whatever. He therefore considered this treaty as a dangerous precedent, and prejudicial to the sovereign authority of kings.

A. D. 1610. Notwithstanding the many artifices made use of by James for levying money upon his subjects, he soon found his exchequer empty, and was obliged to summon a parliament to obtain the necessary supplies. The nation being enriched by commerce, commerce, and the revenues of the crown not augmented in proportion to the price of provisions, the king found himself poor in the midst of public wealth. Economy, indeed, was not one of James's virtues: he was lavish of his treasures to his rapacious courtiers, and always in want, because he wanted sufficient fortitude to restrain, within proper bounds, his passion for conferring favours. The talk of procuring a supply to his majesty was undertaken by the earl of Salisbury, who, in order to conciliate the affections of the commons, assured them that the king was resolved to redress all their grievances, and then proceeded to explain the causes which obliged the king to have recourse to his parliament for a supply. He enumerated the debts of the late queen, which the king had discharged; the maintaining an army of nineteen thousand men in Ireland; the great sums he had expended in discharging the debts contracted by Elizabeth; in his own journey, and that of his household, from Edinburgh to London; in entertaining the king of Denmark and foreign ambassadors; in supporting three courts, for himself, the queen and the prince of Wales; in sending envoys to different courts on the continent; and in liberalities to his officers and dependents. He represented to them, that Elizabeth, though a single woman, had received very large supplies during the last years of her life, which alone was expensive to her; that she had, notwithstanding, alienated a great part of the crown lands, an expedient, which, though it supplied the present necessities, multiplied those of her successor. These, and several other reasons, were urged by the treasurer, to obtain a large supply from the parliament; but they were urged in vain; the commons determined to avail themselves of the king's poverty in order to keep him in dependence. They complained loudly of the king's prodigality, and excessive profusion towards his own countrymen: while others affirmed that his real intention was to sap the privileges of the subject by gradual usurpations, and, at last, to bury the liberties of Englishmen in the gulph of prerogative. But being unwilling to shock the king with an absolute denial, they expressed their willingness to comply with the king's desires, provided they did not exceed the bounds of reason. Accordingly, the earl of Salisbury moved for a conference with the commons; where he proposed that an adequate supply might be granted for his majesty's present occasions, and that two hundred thousand pounds a year should, for the future, be added to the royal revenue, in order to support the dignity of the crown. Faced at this proposal, the commons voted one subsidy and one fifteenth, which did not amount to more than one sixth part of what had been asked for the king's present occasions; and absolutely refused to settle any standing revenue, unless the king would consent to purchase it with some valuable consideration. By the ancient right of poundage the king was to have five per cent. on all merchandise, but as the ancient rates were followed, which did not amount to one third of the real value, he thought he might make some improvements, and these were made with great moderation. This did not, however, satisfy the commons, they presented a remonstrance on that subject, in which they said, that such a practice threatened ruin to the ancient liberties of the kingdom, and invaded the properties of the people. They even passed a bill for the suppression of those taxes; together with another of more importance, against ecclesiastical regulations made without the authority of parliament; but they were both thrown out by the lords.

These bold attempts, with others of a similar nature, could not fail of being very disagreeable to a prince firmly attached to the arbitrary principles of his ancestors. He told the parliament in his speech, that he would never agree to have his power disputed, but should always be willing to explain the motives of his conduct, and to regulate it by the laws. In a work published in England, he expressed himself in these terms, "A good prince, though above the laws, will make his actions conformable to them; and thus set an example to his people, whilst he himself is not amenable nor subject to the laws." Convinced that the royal authority hath no bounds even in England, he found, with indignation, that bounds were prescribed to it. At last he dissolved the parliament, but did not by that means weaken the new system. These agitations seemed to announce those violent storms, which, in the reign of his successor overwhelmed the throne.

A.D. 1611. The eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon Henry IV. of France; who, by his experience and good sense, was become one of the greatest politicians, as well as generals, of the age. That prince saw, that while the house of Austria, through its widely extended branches, was always ready to embrace every opportunity of aggrandizing itself, France had every thing to fear from its ambition; and he had formed a noble plan for humbling that ambitious family. But all his great designs were blasted in a moment by the poniard of the fanatical Ravallac. That infamous miscreant had for some time followed the king in his incursions, in quest of an opportunity of perpetrating his horrid purpose. That very morning he intended to stab him at the Feuillans, where he went to hear mass; but was prevented by the interposition of the duke de Vendome. After dinner the king appeared extremely uneasy, and leaning his head upon his hand; was heard to say, "My God! what is this that will not suffer me to be at quiet? About four in the afternoon he went into his own coach with the duke d'Epemon, and several other noblemen. In passing through the street de la Roqueta, which is very narrow, a stop was made by two loaded carts: the king had sent away his guards, and ordered the coach to be opened, that he might see the preparations that were making for the queen's entry; all the pages were gone round another way, except two, one of whom went before to clear the street, while the other stepped behind to tie his garter. Ravallac, who had followed the carriage, took this opportunity to perpetrate his horrid purpose. He mounted on the coach-wheel, and, with a long knife, sharp on both sides, struck the king over the shoulder of the duke d'Epemon. Henry exclaimed, "I am wounded!" The assassin repeated the blow with greater violence, and the knife, penetrating the thorax, divided the vena cava, so that the king expired immediately. Ravallac was not perceived by any person while he perpetrated this atrocious murder; so that had he thrown the knife under the coach, he might have escaped unnoticed: but he stood upon the wheel fixed like a statue, with the bloody knife in his hand. A gentleman coming up, would have put him to death immediately, but the duke d'Epemon called aloud, "Save him on your life!" and the miscreant was taken alive. On his examination he boldly confessed he perpetrated the murder, because the king would not take up arms against the Hugonots, and that his making war against the pope was nothing less than making war against God; "because the pope was God, and God was the pope." The fanatical villain soon after suffered for his treachery all the torments a human being is capable of supporting. This dreadful assassination put the finishing stroke to the honours of fanaticism. The catholic religion appeared more odious than ever, though there were fanatics also among the reformers.

The discovery of the principle on which this regicide had been committed, gave James great uneasiness; and as the Jesuits were universally believed to have been the authors of it, James thought it absolutely necessary to remove from his person, men who held so detestable a doctrine. A proclamation was accordingly issued commanding all Jesuits and priests of the Romish persuasion to depart the kingdom immediately, and all recusants not to come within ten miles of the court. At the same time the justices of the peace in every county were ordered to administer the oath of allegiance to all catholics. But these precautions did not divert James from exerting himself to improve the navigation and commerce of the kingdom. He encouraged discoveries of every kind that had a tendency to promote the happiness of his people. He erected large storehouses for the benefit of victualling his ships and supplying them with military stores, and carried naval architecture to a much greater degree of perfection than it ever before had reached in England. His care for promoting the interest of the East-India company, ought also to be mentioned with honour. That company, which had been incorporated by queen Elizabeth, had hitherto subsisted under great disadvantages, from the difficulty and length of their voyages, and the barbarous disposition of the inhabitants of the countries they had discovered; but the large returns of a fortunate voyage, induced them to apply to the king for an enlargement of their charter, by which they proposed to increase the trade, the shipping, the strength, and the wealth of the kingdom, and to deprive the Turks and Persians of the commerce of the East-Indies. James entered into all these considerations with an attention becoming the father of his people; he granted them a perpetual charter, enlarged their patent, and formed them into a body corporate and politic. He also prohibited the importation of pepper by any other traders, and fixed the retail price of that commodity. These privileges tended greatly to increase the strength and opulence of the company; much larger ships, and more in number, were sent annually to India than before.

James was, however, much better fitted to shine in a college than on a throne. He made light of politics, while controversy excited all his zeal. The famous preacher Arminius, of Amsterdam, had been chosen professor of divinity at Leyden, and had been accused by the Calvinists with teaching absurd doctrines concerning free-will and predestination. Before his death, which happened in 1608, his party remained masters of the field of disputation, and his chair was now filled by Vorstius, who had published several treatises in defence of the Arminian principles. James opposed the doctrine of Arminius, and considered Vorstius as a dangerous rival in scholastic reputation. The royal disputant, therefore, attacked the professor with all the rage of arrogance and presumption. Fearful of the consequences that might ensue from this scholastic warfare, the states thought proper to deprive Vorstius of the chair he had filled with so much reputation. The king was appeased by this mark of condescension in the states, though he very charitably hinted to them, "That as to the burning of Vorstius for his blasphemies and atheism, he left it entirely to their own christian wisdom; but surely never heretic better deserved the flames." The states, however, had too much sense and humanity to understand his majesty's meaning; they even procured a chair for the ejected professor in another university. But these disputes did not terminate so fortunately; the verticious pensioner Barneveldt, one of the greatest men the republic ever saw, and who justly deserved the name of father of his country, fell a victim to the fanatical enthusiasm of the opposite party. The learned and illustrious Gratius was also committed to prison, for defending Barneveldt.

But amidst these theological disputes, in which James was engaged, he forgot not a project he had formed in favour of humanity, and which did him more real honour than all his scholastic divinity. This was the civilizing of the Irish, and making them acquainted with the happiness that attends a well-regulated society. During the space of four hundred and forty years that Ireland had been subjected to England, the inhabitants of that island retained their ancient manners, which had no other tendency than that of keeping the people for ever in a state of barbarism and disorder. Involved in stupid ignorance, they were a wretched prey to the tyranny of their conquerors. The custom of the Irish, like that of other barbarians who formerly over-ran Europe, was to punish the greatest crimes by fines only. Murder itself was atoned for in this manner; and every person, according to his rank, had a certain rate or value affixed to him: this rate was called his Eric. When Fermanagh was formed into a county, the viceroy of Ireland told Maguire, that he should send him a sheriff or provost. "Your sheriff (said the Irishman) shall be well received; but tell me beforehand his eric, that if my people kill him, I may be able to levy the money upon the county." James abolished this, and many other barbarous customs, secured and determined their property, defended the people from the oppressions of the nobility, punished all crimes with severity, introduced agriculture into that fruitful but uncultivated country, maintained a sufficient number of troops to keep good order among the people, abolished their prejudices, and enlightened their understandings with the rays of learning. In a word, after proceeding regularly, during the course of a few years, he came, at length, to govern, by justice and the laws, a people who appeared incapable of acknowledging them. He frequently boasted of the management of Ireland as his master-piece; and it will appear, upon the necessary inquiry, that his vanity in this particular was not altogether without foundation: it doubtless forms the most glorious monument of his reign.

About the same time, James gave an agreeable specimen of his impartiality, in the execution of Robert Creighton, lord Sanquhar, who had basely assassinated one Turner, his fencing-master. In vain was all the interest made by several of the nobility in his favour. The king observing how much the English were provoked at his attachment to his countrymen, listened not to the intercessions that were made to save him: he prudently suffered the law to take its course, and Sanquhar fell a victim to his crime.

A. D. 1612. Henry, prince of Wales, the object of national affection, paid the debt of nature on the sixth of November, in the seventeenth year of his age. He was a youth of very promising talents, and of an amiable character. He spent his time in studies becoming a prince, and exercised himself in the most manly diversions. He possessed the advantage of a fine person, and there was a martial turn in his disposition which could not fail of being very agreeable to a warlike people. His death diffused an universal grief through the nation, and his tomb was watered with the tears of the English.

Nor was this the only loss that James sustained in the course of this year: his principal counsellor, the earl of Salisbury, died on the fourteenth of May. His death was a great misfortune to James, who was thereby deprived of a very able minister, and one perfectly acquainted with the constitution and genius of the English. He was a person of great parts, honour and fidelity; a lover and encourager of virtue and learning in others.

A. D. 1613. On the fourteenth of February, the marriage of the princess Elizabeth with the elector Palatine was celebrated with great rejoicings. No expence was spared to render the entertainments on this occasion as magnificent as possible. The nation were very much pleased with this match, as it promised the greatest advantages to the protestant interest in Europe. But these hopes were, in the end, rendered abortive, and the marriage proved a source of discontent between James and his parliament.

The king, during his whole reign in Scotland, was hardly ever without a favourite; and both the English and Scots had, ever since his accession, laboured incessantly to supply this defect in England; but, for some time, their attempts were rendered abortive. At last the lord Hay introduced Robert Carr, a Scottish gentleman descended from an ancient family, and who had formerly been a page of honour to the king in Scotland. Hay, without mentioning him at court, court, assigned him the office, at a match of tilting, of presenting to the king his buckler and device. When Carre was advancing to execute his office, the unruly horse, on which he was mounted, flung him, and broke his leg in the king's presence. James approached him with pity and concern, ordered him to be carried to the palace, and to be attended with the utmost care. Carre was then about twenty years of age, of an easy air and graceful demeanour, extremely ambitious, and profoundly ignorant. James paid him a visit as soon as the tilting was over, and Carre soon became the favourite of the monarch. Honours and estates were heaped upon him, and he was the channel through which the royal favours flowed to others. He was, however, sensible of his own ignorance and want of experience; but found a faithful friend and judicious counsellor in Sir Thomas Overbury, who endeavoured to instil into him the principles of prudence and discretion. By following the friendly admonitions of that great man, Carre enjoyed at once the highest favour of the prince, and the good wishes of the people. James, not content with knighting his favourite, created him viscount Rochester, and invested him with the honour of the garter.

James, at his first mounting the English throne, shewed the greatest favour to the families of Howard and Devereux: he restored young Essex to his blood and dignity, and conferred the titles of Suffolk and Northampton on two brothers of the house of Norfolk. He also married young Essex to the lady Frances Howard, second daughter to the earl of Suffolk: but as she was only in her thirteenth, and he in his fourteenth year, they were thought too young to cohabit together; and it was resolved that the earl should pass some time in the Low Countries, where he enjoyed an opportunity of completing himself in the art of war. Upon his return, he found his countess the most celebrated beauty of the age, while he himself was considered as one of the most promising young noblemen in Europe; but he was ignorant that lord Rochester, the favourite, was his rival in the heart of his lovely bride. Presuming on his great interest with the king, Rochester made professions of love to the young countess, and was too successful in his addresses; but the return of Essex interrupted the enjoyment of their guilty pleasures. Essex claimed the privileges of a husband, but met with an absolute denial. Alarmed at this strange behaviour, and ignorant of the cause, the young nobleman, for some time, exerted all his endeavours to gain her favour; but finding his attempts in vain, he determined to give himself no farther trouble, but leave her to pursue her own inclinations.

Had the countess been satisfied with being the mistress of Rochester, all the misfortunes that afterwards attended both herself and the favourite, might, possibly, have been avoided; but lost to all sense of shame, she aspired to be his wife; and accordingly prevailed upon her lover to use his influence with the king, in order to procure for her a divorce from Essex. Rochester imparted this scheme to Sir Thomas Overbury, his faithful counsellor; who, alarmed at the proposal, used every argument in his power to divert his friend from so foolish and base an attempt. The warmth of his honest expostulations carried him so far, that he threatened Rochester with the loss of his correspondence and friendship, if he could so far forget his honour and interest, as to prosecute his intended marriage with a woman of such abandoned principles. Rochester had the weakness to impart this conversation to the countess, who instantly vowed the severest revenge against this bold arraigner of her honour and conduct. The favourite himself was also so infatuated by her charms, that he joined with her in resolving the ruin of Overbury. He accordingly repaired to court; and, after extolling, in the highest manner, the great abilities of Overbury, insinuated, that he was lately grown so insupportably insolent, that he could with he was removed, by some honourable employment, to a greater distance from the seat of power. Far from suspecting the cause of the favourite's application, James appointed Overbury his ambassador to a foreign court. On receiving notice of the honour conferred upon him, he consulted with Rochester how he ought to proceed, as he considered his appointment as nothing more than an honourable banishment. The insidious favourite, under pretence of not being able to support his absence, persuaded him to reject the offer. Overbury followed his advice; but the favourite repairing immediately to court, represented the refusal of Overbury as the highest insolence. James, who could not bear the slightest contempt of his authority, sent the unhappy Overbury to the Tower.

The troublesome counsellor being thus removed from the scene of action, the divorce was solicited with such success, that the sentence was soon pronounced; and the king not only gave his favourite leave to marry the countess, but also created him earl of Somerset; that her second husband might not be inferior in dignity to her first. The nuptials were solemnized in the most magnificent manner; and nothing now was wanting to complete their triumph but the death of Overbury, without which that implacable woman could not be satisfied. She used every art to effect her bloody purpose; and at last prevailed, both on her husband and the earl of Northampton, her uncle, to engage in the atrocious design of taking him off by poison. Several attempts were accordingly made for this purpose, but the strength of Overbury's constitution as often rendered them abortive. At last nature gave way to repeated attacks, and he died in the Tower on the sixteenth of September, by a poisoned clyster. He was buried with the utmost dispatch and secrecy; and tho' this precipitate interment caused a strong suspicion in the public, the horrid action was not discovered till some years after.

A. D. 1614. Without œconomy, and lavish to his favourites, the resources of James were ill proportioned to his wants. After selling baronets' titles to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds, and employing those sad expedients, the effect of which degrades more than it multiplies nobility, he found himself obliged to call a parliament. The commons, still animated with the same spirit against the prerogative, determined to make an attempt for prescribing it within proper bounds. The office of a member of the house of commons, once regarded as a burden, was now, from the authority it assumed, become an object of emulation. The ministry had exerted their utmost efforts to procure a majority; but the measures of the court were so disagreeable to the nation in general, that all their endeavours proved ineffectual; and instead of granting a supply, as desired by the king, they resumed the subject debated in the last parliament; and boldly remonstrated against the regal usurpations, in levying new customs and impositions by the sole authority of the prerogative. Nor did they think their remonstrances sufficient: they applied to the lords for a conference, in order to concert measures to prevent, if possible, the same practice for the future; and secure the liberty of the subject, by circumscribing the unlimited power of the crown. Informed of their intention, and determined to render the design abortive, James dissolved the parliament, after a session of about two months, in which not one statute was enacted, nor any supply granted. The only result of their meeting was an increase of jealousy between the prince and the people. In the space of six hundred years, there are only three instances of the parliament's refusing an aid to the crown. The commons seemed determined to provoke the indignation of the king; and James carried his resentment so far, that he imprisoned some of the members who had been the leaders in this opposition; a step which exposed him still farther to the hatred of the nation.

A. D. 1615. Deprived of the advantage of Overbury's bury's counsel, the earl of Somerset found himself greatly embarrassed in the management of public affairs. His small experience rendered every thing difficult; he became odious to the court; and tho' the king's partiality continued, his insolence and weakness gave his enemies so many advantages, that it was evident he must soon be removed. The queen herself was insulted by this favourite minion, and joined the party formed against him. After many consultations on the best method of effecting the ruin of Somerset, it was agreed to give the king a new favourite. The scheme succeeded; and George Villiers, a young man remarkable for his beauty and effeminacy, was the object chosen for this purpose. James first beheld this gaudy object at a comedy acted at Cambridge, where he was conspicuously placed, and immediately engaged the attention of the king. Villiers was conducted to court, and soon weakened the influence of the favourite. He was immediately knighted, and made a gentleman of the bedchamber, with the yearly pension of a thousand crowns.

Somerset saw his fall was approaching, and exerted all his influence to avert it. But his efforts were in vain: the discovery of Overbury's murder reduced him to the level from which he had been raised by the hand of folly. The apothecary's boy, who had been employed in administering the poisoned clyster, revealed the whole secret to Winwood, secretary of state. The evidence of the boy was confirmed by the information of the countess of Shrewsbury, then a prisoner in the Tower. That lady had found means to insinuate herself into the confidence of Sir Jarvaile Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower; and being of an intriguing disposition, she drew the secret from him. James was soon informed of the atrocious deed; and the lieutenant being questioned, could not help betraying, by his countenance, the guilt that rankled at his heart. He confessed all he knew, and it was now determined to prosecute all the actors in this detestable tragedy. Accordingly Weston, who had given Overbury the poison in tarts and jellies, and at last in a clyster; Mrs. Turner, chief confidant of the countess of Somerset; Franklin, the apothecary, who had prepared the poison; and Sir Jarvaile Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower, were ordered to be apprehended. All these, together with Somerset and his countess, were convicted of the atrocious fact, on the fullest evidence. Somerset and his countess only were pardoned; the rest suffered the punishment due to their crimes. After some years imprisonment, James set them at liberty, and conferred on them a small pension, on which they lived retired in the country, and languished out old age in infamy and obscurity.

The fortune of Villiers, in the mean time, grew with amazing rapidity. He was created duke of Buckingham, lord high-admiral of England, constable of Windsor, and, in a few years, loaded with those honours and favours that might have rewarded the merit of many illustrious men. His family also was advanced to opulence. But this strange and unworthy profusion increased the king's necessities, and obliged him to raise money by very obnoxious means. He restored to the Dutch the three important fortresses of Flushing, the Brille, and Ramma-kins, for three hundred thousand pounds. These places had been put into the hands of Elizabeth by the states of the United Provinces, as securities for the sum of eight hundred and eighteen thousand four hundred and eight pounds, which that prince had advanced during their war with Spain. The necessities of James obliged him to accept the small sum above-mentioned, and the places were accordingly delivered up on the fourteenth of June. From this period we may date the full liberty of the Dutch republic.

But the money was soon dissipated, without the possibility of knowing how: none of the king's debts were paid; the navy was not repaired, nor had any money been sent to the army in Ireland, though their wants formed the chief pretence for treating with the states. At length it was discovered, that the lord treasurer Suffolk had converted the greater part of the money received from Holland to his own use. As he was father-in-law to Somerset, and consequently no friend to Villiers the favourite, this opportunity to ruin him was readily embraced. The lord-treasurer was accused in the star-chamber, of several misdemeanors in the execution of his office, and particularly with having secreted large sums received from the Dutch. Sir Edward Coke, who carried on the prosecution against him for the crown, aggravated his misdemeanors, his extortions, his mismanagement of the king's treasure, his boldness in applying it to his own use, the corruptions and artifices of his deputy Bingley, to abuse the confidence of such as had any business with his master. He produced several precedents of treasurers who had been punished for much s lighter crimes than those of the earl of Suffolk, and displayed the dangerous consequences that must result from the corrupt administration of the public money. Had Suffolk thrown himself upon the mercy of the king, he would have been acquitted; but he endeavoured to invalidate the evidence brought against him, and justify his conduct against the malignant accusations of his enemies. He failed in the attempt; and his judges pronounced him guilty. He was fined thirty thousand pounds, and condemned to imprisonment during the king's pleasure. Nor did his deputy Bingley escape: he was severely reprimanded, and fined two thousand pounds.

Villiers now wholly engrossed the royal favour; the friends of Somerset were no longer capable of giving him any disturbance. He accordingly began to exert his influence by filling all the places about the court with his own creatures. The lord chief-justice Coke was deprived of his office, on pretence of some trifling misdemeanors: but the real cause of his disgrace was his opposing the king in bestowing a vacant bishopric in commendam. His place was filled by Montague, and Bacon, on the death of Ellesmere, was appointed lord chancellor.

A. D. 1617. James, instigated both by political and religious motives, was very desirous of establishing in Scotland the worship and tenets of the church of England, so favourable to the authority of the crown; for at this time no people in the world were less submissive to that authority than the Scots. The highlanders, divided into seven clans, or tribes, formed, as it were, a distinct nation, equally untractable and barbarous. The inhabitants of the Lowlands, where the feudal government still subsisted, were strongly attached to their chiefs and their tribes, in whom they placed their greatest confidence, and very little in their king, with whose weakness they had been acquainted. The kingdom was torn in pieces by internal divisions, which had only been from time to time suspended by their natural hatred of the English; and what was still worse, fanaticism raged in all its horrors. The authority of the bishops scarce subsisted; the puritan preachers, assuming to themselves a character little inferior to that of the prophets or apostles, disdaining all submission to the spiritual rulers of the church, by whom their innovations were strongly opposed. The prelates and abbots, however, still maintained their seats in parliament, and the church was still supposed to be represented by those spiritual lords, in the states of the kingdom. But their vast revenues, in which their real power consisted, were no more; the greater part had been seized by the more powerful barons, and what remained, after many delapidations, was, by act of parliament, vested in the crown. James, when only king of Scotland, had yielded, much against his inclinations, to the ascendancy of the enthusiasts. When he came to the crown of England, he was more capable of making them feel the weight of regal power, and had gained considerable advantages over them by virtue of his right of supremacy. He was now resolved to visit his native country, in order to carry into immediate execution the plan he had formed for extending the episcopal power, and establishing the superiority of the civil government over the jurisdiction of the clergy. Had he proceeded gradually, and concealed his real intention, he might, in all probability, have succeeded; but he pushed his design with too much violence, and by attempting to introduce some ceremonies used in the church of England, rendered the whole sufficiently apparent, and in the end abortive. The fire of devotion, excited by novelty, and inflamed by opposition, so possessed the minds of the Scottish reformers, that all rights and ornaments were rejected with disdain, as useless burthens; retarding the imagination in its rapturous extacies, and cramping the divine spirit by which they supposed themselves to be animated. Hence the enlivening intercourses of society, every sweet or cheerful amusement, calculated to soften or humanize the character, were banished from the kingdom. A gloomy and sullen disposition, the natural consequence of fanaticism, established itself among the people. James was, therefore, desirous of infusing a small tincture of ceremony into the national worship, and of introducing such rites as might, in some degree, occupy the mind, and please the senses, without departing too far from that simplicity by which the reformation was distinguished. He accordingly caused several of the churches to be adorned; an organ was erected in the king's chapel; and some attempts made to introduce the fine arts among a people then rude and ferocious. But every innovation from their mode of worship, was looked upon with horror and detestation. Every step towards introducing ceremonies into the churches was considered as an approximation towards that spiritual whore so much the object of their execrations.

James had summoned a general assembly of the clergy to meet him at Aberdeen before the death of Elizabeth, but the demise of that princess rendering it necessary for him to repair to England, he prorogued it to the following year. Those who disavowed his ecclesiastical supremacy, regarded not his prohibition, but met at the time appointed. The king was exasperated at this contempt of his authority, and committed them all to prison. Such as thought proper to submit were pardoned; but the rest brought to their trial, and condemned for high-treason. None of them, however, were executed; but six of the most refractory were banished the kingdom. This severe proceeding had intimidated the clergy, so that James met with much less resistance in his attempt. But all his power and all his influence were exerted in vain: the Scottish ministers refused to introduce the ceremonies he had recommended, and the design of the king was considered by the vulgar, as an attempt to banish the Christian religion out of Scotland.

Nor was James more fortunate in gaining the affections of the puritanical sect in England. Desirous of softening that gloomy disposition which was every day gaining ground in the kingdom, he published a proclamation for allowing and encouraging, after divine service, all kinds of lawful games and exercises, that the minds of the people might be exhilarated, and detached from that melancholy horror which was at once injurious to the health of the body, and destructive of the enlivening intercourses of society.

A. D. 1618. The famous Sir Walter Raleigh, during his imprisonment of thirteen years in the Tower, had applied himself closely to study, and acquired so great a reputation for learning, that all his faults were forgotten. He was now as much lamented, as he had been before hated by the people. That great genius, that renowned warrior, educated amidst naval and military enterprizes, treated with so much rigour, was considered as a valuable citizen, who ought to be restored to the state. The favourable dispositions of the public increasing at once his desire and hopes of liberty, he expected to obtain it by publishing, that in the reign of queen Elizabeth he had discovered a gold mine of immense value in Guiana. James, though he placed little confidence in this report, yet thinking Raleigh had already suffered sufficient punishment, released him from prison, and gave him the command of those adventurers, whom the desire of sharing in the pretended mine, had inspired with a desire of sharing his fortunes; but absolutely refused to grant him a pardon, though it seemed a natural consequence, when he was entrusted with power and command.

As soon as his fleet, which consisted of twelve ships, was ready, he sailed from Plymouth, and steered directly for Guiana in America. On his arrival he found the Spaniards had formed a settlement on the river Oronoko, built a small town called St. Thomas, and were working some gold mines of small value in the neighbourhood. Raleigh entered the mouth of the river with his whole fleet, but did not think it prudent to pursue his design against the rapid current of the river with his largest ships. He therefore detached five of his smallest vessels under the command of his son and captain Keymis, who was said to have discovered the mine in question, during his former voyage with Sir Walter to that country, with orders to sail up the Oronoko, as far as possible, in order to find the mountain in the bowels of which the mine was situated. But not being able to pursue their course, they landed near St. Thomas, where they were fired upon by the Spaniards. Young Raleigh, to encourage his men, called out, "that this was the true mine, and none but fools looked for any other;" and advancing upon the Spaniards, received a shot of which he immediately expired. Keymis and his companions were not dismayed; they carried on the attack with the utmost vigour, and soon made themselves masters of the place. They found not, however, the riches they expected: the Spaniards were poor, and the produce of the mines inconsiderable. Keymis was now requested to lead them to the mine he had before discovered, but absolutely refused; and the English, after burning the town, returned to the rest of the fleet at the mouth of the river. Raleigh, finding himself disappointed in the promises of Keymis, threatened him with the king's displeasure, which that officer prevented by retiring to his cabin, and putting an end to his own life.

It was now suspected by Raleigh's companions, that they had been deceived by their leader; that he had never any assurance of their being any such mine he pretended to be in search of; that he had always intended to plunder St. Thomas; and, after encouraging his soldiers with the spoil of that place, to have proceeded to invade the other Spanish settlements; hoping by such daring enterprizes to repair the ruins of his shattered fortune, and flatter himself with being able to purchase, by his wealth, the pardon he had before solicited in vain. They therefore absolutely refused to make any farther attempts on the Spanish settlements, and obliged him to return to Plymouth, where he was arrested by his majesty's order, and conveyed to the Tower.

During the absence of Raleigh, the Spanish ambassador had made loud complaints at the court of London, of the depredations committed by the English under that intrepid commander; and a resolution was taken to carry the former sentence passed against him into execution. The king accordingly listened to the advice of his council, and signed the warrant for his execution. Raleigh now called forth all the force of his mind, and met death with the greatest intrepidity. When he came upon the scaffold he touched the edge of the executioner's axe, and said, "This is a sharp but sure remedy for all ills." His speech to the people was calm and eloquent, in which he endeavoured to exculpate himself from the crimes laid to his charge, and load his enemies with the public hatred. Having finished his harangue, he, with the utmost indifference, laid his head upon the block, and received the fatal blow.

His fate was regretted by the whole body of the nobility; and the English patriots beheld the fate of Raleigh with silent indignation. The public clamour against the pusillanimous administration of James was, by this event, greatly increased. It was thought an instance of cruelty and injustice to execute a sentence, which had been so long suspended, and tacitly pardoned, by conferring on him a new trust and commission; especially as he was then the only man in England who enjoyed a high reputation for valour and military experience.

James had formed the most ridiculous notion, that it was unworthy a prince of Wales to marry any but the daughter of a king. Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador in England, in order to open a negotiation with the English monarch, dropped some hints that the infanta Maria, would not be refused if demanded for the king's son; and in order to render the temptation irresistible to the necessitous monarch, he gave the greatest hopes that an immense dowry would be given with that princess. The hopes of accomplishing so advantageous a treaty induced the king to embrace the proposal with the greatest avidity: and, after many formalities and scruples had been discussed by the Spanish council, certain articles were transmitted by lord Digby, the English ambassador at Madrid, for his approbation. They were in substance as follows;

“That the pope's dispensation should be obtained by the sole act of the Spanish monarch.

“That the children of this marriage should not be constrained in matters of religion, nor their titles prejudiced in case they embraced the doctrines of Rome.

“That the infanta's family, being strangers, may be catholics, and shall have a decent place appointed for celebrating divine service according to the church of Rome; and the ecclesiastics and religious persons enjoy the liberty of wearing their religious habits.

“That the marriage should be celebrated in Spain by a procurator, according to the instructions of the council of Trent; and after the infanta's arrival in England, such solemnization should be used as may render the marriage valid according to the laws of that kingdom.

“That the princess should have a competent number of chaplains, and a confessor, being strangers, one of whom should have power to govern her family in religious matters.”

Though these articles excited the clamour of the nation, yet, if we except that part which permits the religious and ecclesiastics to wear their proper habits, they differ very little from those afterwards agreed upon by the same prince and a princess of France, and which were approved of by the English parliament. Gondomar had, however, no authority to conclude the marriage on these terms. The whole intention of the Spanish court seems to have been only to amuse the king in order to prevent his sending a powerful assistance to the protestants in Germany.

Notions of liberty never prevailed more strongly in Europe than at this period; even Hungary, Bohemia, and Austria, were as jealous of their rights as the English themselves. The spirit of independence had taken root in Germany ever since the reign of Charles V. The example of the inhabitants of the United Provinces was always present with these people, who pretended to the same privileges, and thought themselves in a better condition to demand them, than even the Hollanders themselves. The emperor Matthias having procured his cousin Ferdinand of Austria, to be elected nominal king of Hungary and Bohemia, and obliged the other archdukes to yield him up Austria, the inhabitants of these three states joined in complaining, that sufficient regard had not been shewn to their privileges; religion also made a part of the grievance of the Bohemians, who soon became furious.

In the midst of these confusions, Matthias paid the debt of nature, and Ferdinand of Austria was placed on the imperial throne. This new dignity, however, made no impression upon the protestants of Bohemia, whose power was now considerable. They insisted on having liberty to rebuild the churches which had been thrown down by the catholics; upon which the council of state issued a declaration against the protestants, peremptorily refusing to grant their request. Exasperated at this denial, they repaired to the palace, and threw three of the emperor's officers out of the window. This outrage exposed them to the fury of Ferdinand. They knew they had nothing to expect from his clemency, and therefore determined either to succeed in an attempt to recover their liberties, or perish in the glorious cause. They considered themselves as entitled to depose a king they had not elected, and actually made a tender of their crown to the Elector Palatine, son-in-law to the king of England. Frederick accepted the offer, and was actually elected king of Bohemia. James complained of this proceeding in the electors, as disloyal, imprudent, and dishonourable. He could by no means approve of the maxims of elective governments, and was persuaded that Ferdinand, by a kind of prescriptive right, had acquired a lawful title to Bohemia. He accused his son-in-law of forcing him either to desert his cause, or break off his negotiation with Spain. He also complained of his duplicity, in having desired his advice with regard to his accepting the crown of Bohemia, and actually received it before the messenger could arrive at London. The popularity of Frederick's cause was, notwithstanding these reproaches, so great in England, that James found himself under a kind of necessity of doing something in his favour. He could not, however, be prevailed upon to give his son-in-law the title of king of Bohemia; and issued orders, forbidding the clergy to pray for him in the churches under that appellation.

A.D. 1619. The new emperor, Ferdinand II. who possessed greater abilities than generally fell to the share of the Austrian princes, prepared himself, with great diligence, for the recovery of his authority. Besides the assistance of his subjects who adhered to the catholic religion, he attached to his interest a powerful combination of the neighbouring potentates; all the catholic princes of the empire declared in his favour; even the elector of Saxony, the most powerful among the protestants, and the king of Poland, espoused his cause. The Spanish monarch, who considered his own interest as inseparably connected with the younger branch of his family, sent him powerful succours from Italy, and from the Low Countries, and also furnished large sums of money for the support of Ferdinand and the catholic religion. Gondomar was also ordered to continue the delusive negotiation, in order to prevent James from assisting his son-in-law. That artful minister, by his insinuating manners, and a large sum of money judiciously distributed, soon gained the ascendancy over the king, the favourite, and the ministry; so that, in effect, he governed the whole kingdom. James, who, above all things, dreaded the breaking off a match on which his affections were so warmly fixed, and, at the same time, desirous of acquiring the title of The Pacific King, instead of taking any vigorous measures to support his son-in-law, had again recourse to his ruinous method of negotiation. He sent the lord Doncaster to mediate a peace in the empire; but Ferdinand would scarce favour him with an audience, and the embassy immediately became abortive.

A.D. 1620. The affairs of Germany now hastened to a crisis. Ferdinand having collected a powerful army, under the command of the duke of Bavaria and the count de Bucquoy, marched against Frederick in Bohemia. At the same time, Spinola assembled an army army of thirty thousand veterans in the Low Countries; and when Edmonds, James's resident at Brussels, demanded of the archduke Albert the meaning of those large preparations, he was told, that Spinola had received his orders immediately from Madrid, and that the king of Spain alone knew the purpose for which the forces were intended. In the mean time, the Elector Palatine was put under the ban of the empire, and the execution of it committed to the elector of Saxony, who immediately entered and subdued Lusatia. The war now raged with great fury in the bowels of Germany; and James, unable any longer to resist the solicitations of his subjects, who offered to advance very large sums to support the right of the Elector Palatine to the crown of Bohemia, gave leave for Sir Horace Vere to command a small body of forces for the preservation of the Palatinate. This little army consisted of two thousand two hundred men, composed chiefly of volunteers, and headed by the intrepid earls of Oxford and Essex: the company of the latter consisted of three hundred gentlemen, fifty of whom he paid out of his own pocket; and a kind of promise was extorted from James, that he would suffer two more regiments to be sent after them. Those brave volunteers were landed in Holland, passed the Rhine below Wesel, and were escorted to Frankfort by a body of troops under prince Frederick Henry of Nassau. On the first of October, they joined the Palatine army, commanded by the Margrave of Anspach. They arrived, however, only time enough to be the melancholy witnesses of the destruction of that cause they came to support. The duke of Bavaria having joined the imperial general in Bohemia, advanced towards Prague, in the neighbourhood of which the Elector Palatine was posted. For some days, the two armies faced each other; but on the eighteenth of November, a battle was fought, which decided the fate of the Bohemian crown. The Elector Palatine was totally defeated, and fled, with his wife and family, to Holland. The inhabitants of Prague opened their gates to the Imperialists; and the unfortunate Frederick saw himself abandoned by all his friends and allies, except count Mansfeldt, who still preserved his fidelity. The complaints of the people against the timid and pusillanimous conduct of James were now both loud and alarming. It was said publicly, that he had not only deprived the elector of that assistance which the English were both willing and able to afford him, but also had deterred other princes from espousing his quarrel.

It cannot be supposed that James was unwilling to preserve the Palatinate; but he was so much infatuated by the persuasions of Gondomar, that he believed the most effectual expedient for that purpose was the marriage of his son with the Infanta of Spain; and that the treaty he was negotiating for that purpose, would infallibly miscarry if he took any vigorous measures in favour of the elector. Besides, his aversion to war was insuperable: he never dreamed that his peaceable disposition tended only to expose him to contempt: he considered not that the Spanish match itself was attended with such difficulties, that all his art of negotiation would never be able to remove, much less that this alliance could safely be depended upon as the means of procuring the great advantages he expected from it.

A. D. 1621. James seems, however, at last to have determined to pursue vigorous measures; and flattered himself with receiving large supplies from the parliament, which met on the twenty-first of January. He opened the session with a long speech from the throne, in which he explained the duties of parliaments, expatiated on his own necessities, and demanded supplies for the relief of the Palatinate, in the defence of which he declared he would hazard his crown, and the life of his own son, should his endeavours to procure a reasonable peace miscarry. The commons, extremely incensed against the ambitious proceedings of the house of Austria, immediately granted the king two subsidies, with which

James was satisfied for the present. This affair being discussed, the commons received petitions against the increase of popish recusants, monopolies, and projectors. The king had farmed to certain individuals the power of licensing taverns and public houses; and granted to Sir Giles Mompesson and Francis Michelan an exclusive patent for the sale of gold and silver lace. By virtue of this privilege, they had been guilty of such scandalous frauds and extortion, that upon complaint being made to the upper house, they were ordered to be committed to prison. Mompesson, however, found means to escape; but he was degraded from the honour of knighthood, and his estate confiscated. His companion in iniquity was sentenced to do public penance in the street, sitting on horseback with his face towards the tail, to pay a fine of a thousand pounds, and to be imprisoned for life.

Perceiving with what eagerness the two houses proceeded against these delinquents, James began to fear for his favourite, who had been the author of these monopolies. He therefore went to the house of peers; and in a speech filled with the most affectionate expressions, assured the parliament, that had he known of these grievances, he would have punished the authors with the utmost severity: at the same time, cautioning the house not to credit every report; lest the innocent should suffer instead of the guilty. The house understood his meaning, and endeavoured not to trace the evil to its source.

Soon after, lord chancellor Bacon, viscount St. Albans, was impeached by the commons: upon which the king again repaired to the house; and, in a speech, represented the necessity of punishing corrupt judges; and solicited farther subsidies, as the supplies granted by the commons were already expended in subsisting the Elector Palatine and his family, who had taken refuge in Holland. He observed, that large sums would be necessary for defraying the expence of sending extraordinary ambassadors to all the courts of Europe, as well as in maintaining an army to act with vigour, if the negotiations proved abortive: and concluded with protesting, that he would not dissolve the parliament till all the affairs then under consideration should be fully determined.

Bacon was a nobleman equally admired for the greatness of his genius, and beloved for his courteous and affable demeanor: but his want of economy, and his indulgence to his servants, had involved him in debts; and in order to supply his necessities, he had been tempted to take bribes from suitors in chancery. It is, however, affirmed, that notwithstanding this enormous abuse, he still maintained, in the seat of justice, an unshaken integrity; and had given such just and equitable decrees, that none of them were ever afterwards questioned or reversed. Conscious of his guilt, he imprecated the mercy of his judges, and endeavoured, by a general confession, to avoid the shame of a public inquiry. But the lords were inexorable, and insisted on a full confession of all his corrupt practices. He acknowledged twenty-eight articles, and was condemned to pay a fine of forty thousand pounds, to be imprisoned in the Tower during his majesty's pleasure, to be for ever incapable of enjoying any office or employment, and of sitting any more in parliament. This severe sentence he survived five years; and being soon after released from his confinement, he retired into the country, and displayed such abilities in literature, as have thrown a veil over his guilt, or rather his weakness: his genius only is admired by posterity. He has left a striking lesson to those of the human species who are born for the instruction of mankind, how much preferable the exercise of their talents is to the attractions of ambition.

In the mean time, the bold spirit of the commons was growing imperceptibly. Nothing escaped their attention and vigilance. It was in this parliament the two parties, afterwards known by the names of

Whigs

Whigs and Tories, were first formed; and of whom it may be said, that if they have often threatened the government with total dissolution, they have, notwithstanding, been the real cause of its constant life and vigour. Under the princes of the house of Tudor, the great council of the nation were, in reality, nothing more than slaves to the court. Tho' they retained the privilege of making laws and granting the people's money, they suffered themselves to be led into the most passive obedience. Without emulation, without principles, without zeal for the security of the subject, without spirit in public business, they seemed ignorant of the English constitution, as founded on Magna Charta, or at least abandoned it to the absolute power of the sovereign. But now the spirit of liberty, or rather of independence, revived, and every transaction of government became a subject of discussion. The commons enquired into the smallest grievances, and examined the rights of the crown even in the minutest articles. They drew up a spirited remonstrance, which they proposed to present to his majesty, wherein they observed, "That the power of the house of Austria threatened the liberties of Europe; that the progress of the catholic religion in England, occasioned the most alarming apprehensions, lest it should once more gain the ascendant in the kingdom; that the king's lenity towards the professors of that religion, had increased their arrogance and presumption; that the uncontested conquests made by the Austrian family, had raised the expectations of the English papists; while the expectation of the Spanish match inspired them with the most sanguine hopes of procuring, if not a final establishment, at least an entire toleration of their religion." They then proceeded humbly to offer to his majesty the following remedies against these growing evils: "That he should immediately undertake the defence of the Palatinate by force of arms; that he should declare war against Spain, whose arms and riches formed the chief bulwark of the catholic religion in Europe; that he would engage in no negotiations for the marriage of his son, but with a protestant princess; that the children of popish recusants should be taken from their parents, and committed to the care of protestant teachers and schoolmasters; and that the fines and confiscations to which the catholics were subject by the law, should be exacted with the utmost rigour."

The king was at Newmarket when he heard of this unprecedented remonstrance, and immediately wrote a letter to the speaker, in which he sharply rebuked the house for debating openly on matters far above their reach and capacity, and strictly forbade them to meddle with any thing that regarded his government or deep matters of state; and especially not to touch on his son's marriage with a daughter of Spain, nor to attack the honour of that king, or any of his friends and confederates. In order the more to intimidate them, he mentioned the imprisonment of Sir Edwin Sandys; and though he declared that his confinement was not owing to any offence committed in the house, yet he plainly told them, "that he thought himself justly entitled to punish every misdemeanor in parliament, as well during its sitting as after its dissolution; and that he intended, for the future, to chastise every man whose insolent behaviour should give occasion for offence."

This letter was so far from producing the effects intended by his majesty, that it threw the house into a flame. They knew their own strength too well to be intimidated at James's menaces. Instead of retracting what they had done, they entered with greater freedom than ever on the national grievances, and the dangerous state of the reformed religion both at home and abroad. They formed a new remonstrance, drawn up indeed in very respectful terms, but not less bold and spirited than the former. After reminding him with the cheerfulness with which they undertook to assist him in the defence of the Palatinate, they observed, "That their zeal for the protestant religion and the interest of his majesty's family, had induced them to represent the dangers with which both were threatened, and to point out remedies for those evils: that by his letter to the speaker, he seemed determined to deprive them of the parliamentary liberty to speak freely in the house, and also of the jurisdiction which the house exercised over its own members; they therefore begged he would not violate a privilege which was their undoubted right, and which they inherited from their ancestors; a right which he himself had confirmed in his speeches to the parliament, and without which it would be impossible to discuss and determine the affairs that might fall under their cognizance."

This resolute answer in the commons raised every spark of regal pride in the composition of James. His answer was short, peremptory, and suitable to that spirit of kingly power which filled his breast. After explaining his intentions with regard to the prerogative in very clear and explicit terms, he concluded his reply with regard to the rights and privileges of parliament in the following manner: "And although we cannot allow the stile, calling it your undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wished you had said, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us (for most of them grew by precedents, which rather shew toleration than inheritance); yet we are pleased to give our royal assurance, that, as long as you continue yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties and privileges as any of our ancestors were, nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative; so as your house shall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown, which would enforce us, or any just king, to retrench them of their privileges, that would pare his prerogative and the flowers of his crown. But of this we hope there will never be cause given."

This answer, which is dated at Newmarket the eleventh of December, breathes all the spirit of despotism. The house of commons were justly alarmed. They saw their title to every privilege, if not plainly denied, yet considered at least as very precarious. He plainly told them it might be forfeited by abuse, and they had already abused it. They therefore resolved to grant no supply till they received satisfaction from James for the breach of their privileges, and drew up the following protestation, which is so very remarkable, that it will be necessary to give it at full length. "The commons now assembled in parliament, being justly occasioned thereunto, concerning sundry liberties, franchises, and privileges of parliament, among others here mentioned, do make the following protestation: That the liberties, franchises, and jurisdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the subjects of England; and that the urgent and arduous affairs concerning the king, state, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England; and the maintenance and making of laws, and redress of mischiefs and grievances, which daily happen within this realm, are proper subjects and matter of council and debate in parliament, and that in the handling and proceeding of those businesses, every member of the house of parliament hath, and of right, ought to have, freedom of speech to propound, treat, reason, and bring to conclusion the same; and that the commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of these matters, in such order as in their judgment shall seem fittest; and that every member of the said house hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation (other than by censure of the house itself) for or concerning any speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament or parliamentary business. And that if any of the said members be complained of and questioned for any thing

" thing done or said in parliament, the same is to be shewn to the king by the advice and assent of all the commons assembled in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information."

Informed of these increasing heats and jealousies that prevailed in the lower house, James hurried to town from Newmarket, determined to exert the regal authority with which he was intrusted, and convince the commons that they had proceeded too far in asserting their liberties. On his arrival, he sent immediately for the journal book of the commons, and before the council, tore out, with his own hand, the above protestation, which he considered as an insult on his prerogative. At the same time he declared it absolutely null and void, because it was voted tumultuously at a late hour, and in a very thin house; and because it was expressed in such general and ambiguous terms, as might be considered as a sufficient foundation for the most enormous crimes, and extended to the most unwarrantable usurpations on the prerogative of the crown. Soon after he dissolved the parliament by proclamation, in which he made an apology to the public for his whole conduct. Some of the leaders among the commons he committed to prison, and sent others to execute a commission in Ireland. At last he prohibited all discourse on public affairs, as if he had power to prevent the people from speaking on those subjects, in which they were most interested; an authority enjoyed not by the most despotic monarch.

A prohibition of this kind tended only to heighten the animosities of the parties. Every nation piques itself on discussing the principles of government. One party exalted the royal prerogative, the other parliamentary liberty. The source of authority, its extent and its limits were examined; discussions so much the more dangerous, as the first laws being always imperfect, and remoter ages covered with obscurity, there is inexhaustible matter for opposition and dispute. By means of argument, the republic spirit increased, and formed a system of which it was easy to see the dreadful consequences. If James had not had recourse to maxims capable of striking the English with awe, that system of independence would then have taken place, which, after disturbing his whole reign, brought his successor to the scaffold.

A. D. 1622. Though James had already seen the consequence of fruitless negotiations in Germany, he still pursued the same plan which had already rendered him sufficiently contemptible. He dispatched Digby to the emperor, desiring a cessation of hostilities. The minister was referred to the duke of Bavaria, who commanded the Austrian armies. The duke told him that there needed no treaty for that purpose, since hostilities were already ceased by his having taken possession of the Palatinate, which he intended to keep till a final accommodation should take place between the contending parties. Notwithstanding this gross insult, and though every circumstance concurred to convince James that the emperor industriously eluded all his applications, that weak monarch had the meanness to follow Ferdinand thro' all his evasions, and renew the conferences at Brussels.

Frederick, finding the pacific endeavours of his father-in-law were ineffectual, embraced some favourable circumstances arising from the expiration of the truce between Spain and the States-general, and the jealousies of the Germans excited by the increasing power of the house of Austria, to make a final effort for the recovery of his dominions. Three considerable armies were raised, and commanded by three able generals, Christian, duke of Brunswick, the prince of Baden, and count Mansfeldt. But the same ill success still pursued the unfortunate Frederick. Count Tilly, at the head of the Imperial army, defeated the duke of Brunswick, and soon after the prince of Baden. Mansfeldt, though his army was greatly inferior in numbers, still continued the war; but not being supported with money either by the Palatinate or the king of England, he could act only on the defensive. These misfortunes, joined to the persuasions of James, who was desirous that his son-in-law should lay down his arms, entirely disheartened that prince, who retired to Sedan, where he remained an unwelcome guest with his uncle the duke of Brunswick. Count Mansfeldt was dismissed from his employment; and that famous general retired with his army into the Low Countries, where he was received into the pay of the states-general. In the mean time the weakness of James rendered him contemptible in every court of Europe; it was even extended so far as to paint him sometimes with a scabbard without a sword, and sometimes with a sword which a number of persons were trying in vain to draw out of the scabbard.

Though the king of Bohemia was always persuaded that a vigorous opposition always bids fairest for obtaining equitable terms, yet the repeated requests of his father-in-law, had forced him to abandon his maxim, and now, when it was too late, he repented of his folly. Count Tilly, after the retreat of Mansfeldt, lost not a moment to harass the Palatinate. He besieged and took Heidelberg, the richest city in it, and sent its fine libraries of books to Rome. The castle was bravely defended by Herbert, an English colonel, who, after performing prodigies of valour, was killed with a musquet ball. Tilly next made himself master of Manheim, notwithstanding the noble defence made by the garrison commanded by Sir Horace Vere.

James now gave up all thoughts of recovering the Palatinate from the emperor. But he still flattered himself that if he could accomplish his son's marriage with the infanta of Spain, he should be able to obtain, by the assistance of that court, the territories of his son-in-law, and re-instate him in his former dignity. Ferdinand, however, determined to prevent him from executing his project. He assembled a diet at Ratibon, in which he declared, "that the elector palatine, having been guilty of high-treason, his estates, goods and dignities were forfeited; but being unwilling to diminish the number of electors, he ordered that Maximilian of Bavaria, should be invested with the electorate palatine."

The eyes of the English were now turned fully towards Spain, where Digby, earl of Bristol, had the sole management of the negotiation for the marriage. Bristol was a nobleman of great abilities, and had formerly disapproved of entering into any engagements with Spain; but appeared now so convinced of the sincerity of that court, that he wrote a letter to James, felicitating him on the entire accomplishment of his views and projects: a daughter of Spain, whom he represented as extremely amiable, would soon, he said, be conducted into England, and bring with her an immense fortune of two millions, a sum four times greater than ever given with any other princess. The truth is, that the court of Spain had hitherto carried on the negotiation merely to amuse the English monarch; but perceiving that James was determined, on any terms, to complete the alliance, it was thought that so favourable an opportunity of restoring the catholic faith in England should not be neglected, as it seemed more than probable, it might easily be effected by means of the infanta, and her numerous train of domestics and dependents, who were to enjoy the free exercise of their religion. Pursuant to this resolution, the behaviour of the Spanish court was now entirely changed, and appeared as eager to conclude the negotiation, as before to find excuses for deferring it. The only difficulty, consisted in extorting from the English monarch such concessions as might contribute to complete the favourite design, and which the impatience of James gave the greatest reason to expect; that the only obstacles that now remained to the completion of the marriage were those relating to religion.

The earl of Bristol, ever since his arrival in Spain, had been employed in settling those preliminaries.

At last the court of Spain made their final demands with regard to that particular, and the earl of Bristol sent them immediately to his master. James made some difficulty of agreeing to these articles; but his desire of completing the marriage at last got the better of his prudence: he signed the articles, and sent them back to Spain. Among all the concessions favourable to the catholics, none gave greater disgust to the English than that in which the king engaged that the children of the prince and the Infanta should be educated by their mother till they were ten years of age; a condition which could only be stipulated with a view of implanting in their tender minds the strongest prejudices in favour of the Romish religion; and though so early an age might seem little susceptible of any lasting impressions, yet the same motive which prompted the Spanish monarch to insert it, should have induced the king of England to reject it. Besides the public treaty, there were several private articles, by which both the king and prince of Wales engaged to suspend the penal laws against the catholics, to obtain a repeal of them from the parliament, and to tolerate the exercise of the popish religion in private houses.

A.D. 1623. Every previous step being thus adjusted, nothing was wanting to conclude the marriage but the pope's dispensation, which was considered merely as a formality. Elated by this success, James triumphed in his pacific councils, and consoled himself for the contempt he had incurred in all the courts of Europe, in having tamely suffered his son-in-law to be stripped of his estates and dignity. But while he was boasting of his superior wisdom and sagacity, his flattering prospects were ruined by the rashness of a man whom he had raised from a private station to be the curse of himself, his family, and his people.

Buckingham, who was now as much in favour with the prince as with the king, and seemed to direct all the affairs of the kingdom, was envious of the great credit obtained by Bristol in the Spanish negotiation. The ambitious favourite therefore determined to supplant him, or, at least, to share in the honour of concluding a treaty so agreeable to the king. He persuaded the prince to undertake a journey to the court of Madrid in person, in order to bring home his mistress the Infanta. He represented to him, that the romantic nature of the adventure could not fail of attracting the admiration and affection of that monarch and his subjects, and of introducing him to the princess under the character of a fond lover, rather than of a stately husband; that the negotiation with regard to the Palatinate, which had hitherto languished in the hands of ministers, would quickly be terminated by so illustrious an agent, seconded by the mediation and intreaties of the grateful Infanta: that the Spanish generosity, excited by so uncommon an instance of trust and confidence, would undoubtedly make concessions far beyond what could be expected from political views and considerations.

Inflamed with these generous and romantic ideas, so peculiarly adapted to the minds of youth, Charles embraced the proposal with rapture, and it was agreed to make application to the king for leave to carry the design into execution immediately. They chose the moment when James was in the most kind and jovial humour; and by importunities, rather than the force of their reasons, they extorted from him a hasty and unguarded consent.

But the prince and Buckingham had hardly left the king, before he repented of his weakness: every difficulty occurred with a peculiar force, and the danger to which the prince's person must be exposed, affected him in a very sensible manner. He reflected, that however pardonable this romantic expedition might be considered in youth, it must reflect disgrace on mature age: that if the professions of the Spanish monarch were sincere, a few months only must finish the negotiation, and bring the Infanta to England, without exposing his only son, the heir of his crown, to the prop of his age, to so dangerous an undertaking; and if he was not sincere, the loss would be absolutely irretrievable.

Full of these reflections, the king determined to recal his promise, and prevent, by a timely opposition, an undertaking which, if unfortunate, must render him at once both infamous to his people, and ridiculous to all posterity. Accordingly when the prince and Buckingham returned for their dispatches, James informed them of the reasons which had prevailed upon him to change his resolution, and begged they would bury all thoughts of so ridiculous an adventure in the pit of forgetfulness. The prince was greatly affected at this disappointment, but answered only with tears. Buckingham assumed the air of authority, and told the king, that this retraction of his promise so soon after it was given, must render all his declarations for ever after suspected; that the word of a king ought to be sacred, and never broken but by the most powerful reasons, or absolute necessity.

James, who was unable to make any effectual opposition to the designs of the prince and favourite, renewed his consent, proper directions were given for the journey, and the prince, with Buckingham, and their two attendants, Sir Francis Cottington, the prince's secretary, and Endymion Porter, gentleman of his bed-chamber, with Sir Richard Graham, master of the horse to Buckingham, passed, disguised and undiscovered, through France. They even ventured to appear in a court ball at Paris, where Charles saw the princess Henrietta, then in the bloom of youth and beauty.

They reached Madrid on the eleventh day after their departure, where every body was surprized at a step so very unusual among the princes of that age. Penetrated with gratitude for the unbounded confidence reposed in him by the prince, Philip paid him a visit immediately after he was informed of his arrival; made him the warmest protestations of friendship; shewed him every respect in the power of majesty to bestow; and presented him with a golden key which opened all his apartments, that the prince might have free access to him at all hours. He gave him the upper hand on all occasions, except in the apartments assigned for his residence, where he said the prince was at home. The same pomp and ceremonies were used when Charles first visited the palace, as were common at the coronation of the kings of Spain; and the council received public orders to obey him as the king himself. Every kind of rejoicing was used throughout the kingdom; and all the prisons were thrown open, that even those who before languished in confinement might share in the general joy. Nor was any advantage taken of the prince's preference to impose any harder condition of the treaty. In the mean time, pope Gregory XV. who had granted the dispensation, died, and Urban VIII. was placed in the pontifical chair. This event induced the nuncio not to deliver the dispensation till it could receive the sanction of Urban; who hoping that some expedient might be discovered, during the prince's residence in Spain, to effect his conversion to the catholic faith, delayed the dispensation.

This dilatory method of proceeding occasioned great uneasiness both to the king of England and the prince. Philip perceived it, and neglected nothing in his power to dissipate every apprehension, and prevail upon the prince to wait till the dispensation could be procured from the court of Rome; but, at the same time, he made not the least difficulty of granting him permission to return. He even caused a pillar to be erected on the spot where they parted, as a monument of their mutual friendship. And the prince, having sworn to the observance of all the articles in the marriage treaty, set out, attended by a numerous train of the Spanish nobility, for St. Andero, where he embarked on board an English vessel, sent by the king for that purpose.

Never prince more engaged the affections of the Spaniards than Charles. His character, composed of decency, reserve, modesty, and sobriety, rendered him very agreeable to that people. They were in love with his unparalleled confidence; and the romantic gallantry he had practised towards their princess. At the same time, his advantageous figure, and the blooming graces of youth that adorned his countenance, endeared him to the whole court of Madrid, and made deep impressions on the heart of the Infanta. Had the character of Buckingham been equal to that of the prince, every thing had succeeded according to their wishes; but that nobleman was as much despised and hated as the prince was esteemed and beloved. His dissolute pleasures, his follies of passion, his arrogant, impetuous temper, rendered him the object of the Spaniards aversion, and he was, in general, treated with contempt.
very

Conscious of the affronts he had given to the court of Spain, and fearful of the influence of the Infanta when she arrived in England, he determined to employ all his credit to prevent the marriage from being concluded. But it seemed a difficult task to prevail upon the prince to treat a court, where he had received the most distinguished favours, with ingratitude; and, if possible, still more difficult to induce James to break off a treaty, the accomplishment of which had so long been the object of his wishes, and which he had now so nearly brought to a successful and happy issue. At this distance of time it is impossible to know the reasons he made use of to accomplish his design: it only appears that he maintained an entire ascendant over both the king and his son. James, indeed, made some opposition; and had the earl of Bristol arrived in that critical moment, perhaps the impetuous and turbulent minister had sunk under the burden of his own crimes; but the king wanted spirit and resolution to resist the importunities of Buckingham; he sacrificed both honour and integrity to the folly of his minion.

Peremptory orders were sent to the earl of Bristol for breaking off all negotiations, just at the time when that minister had, in all appearance, accommodated every difference between the contracting parties, and the Spaniards were on the point of delivering up the Infanta. Philip was not surprized at this change of sentiments in the British court: he was no stranger to the disgust of Buckingham; and believing him a man capable of sacrificing to his own ungovernable passions the dearest interests of his king and country, he suspected that the unbounded ambition of that favourite would be employed to foment a quarrel between the two nations.

A. D. 1624. The dispensation reached Spain soon after the departure of Charles and Buckingham, and the Infanta had immediately assumed the title of princess of Wales. Philip was therefore very unwilling to break off the treaty, especially as he foresaw that a rupture between the two crowns would be the inevitable consequence; and determined that nothing on his part should be wanting to complete the marriage, and maintain the harmony that now subsisted between Spain and England. He, on the eighth of January, sent the earl of Bristol a written promise, by which he engaged to procure the restoration of the Palatinate, either by treaty or force of arms. But when he found that this concession was disregarded, he ordered the Infanta to lay aside the title of princess of Wales, and to drop the study of the English language. At the same time, he issued orders for making preparations for war in every part of his dominions, persuaded that the court of England would not stop at the violation of the marriage treaty.

The resolution of James to break off all connections with Spain was no sooner known to the people, than they celebrated the rupture with bonfires, and other public demonstrations of joy. Buckingham, by giving a partial, and, in many instances, a false account of the negotiation, easily inflamed those spirits which were already prejudiced against Spain. Elogiums were poured upon him, as one of the best of subjects; he was called the deliverer of his country. James, who wanted firmness of mind to resist the impetuosity of the nation, was swept away with the torrent, and obliged, contrary to his natural principles, to follow those violent resolutions that led inevitably to war. He assembled a parliament in order to obtain supplies. In his speech to the two houses, James dropped some hints of the causes of complaint he had against Spain; and graciously condescended to ask their advice, which he had ever before rejected, with regard to the conduct of so important an affair as the marriage of his son. The commons promised to assist him in revenging the affront put upon him by Spain: for Buckingham, by laying before a committee of both houses a long and partial account, which he pretended was a true and complete narrative of all the steps taken in the Spanish negotiation, had intirely gained the confidence of that assembly. It contained, indeed, so many contradictory circumstances, that they were sufficient to open the eyes of every reasonable man, notwithstanding the artful veil which was thrown over the whole proceedings. But the narrative concurred so well with the passions and prejudices of the parliament, that no scruple was made of immediately adopting it as a truth that could not be disputed. Charmed with having at last the opportunity, so long and so ardently desired, of going to war with papists, they thought not of future consequences, but immediately advised the king to break off both treaties with Spain, as well that which regarded the marriage, as that for the restitution of the Palatinate.

The two houses having thus given their voice for a war, joined in a petition to the king, that he would cause the laws against Romish priests and jesuits to be strictly executed; that he would issue orders for seizing the arms of popish recusants, and obliging them to retire from the capital; that he would revoke all licences granted to such recusants, and put a stop to the great concourse of people who resorted to hear mass in the chapels of ambassadors; that he would deprive all papists of the posts they enjoyed under the government, and not relax the laws made against popish recusants on any account whatever. James returned a very gracious and condescending answer; but declared himself an enemy to all persecution on account of religion; from a thorough conviction that it always injures the cause it is intended to promote; according to the received maxim, "That the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church." At the same time, he condemned an intire indulgence to the catholics; and strongly hinted, that a middle course ought to be chosen, as at once the most humane and the most political.

James having determined to pursue hostile measures, repaired to the parliament-house, where he declared, in a speech to that assembly, his resolution of humbling the pride of Spain, provided they would engage to support him. He began his harangue with lamenting his misfortune, in being obliged, in his old age, to exchange the blessings of peace for the inevitable calamities of hostile measures. He represented to them the prodigious expence requisite for maintaining military armaments; and demanded a vote of six subsidies and twelve fifteenths, as a proper stock before war was declared against Spain. He mentioned the large debts he had contracted, principally to support the Elector Palatine and his family; but declared, he insisted not on any supply for himself; the honour and security of the kingdom was all he was desirous of supporting. He even so far forgot his prerogative, which he had hitherto so strenuously supported, that he made a dangerous and unexpected concession, that the sums granted should be vested in a committee of parliament, and be issued by them without being intrusted to his management. Nothing could be more agreeable to the commons; they readily accepted the offer, but voted much less than was demanded; three subsidies and three fifteenths was by the commons thought a sufficient sum for the present occasions of the state; nor did they take the least notice of that part of his speech which regarded regarded his own necessities, though he had made a concession greater than they could have even presumed to ask.

But though they were so very parsimonious in their supplies, they took advantage of the present agreement between the king and the parliament, to make fresh attacks upon the prerogative. James had abolished all the monopolies so loudly and so justly complained of; but this did not satisfy the commons; they passed an act, by which it was declared, that all monopolies were contrary to the laws and liberties of the kingdom. By the same statute it was enacted, that every man enjoyed an entire freedom with regard to his own actions, provided he did nothing detrimental to any person; and that no other authority but that of the laws should stop this unlimited right; a principle which served as a basis for the civil liberties of England.

During these transactions, the elector palatine wrote a letter to James, wherein he enumerated the reasons which offered themselves both for continuing the negotiations, and attempting to recover the Palatinate by force of arms. The latter now predominated at the British court, since a resolution had been taken to break off all negotiations with Spain. The indefatigable duke of Brunswick had raised another army for the service of the king of Bohemia, with an intention to force a passage into the Low Countries, and join the prince of Orange. The Dutch, in general, were well inclined to the same cause, and the princes of Germany every day discovered fresh symptoms of discontent at the proceedings of the house of Austria. But above all, the person of the queen of Bohemia, the wisest and most virtuous lady of her age, became now an object of public concern. Her merits, her misfortunes, her young family, and the unworthy treatment she had received, like so many charms, animated every protestant, who was not wholly a stranger to the dictates of humanity. James himself was sometimes warmed into compassion, and sometimes into resentment. He had spared her and her family a little of the scanty remainder his profusion had spared, and they lived on good terms with the prince of Orange, who was at that time sincerely disposed to have served them, could James have been prevailed upon to trust the Dutch, or they to put any confidence in him.

But amidst these good dispositions, difficulties intervened, which blasted all their effects. The insolence of the Dutch traders, and their cruelty towards the English in the East-Indies, were so great, that James at last yielded to the repeated instances of his subjects, and gave the earl of Oxford the command of a small squadron of ships, in order to intercept the Dutch East-India fleet in their return to Europe. By a treaty lately concluded, the Dutch and the English were to divide between them the trade of the islands they had taken from the Portuguese and Spaniards; the English to enjoy one third, and the Dutch two thirds of this valuable trade. Accordingly, English factories had been settled in the Molucca islands, and at Banda. A few English merchants, not more than eighteen or twenty, had, for above two years, lived at Amboyna, where there was a Dutch fort and two companies of soldiers, besides a civil establishment. For some time, a correspondence subsisted between the two people; but the Dutch, envying the prosperous state of the English factory, determined to ruin them. A conspiracy was accordingly formed against their lives, of so detestable a nature, as is hardly credible to those who do not sufficiently reflect on the rancour of a people towards their rivals in trade; especially when the scene is not only sufficiently distant from all seats of justice, but where they themselves preside, uncontrouled, in the exercise of their tyranny, and blinded by the motives of interest. It was pretended that the English and the Japanese, the whole not exceeding forty persons, had formed a design for destroying the Dutch settlement. Upon this Gabriel Towerson, the chief agent, and the rest of the English then upon the island, were taken into custody, and strictly examined by the Dutch council. No witnesses of credit appeared against them; and the unhappy prisoners, conscious of their innocence, denied the fact with the strongest asseverations. But it had been before determined to put them to death, and only some pretence was wanting for carrying the bloody design into execution. The rack was therefore to supply the place of evidence, and the tortures were so dreadful, that even conscious innocence was unable to support them. Some sought relief by confession; but on obtaining the mercy of being put to death, they solemnly retracted their confessions with their latest breath; but others, with matchless fortitude, expired under their tortures. By this horrid proceeding the Dutch continued masters of the spice trade, and have ever since kept it in their own hands. No reparation was, however, obtained for this insolent affront, till many years after, when Cromwell held the reins of government. That usurper obliged them to pay three hundred thousand pounds on that account. It, however, prevented a junction between the armies designed to reduce the Palatinate.

When the earl of Bristol received orders to leave the court of Madrid, he applied for an audience, in order to fulfil the ceremonial of his departure. Philip expressed the highest regret that Bristol's services should meet with so unworthy a reward; and that his enemies should have so far prevailed, as to infuse prejudices into his master and his country against a minister who had so faithfully performed his duty to both. He endeavoured to prevail upon him to engage in his service, promising to bestow upon him every advantage of rank and fortune he himself could desire. But Bristol, though he expressed the utmost gratitude for this generous offer, refused every thing, and determined to return immediately to his own country, not doubting but the torch of truth would soon expose the falshoods of his enemies in their genuine colours. Philip could not even prevail upon him to accept of ten thousand ducats, though his circumstances rendered such a present necessary. The monarch used every intreaty in his power to prevail, and assured him that neither James, nor any one else, should ever know he had received it. "There is one (answered the virtuous minister) who will be privy to the whole transaction; it is the earl of Bristol, and he will certainly reveal it to the king of England."

It was the interest of Buckingham to keep Bristol at a distance from the king and the court, lest the voice of truth, enforced with those powers of oratory which the earl possessed in a very eminent degree, should disclose scenes which he wished to bury in oblivion. He accordingly no sooner heard of the earl's arrival in England, than he made use of all that power he had acquired over the mind of his weak sovereign, for procuring an order for committing Bristol to the Tower, till he had answered certain questions that should be put to him by the council. He was, however, soon after released, but ordered to retire to his own house. The earl wrote to James, loudly demanding an opportunity of vindicating himself, and of laying his whole conduct before his master and the public: he asserted his own innocence, and threw the blame of every miscarriage on Buckingham. He had always flattered himself that the hatred of the minion could not prevail over the justice of his master, as if a weak prince was not generally a dupe to the passions of others. Buckingham was desirous that he should own the pretended faults exhibited against him; but he justly thought a reconciliation offered on such terms a real disgrace. James himself declared, that to require such a thing of an innocent man was the most horrible tyranny. How justly ought he to have reproached himself for suffering so unjust a sentence to take place!

The parliament being prorogued on the twenty-ninth of May, it was necessary to make some preparations for opposing the warlike armament fitting out by

by the court of Spain, and also to assist the count Palatine. Eight citizens of London were appointed as treasurers for the money raised by parliament, and these were assisted by ten other persons from his majesty's council of war. Without a warrant from these, no money could be issued, nor even by their order, on any other account than to defray the expenses of the war; as they were accountable to the commons in parliament. It was computed that the sums granted last session would be sufficient to send twenty-five thousand men into the Palatinate, under the command of an English general. Six thousand only were, however, raised, and sent into Holland to join the army of the States, commanded by the prince of Orange; while another army, under count Mansfeldt, was to penetrate into the Palatinate.

James, still possessed with the idle opinion, that it would disgrace his son, if he took any other than a king's daughter to his bed, sent lord Holland to the court of France with an overture of marriage between the prince of Wales and the princess Henrietta Maria, daughter to Lewis XIII. The proposal being accepted, the conferences were opened at Compeigne, and the marriage articles were signed at Paris on the tenth of November. They were nearly the same in substance with those which had been concluded with Spain; for as Lewis only required the same conditions which had before been granted to his Catholic majesty, James made no scruple to comply. One of the conditions was, that the children should be brought up by the mother; or, what is the same thing, in the catholic religion, till they were thirteen years of age; an article to which the misfortunes of that family are commonly attributed, though it was never put in execution any more than the other articles, which appear to have been dictated by the court of Rome.

While this affair was depending, count Mansfeldt came over to England, where he was received with extraordinary marks of respect, and lodged in apartments, fitted up for his reception, in the palace. After some conferences, it was agreed, that Mansfeldt, at the head of twelve thousand men, should carry on the war in the Lower Palatinate. The French ministry, during the negotiation for the marriage, made large promises, but always couched in general terms, not only of granting the English a passage through France, but also of reinforcing their army with considerable bodies of troops during their march to the Palatinate; but on the arrival of the English, under the command of Mansfeldt, before Calais, they found that no orders had been sent for their admission. This occasioned many dispatches; but the French ministry insisted that they had entered into no positive agreement; and that the granting the count a free passage through France was a matter of too much importance to be hastily admitted. This delay was fatal to the expedition. A pestilential disease broke out among the troops, and swept away great numbers of them daily; and those that remained were so weakened by sickness, and discouraged by misfortunes, that it was thought imprudent to lead them into the Palatinate. Such was the shameful issue of this expedition, and which reflects the highest disgrace on the English ministry.

Though James had laid a solid foundation for putting an end to the troubles in Ireland, he had not been able intirely to complete his plan. The Spaniards still maintained a constant intelligence with the disaffected papists, and kept the English government in continual alarms. The earl of Tyrone having been received into favour by James, and obtained the royal protection, on condition of not relapsing into his former rebellious practices, lived, for some time, in great submission to the government; but imputing all the marks of favour he had received to nothing more than the effects of fear, he had the boldness, soon after, to petition the king for a toleration of the catholic religion. This request being refused, he joined the earl of Tyrconnel, and other chiefs of the Irish papists; and a desperate confederacy was formed for assassinating the lord deputy and the council, and massacring all the English in the kingdom of Ireland. This conspiracy was happily discovered by a letter dropped in the council-chamber; and Tyrone, Tyrconnel, and other principal conspirators, informed of the accident, fled to France, and afterwards to Brussels, where the archduke gave them a noble reception, and settled on them large pensions by express orders from the court of Spain. Soon after, Tyrone undertook to excite another rebellion, and to pass over, with his friends, into Ireland; but the design being discovered before it was ripe for execution, the chiefs who had engaged in the conspiracy were taken and executed.

Great disputes also arose in the Irish council, which continued for several years, and tended greatly to disturb the peace of that kingdom. The papists, supported by Rome and Spain, continued to act with great insolence, and, in some churches, to exercise their own religion. This occasioned the government to issue a severe proclamation against the catholics, ordering all the regular priests to leave Ireland, under the heaviest penalties.

A. D. 1625. • The reign of James now advanced hastily towards a period. The habit of his body, like the state of his kingdom, was alarming. He had long addicted himself to those pleasures which he could not taste; that he might banish from his mind the reflections which he could not bear. He had accustomed himself to the use of sweet wines, and to ride hard, both before and after drinking. This irregular method of living had occasioned several severe fits of illness, which the physicians had rather palliated than removed; for James was too impatient in sickness to submit to any troublesome regimen, in order to obtain a cure. Infirmities therefore increased upon him with age; nor was the approach of the king of terrors to be prevented any longer. The state of his mind contributed to increase the illness of his body. He was highly provoked at the behaviour of Buckingham, he imputed to his headstrong passions all the misfortunes that now surrounded him. He was desirous of humbling that haughty minister; but he wanted power to execute his design. Finding that all attempts, in the present situation of affairs, would be in vain, he composed himself with a sullen kind of resignation, meditating how to take the first opportunity of a friendly hand for his deliverance. Such was the king's situation when the marquis of Hamilton, who hated Buckingham, and who was as likely as any man to serve James in his distress, died suddenly, not without strong suspicions of poison. James considered the death of that nobleman as a sure prelude to his own. "If the branches are cut down, (said he) the stock cannot long stand." From that moment he became pensive and melancholy. He was seized, in the beginning of March, with a tertian ague; and when encouraged by his courtiers with the old proverb, that this distemper, during that season, was health for a king, he replied, that the proverb was meant of a young king. The countess of Buckingham, and some other ladies, who had no great opinion of regular physicians, but thought that life might be rendered immortal by the secrets of empyrics, attended James, whose impatience for health drove him into the same fatal error. Buckingham had, some time before, been cured of a tertian ague by an emetic, a plaister and a posset-drink, which James now insisted should be administered to himself. Buckingham used every argument in his power to dissuade him from taking any thing that was not prescribed by his physicians. But all his reasonings were in vain: James sent for the medicines, and they were given him; according to his request. Every symptom of his disease was immediately augmented, and it was soon evident that he could not long survive. James was himself very sensible of his approaching end, and met the king of terrors with amazing fortitude. His preparations for death were extremely fervent, and he was chiefly assisted in his devotions by lord-keeper Williams. When the prince of Wales was admitted to his presence, to receive his last advice, he exhorted him to maintain a tender affection for his wife, but at the same time to preserve a constancy in religion, to protect the church of England, and to extend his care to the unhappy family of the Palatine. In his last moments he declared he died in the religion of the church of England, and expired on the twenty-seventh of March, in the twenty-third year of his reign, and the fifty-ninth of his age. He had held the sceptre of Scotland almost from his birth.

The character of James having been drawn by writers of different parties, has been exposed to the opposite extremes of calumny and flattery, of satire and panegyric. Nature had delineated on his mind the outlines of many excellent qualities, and several virtues; but leaving her work unfinished, it was shaded by the pencil of vice. His generosity was blended with profusion, his learning with pedantry, his pacific disposition with pusillanimity, and his friendship with boyish fondness and folly. No prince ever ruled his paternal dominions with greater equanimity than James did Scotland; but this was before he tasted the cup of fancied power, which intoxicated his brain. He was desirous of following the examples of the princes of the Tudor line, who had made great breaches in the English constitution. But he did not reflect on the vast difference between their situation and his own. The ignorance, and consequently the timidity of the English, was now vanished; they were resolved to defend with courage what they had acquired by industry. The whole system of property among them was now altered; their minds were enlightened by reading and reflection; their principles of government were founded on the basis of liberty and moderation; their thoughts were now employed on improving foreign commerce and domestic freedom: they no longer admitted oppressive precedents in former reigns to be sufficient authorities for the present times. The doctrine of resistance was preached from the pulpit, and understood in parliament, but with such restrictions as left sufficient room for a king of England to be at once both great and happy.

The pedantic learning of James made him a casuist, but not a politician. He had not the smallest idea of that manly science which ennobles society, which regulates the passions of men in a free state, and which animates, directs and completes the purposes of public spirit. He was void of all conception of the difference between liberty and licentiousness; and endeavoured to erect for himself, in the minds of the people, as strong an opinion of his infallibility, both in religion and politics, as ever the church of Rome had thought to establish among her more deluded votaries. Nothing gave James greater distress, than to hear that his subjects dared dispute or reason upon matters which might lead them to a sense of their true interest as a people; and nothing gave him greater pleasure than to hear and decide in the useless speculative disputes of school-divinity. By pursuing such preposterous measures, he made the great duties of a king subservient to the idle distinctions of a pedant; and by endeavouring to make a figure as a scholar, he sunk into contempt as a man.

James studied to preserve peace rather than tranquillity, the shadow rather than the substance; because the genuine basis of tranquillity is freedom. Though he had held the sceptre almost sixty years, without any sensible reverse of fortune, yet the life of James was very uneven. No prince ever learned more, or profited less by experience. He displayed very considerable abilities while he only filled the Scottish throne; and by making a happy choice of Cecil for his minister, on the death of queen Elizabeth, gave a proof that he knew how to distinguish merit. But Cecil was mortal; and his successors, without his abilities, endeavoured to pursue his schemes. This mistake was fatal to James: for though no minister ever entertained more arbitrary notions than Cecil, yet he knew so well how to manage the English, that it was less dangerous for him than for any other man to pursue them. James was soon convinced of this by experience. The Howards, who continued in the ministry, had not sufficient abilities to guide the machine of government; the Scottish favourites were disagreeable to the nation; and those whom James trusted wanted either honesty or abilities to serve him.

His prodigality, or rather extravagant profusion, rendered him always necessitous. The commons took advantage of it; and finding their assistance was absolutely necessary, they made themselves his masters. One of his favourites seeing a load of silver carrying to the treasury, said to a person who stood near him, "How happy would that money make me!" The king desired to know what he had been saying, and immediately gave him the whole sum, amounting to three thousand pounds. "You think yourself happy, said he; but I am more so in obliging an honest man whom I love."

James was far from being destitute of ambition; but his pusillanimity, both personal and political, prevented him from carrying it to any dangerous height. The latter was, perhaps, much stronger than the former, though some historians have made fear the predominant ingredient in his nature. During his youth, he gave several instances that he wanted neither spirit nor resolution in his person: but his political cowardice had every characteristic of baseness, for he trembled most when he boasted loudest. But when reflection succeeded to boast, his good natural sense soon convinced him that his schemes were impracticable, though his pride always led him to drop them in such a manner, that it exposed his crown and government to as much danger as if he had pursued them. Hence it happened, that among all the concessions he made to his parliament, not one was received with thankfulness; they were always considered as the result of present convenience, or the effects of fear.

In 1617, the royal revenues amounted to four hundred and fifty thousand pounds; and the extraordinary supplies which he drew from parliament during his whole reign, only to three millions. The value of the subsidy was now so considerably diminished, and the tax become so intirely personal, that people only paid it in the counties where they resided, though they possessed lands in others. The parliament was at last obliged to abolish the ancient method, and establish a regular land-tax.

What chiefly distinguishes the reign of James, is the commencement of the English colonies in America, which are now increased to such an amazing height of power and grandeur. Queen Elizabeth had done little more than given a name to the continent of Virginia; and after planting one feeble colony, which soon decayed, that country was entirely abandoned. In the year 1606, Newport carried over a colony, and began a settlement, which the company established for that purpose in London and Bristol took care to furnish with every thing necessary for its success. About three years after, Nargal discovered a nearer and more direct passage to Virginia than had hitherto been known. He left the track of the ancient navigators, who directed their course to the southward of the tropic, sailed westward by means of the trade winds, and then returned to the northward till he reached the English settlements. Nargal stood directly for Virginia, and by that means reached that part of North-America in almost half the time that was necessary by the ancient method.

James had seven children by his consort, Anne of Denmark; but two of them only survived him, namely, Charles, who succeeded him on the throne; and Elizabeth, married to the Elector Palatine.

A. D. THE death of the late monarch made very little change in the cabinet. Buckingham, who had obtained the same ascendancy over Charles as he had formerly over James, had filled the court and council with his creatures, and all the great officers of state were continued. Some alterations were, however, thought necessary; but this was not the time for carrying the design into execution. Williams, bishop of Lincoln, keeper of the great seal, was no friend to Buckingham, and the minister determined to deprive him of his office. Laud, bishop of St. David's, was a sworn enemy to Williams, and intrusted with all the secrets of the cabinet: it was by his direction that the plan of future administration was laid. This was, indeed, no easy task; for though the great nobility had been passive during the government of James, because they saw among the commons a spirit of liberty which they did not approve, yet they were extremely indifferent with regard to affairs of state. They could not bear the haughtiness and insolence of the upstart favourite. Though they were friends to the church, they disliked the churchmen. They considered France and Spain as, in a manner, playing for the English crown; nor were they cordial for forming an alliance with either. Though they entertained a proper sense of their own dignity and importance in the constitution of their country, yet they thought that both were weakened by the vast increase of new nobility created by the Stuart family, under pretence of balancing the growing power of the commons. Hence they attended the court chiefly through duty: they were often admitted to the council, but hardly ever to the cabinet. Even the great officers of state often opposed the will of the favourite, and were therefore not often trusted. The earl of Arundel still continued to absent himself from the court; he was unwilling to countenance, by his presence, measures he could not approve. The earls of Northumberland and Pembroke followed his example, though the latter was chamberlain of the household. Lord Lee, treasurer, and lord Mandeville, president of the council, under pretence of attending the duties of their own offices, concerned themselves very little with the affairs of the cabinet. Weston, chancellor of the exchequer, was, indeed, wholly devoted to the measures of Buckingham; and had he been on the popular side of the question, might have made a considerable figure in the state; but he was known to be at once a sycophant and a papist. The earl of Worcester, lord privy-seal, was a generous, good-natured man, and loved both the king and his family, but he was not turned for business. Hence the king found it so difficult to form an administration conformable to the temper and views of his two favourites, that notwithstanding their hatred of Williams, they were obliged, for some time, to leave the great seal in his custody.

But business now engaged the whole attention of Buckingham. The marriage of the king, and an attempt to recover the Palatinate, were objects that admitted of no delay; and there was a necessity for the parliament to meet in the summer. The favourite rightly conceived, that the friendship of the young queen, and of her brother's court, would be of the utmost importance to him, and he resolved to omit nothing in his power to gain their confidence. The death of James had prevented him from carrying over Charles's proxy, but he now prepared to execute that commission; and a squadron of ships was fitted out for bringing over the queen, who had been espoused, with great magnificence, in the king's name, by the earls of Carlisle and Holland.

The recovery of the Palatinate was an affair of much greater difficulty, though the popularity of the queen of Bohemia's cause was so great, that every obstacle was surmounted: the English were fond of engaging in the cause of their favourite princess. Twelve thousand men were immediately raised by the lieutenants of the several counties. During the march of these troops to Portsmouth, a proclamation was issued for putting martial law into execution against all who should be guilty of such riotous proceedings as had happened among the soldiers commanded by count Mansfeldt. The destination of these troops was as yet a secret: it was only known in general, that they were to be employed in the service of the Palatinate; and that they might be disciplined with greater facility, two thousand of them were sent into Holland, and their place supplied with an equal number of veterans from that republic.

Before Buckingham set out to execute his splendid commission in France, he attempted to engage the Dutch to enter heartily into the alliance against the house of Austria. He knew that his master was highly incensed against the Hollanders, on account of the late massacre at Amboyna, and that the East-India Company was at that time pressing the government for letters of reprisal against them. But this was not conformable to the views of Buckingham; he was desirous of engaging as many powers as possible in a confederacy against the house of Austria. He had, therefore, already opened a negotiation with the courts of Denmark and Sweden, both well affected to the interest of the king of Bohemia. These powers had promised to supply Charles with as many troops as would be sufficient to form an army of between thirty and forty thousand men, eight thousand of whom were to be cavalry.

In the mean time, cardinal Richelieu began to be jealous of Buckingham's greatness: he considered that favourite as the only rival he had in Europe. It was neither for his own interest, nor that of his master, to see an English minister form and direct a confederacy, which, after humbling the house of Austria, might prescribe terms to that of Bourbon. James had always affected to prevent religion from having any thing to do in the quarrel; but Charles soon perceived that this was impossible; and the great art of Richelieu consisted in dividing the question, by making use of the power of England in humbling the house of Austria, so far only as it was convenient to France; and of the house of Austria in advancing the cause of popery, the common interest of all the catholic powers. He entered into this design with infinite address. He placed his own creatures about the person of the English queen, and filled the court of Charles with spies. All these had private instructions to attempt the ruin of Buckingham, by forming a party against him both in the cabinet and the parliament. The earl of Holland, who, by his person and address, was formed for a court, was firmly attached to Buckingham, and had found means to penetrate the secret of Richelieu's intentions. He immediately revealed it to the English minister, whose spirit being as lofty as that of the cardinal, made no secret of his enmity to Richelieu.

Buckingham reached Paris on the twenty-fourth of May; and by his magnificence, spirit, wit, and conversation, attracted the admiration of the French court; court; and it is certain that their beautiful young queen perceived charms in Buckingham which she could not discern in her dull, inanimated husband. Buckingham saw this, and found hardly any other difficulty to his pleasures than decency, and the want of time to make regular approaches. Stung with jealousy, proceeding either from love or policy, the haughty cardinal not only sought an opportunity to surprize and dispatch him in his unlawful amour, but also to make Lewis sensible of his intended dishonour. But pleasure with Buckingham seldom excluded business, and he vigorously pressed the conclusion of the league against the house of Austria. Richelieu, however, took care to lengthen out the negotiation, by a profusion of pleasures and honours which were paid the English minister during the seven days he resided at Paris. But Buckingham was not easily imposed upon. He was exasperated at the remembrance of his alacrity to oblige a people who now so ungenerously requited him, and perceived that he was narrowly watched in his amour with the queen-consort. Unused to be controuled in any of his actions, and impetuous in all his designs, he bore those mortifications with the utmost impatience. It is even said, that he was imprudent enough to throw out some menaces against the French; and that, upon a very frivolous pretence, he returned from Boulogne to Amiens, where he had an interview with the queen of France.

The princess Henrietta-Maria, now queen of England, was received with great splendor and affection by Charles, who met her at Dover, and conducted her to Canterbury, where the marriage was consummated. And notwithstanding the plague raged dreadfully in London, the parliament met at Westminster on the eighteenth of June, where Charles opened the session with a speech from the throne. It was simple and cordial. He slightly mentioned the occasion he had for a supply, but employed no intrigue to influence the members. He would not even allow the officers of the crown, who had seats in the house, to mention any particular sum which might be expected by him. Secure of the affection of the commons, he was resolved that their bounty should be intirely their own deed, unasked, unfollicited; the genuine fruit of sincere confidence and regard.

The business of the supply was accordingly taken into consideration: but though they knew that all the money granted by the last parliament had been expended on naval and military armaments, and that very large anticipations had also been made on the revenues of the crown: though they were not ignorant that Charles was loaded with a large debt contracted by his father; that the public revenues were hardly sufficient for supporting the dignity of the crown, even under the ordinary charges of government; and that the present war, against the whole power of the house of Austria, had been undertaken by their importunate applications and intreaties; yet they thought proper to grant their young monarch no more than an hundred and twelve thousand pounds.

This extraordinary resolution of the parliament was probably occasioned by the libertine principles and conduct of the duke of Buckingham, who was now become odious for his vices. The marriage of the king with a catholic princess had also too much displeased the puritans, to render them indulgent to the court. Independently of these motives, the principal members of the lower house extended their views to future times. Persuaded that the power of the crown had been increased at the expence of the liberties of the people, their object was to confine it within narrow limits. The necessities of the prince were favourable to their designs, and of these they were willing to avail themselves. The right of the commons to grant or refuse the necessary supplies, they considered as an infallible means of gaining the most important concessions. These measures disconcerted the hopes of the king. He had formed the warmest expectations of receiving the most convincing proofs of the love of his subjects; but found that the supplies they granted him were rather a mockery of his wants, than a serious design of supporting him in a war which might justly be styled their own.

Astonished at this inadequate supply, and intirely ignorant of the cause, Charles adjourned the parliament to Oxford, on account of the plague, which now made the most dreadful ravages in the capital. But the change of place had no influence on the commons. Determined to carry their favourite point with regard to the prerogative, they absolutely refused to make any addition to the supply they had voted: even the trifling pittance of forty thousand pounds was refused; though the parliament well knew that a fleet and an army were lying at Portsmouth, in great want of pay and provisions; and that Buckingham, the admiral, and the treasurer of the navy, had advanced, on their own credit, near an hundred thousand pounds for the sea-service. In vain were all the arguments of the courtiers to prevail over the obstinacy of the commons. Governed by a set of men of the most uncommon capacities, and the largest views; formed into a regular party, and united by fixed aims and projects, it was impossible to change them from their purpose. They persevered in their former resolution, though the honour of their country among the potentates of Europe demanded very large supplies. Among these leaders we may mention the names of Sir Edward Coke, Sir Edwin Sandys, Sir Robert Philips, Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Dudley Digges, Sir John Elliot, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, all men of aspiring genius and independent fortune.

The king's notions of the prerogative were, however, very different. Full of the lofty notions of monarchical power, Charles, however moderate in his temper, considered the refusal of the commons as of a criminal and traitorous nature; and when he reflected that they were asked purely to support a war, entered into at their particular request, their behaviour appeared cruel and deceitful. He actually imputed it to a very different principle; for he could not imagine the commons could expect he could carry on the war without supplies. A discovery was, however, now made, which not only furnished the commons with a pretence for their refusal, but also inflamed them against the court in general, and the duke of Buckingham in particular.

James had, some time since, promised to furnish Lewis, who was destitute of a naval force, with one ship of war, and seven armed vessels hired from the merchants, which the French monarch pretended were to be employed against the Genoese, the firm allies of Spain. Charles was now called upon to fulfil the engagement, but the French made no secret that the ships were to be employed against the Hugonots in the siege of Rochelle. Vice-admiral Pennington was on the coast of France with a squadron of men of war, and received an order to employ his ships in whatever service the French ambassador should direct, after filling them with soldiers and marines, under the command of the duke of Montmorency. This was no sooner known, or rather suspected, than the ships crews mutinied, and all, except the Vanguard, which Pennington himself commanded, stood to sea. The admiral, however, went on shore, and offered to go upon any service the French king should order him, but refused to receive on board any soldiers. This refusal exasperated the ambassador, and he gave him to understand, that he was a prisoner if he did not comply; and at the same time informed him, that not more than fifty or sixty Englishmen would be employed in the expedition. It was in vain for Pennington to remonstrate against the cruelty and injustice of this proceeding, and to represent the uneasiness of his sailors, who would not fail to refuse obedience to any such commands.

mands. The ambassador, however, was resolute; and Pennington thought it prudent to dissemble his real sentiments, that he might recover his ship. The stratagem succeeded; but he was no sooner on board, than he absolutely refused to leave his ship. This produced a long negotiation between the ambassador and the admiral. Protests were taken against the latter; and, in the hearing of his own men, he was threatened with the punishment of death, as a traitor to his country. But all the menaces of the Frenchmen were in vain; Pennington refused his compliance, and returned with his ships to England. He immediately laid the whole transaction before the council; and received express orders to deliver up his own, and all the merchant ships, to the French king. This was accordingly done; but not an Englishman, one gunner only excepted, was found mean enough to serve on board the fleet, under a French commission, and against their protestant brethren.

These transactions were no sooner known in parliament, than the commons shewed the same attachment with the sailors for the protestant religion. They even carried their zeal to a height that rendered their deliberations at once ridiculous and unjust. Montague, one of the king's chaplains, published a book, which, contrary to the rigid tenets of the puritans, saved virtuous catholics, as well as other christians, from eternal torments. It now became evident that those great men, who reasoned so forcibly on the danger of the constitution of their country from the increasing power of the crown, could not reason at all on the subject of religion. Montague was ordered to be prosecuted, a committee was appointed to consider of the proceedings against him, and the ecclesiastic, for having done an important service to the church of England, by exploding the adopted errors of her antagonists, was ordered into custody of the serjeant, and to give bail of two thousand pounds for his appearing at the next session. It is no wonder that Charles was offended at these proceedings, and that he often put them in mind that they had business of far greater concern to engage their attention. But finding all attempts were in vain, the king dissolved a parliament from which he had nothing to expect.

Buckingham had now an arduous and dangerous part to act. He was hated by Spain, he was feared by France; he was distrusted in Holland; he was unpopular in England. The affections of the king, and his own ascendancy in the cabinet, were all he had now to trust to, and he therefore determined to increase his power, by putting more of his friends into places of consequence. All the dissimulation of Williams could not remove Buckingham's hatred. He was deprived of the seals, and retired to his bishopric with great dejection. Charles had afterwards time sufficient to regret the loss of his able servant, when the heats that afterwards flamed out so fatally, and seemed to threaten the destruction of the kingdom.

But though Buckingham was an enemy to the person of Williams, he was in his heart a friend to his principles, and was daily more and more convinced how impracticable it was for the government to oppose the people's torrent of zeal against popery. The earl of Holland continued to be his faithful correspondent at the French court; and gave him intelligence how deeply Blanville, the French ambassador, was engaged in plotting his destruction. The duke determined to return to France in quality of ambassador; but the queen having been so incautious in her expressions of her passion for that nobleman, that Lewis absolutely refused to admit him into his territories. This highly exasperated Buckingham, especially as the court of France refused to sign a secret treaty against the house of Austria, unless Charles would employ his forces against the French protestants.

Destitute of assistance from parliament, Charles was obliged to have recourse to unconstitutional methods for raising money. He issued privy-seals in order to obtain the necessary sum; but the advantages he gained by this temporary supply were more than balanced by the disgust it occasioned. By means, however, of this supply he was enabled to fit out a fleet of eighty sail, on board of which were ten thousand soldiers. Buckingham was very unfortunate in his choice of the officers. Sir Horace Vere had been created a baron of England, and was endowed with every talent requisite for the command of this armament; but he was no friend to the minister. Sir Edward Cecil, who had commanded under count Mansfeldt, was therefore chosen for that office, and immediately created viscount Wimbledon. Buckingham could not have made a more unfortunate choice. Wimbledon, though a brave field officer, knew nothing of sea affairs. The public complained loudly that Sir Robert Mansel was neglected; but but they should have remembered that he was engaged in the party formed against the minister. Nor was Buckingham more fortunate in his choice of the other officers. The earl of Essex was appointed to command under Wimbledon, though there actually subsisted so great an antipathy between them, that they would have more readily fought with each other than against the enemy.

The fleet sailed on the first of October, and a council of war was held off Cape St. Vincent, in order to form a plan for their future operations. The earl of Essex naturally gave his voice for attacking Cadiz, the scene of his father's glory, and his proposal being accepted, the whole fleet stood towards that port. But by this time all Spain was alarmed; and so dreadful to the Spaniards was the remembrance of the English valour under queen Elizabeth, that their king was ready in person to march down at the head of a royal army to the defence of his coast. When the English reached Cadiz, they found every thing in readiness to give them a warm reception, and the attack of fort Puntal was given to the earl of Essex. He advanced with twenty English and five Dutch ships with such impetuosity, that the Spanish shipping, which consisted of seventeen stout ships and eight or ten galleys, fearing the fatal consequence of that fort's being taken, retired to Port Real. The fort, however, made a noble defence; and it was found impracticable to take it on the side where the attack was made. Upon this Sir John Burroughs, an old English officer, landed with his regiment, and driving some companies of Spanish infantry, who had opposed his landing back to the fort, the Spanish governor thought proper to surrender. The taking of this fort was, however, of no other consequence than as it opened a passage to Cadiz itself, and commanded a large extent of villages and country round; but the raw English soldiers could not resist the temptation of the new Spanish wines; they drank to excess, and could not be brought to act with that spirit and resolution necessary for rendering the expedition successful. At the same time dissensions prevailed among the officers; and diseases among the soldiers; so that any farther stay appearing fruitless, the troops were reembarked, and the fleet put to sea with a resolution of waiting for the Spanish galleons. But the plague breaking out among the seamen and soldiers, Cecil was obliged to return to England with infected crews, sickly companies, a broken reputation, disheartened officers; and national dishonour.

A.D. 1626. Charles was crowned on the second of February with great magnificence, and four days after the new parliament met at Westminster, the king being determined to try once more that regular and constitutional expedient for obtaining a supply. The session was opened by the new lord-keeper, Sir Thomas Finch, by a concise speech, wherein he acquainted both houses, that as his majesty intended the session should be very short; he hoped they would make all imaginable dispatch in granting the supplies. But the commons, without paying any regard to the lord-keeper's speech, began an enquiry into the national grievances, at the very point where they had left off the last session, as if the same men had been every where elected, and no time had intervened between their last meeting.

Had Charles been left to himself he would probably have succeeded much better than he did with this parliament. For though he had lost nothing of his arbitrary notions, yet the necessity of his affairs, and his close engagements on the continent, where both his honour and reputation were at stake, would certainly have induced him to have made such sacrifices, as would have brought over to his interest that very small number of members, which gave the opposition the majority. But Charles was now governed in ecclesiastical affairs by Laud, a furious churchman, who, rather than give up one point of useless ceremony, or immaterial doctrine, was determined to hazard the rights of monarchy, and the tranquillity of his country. The commons indeed voted a supply of three subsidies and three fifteenths, and afterwards added another subsidy; but reserved the passing that vote into a law till the end of the session: so that if the king refused to grant them a sufficient time to finish their inquiry into the national grievances, or refused to comply with their demands, he must expect no supply from the parliament.

It soon appeared that the whole storm was intended against Buckingham, who was considered as the source of all the national grievances. Charles foresaw the consequence, and endeavoured to soften the inquiries of the commons, by ordering Heath, the attorney-general, to send letters to the judges, enjoining them to proceed with more vigour than ever against the popish recusants. But all orders of that kind were mistrusted by the commons; and an embargo being at that time laid on all the English shipping in France, the commons ordered an inquiry to be made into the reason for such strange proceedings. In answer to this inquiry, it was said, that the French had imposed it upon the English, in order to indemnify themselves for the illegal detention of a ship belonging to Havre-de-Grace, called the St. Peter, even after an order had been issued by the king for her release. But, upon examination, it appeared that there was sufficient reason for this detention, and the inquiry was laid aside.

The earl of Bristol, who had now taken his seat in parliament, impeached Buckingham, his inveterate enemy; and the commons sent up, about the same time, another impeachment. But however odious the irregularities of the favourite had rendered him, they were not such as would condemn him as a traitor. The commons, however, pursued their design with unwearied attention; but the members of the council of war declining to give any answers to the questions put to them by the commons, it was thought proper to put a stop, for some time, to the inquiry.

In the mean time, Charles, pressed by his allies for fulfilling his engagements, was very urgent with the parliament to finish the supplies. The house of peers candidly declared, that it was necessary to put the nation in a posture of defence both by sea and land; and that count Mansfeldt's army, and the king's allies, ought to be supported. These resolutions were communicated by the upper to the lower house; but the commons paid very little attention to them: the supporting their charge against Buckingham engrossed all their attentions. In the course of this debate, Mr. Coke, son to Sir Edward Coke, said, "It was better to die by an enemy than to suffer at home;" and Dr. Turner, a physician, proposed the following questions against Buckingham.

"1. Whether the duke, being admiral of England, be not the cause of the king's loss of his royalty in the narrow seas?

"2. Whether the unreasonable, exorbitant, and immense gifts of money and lands bestowed on the duke and his relations, be not the cause of impairing the king's revenue, and impoverishing the crown?

"3. Whether the multiplicity of offices bestowed on the duke, and his dependents, be not the cause of the ill government of the kingdom?

"4. Whether recusants in general be not supported and encouraged by the duke's mother and father-in-law, being papists?

"5. Whether the sale of honours, offices, places of judicature, ecclesiastical livings, and promotions, be not carried on by the duke?

"6. Whether the duke's staying at home, though admiral of the fleet and general of the land army, was not the cause of the miscarriage of the expedition to Cadiz; and whether he gave proper directions for executing the design?"

In the midst of this debate, the speaker received the following letter from the king:

"Trusty and well-beloved, &c.

"Having assembled the parliament early in the beginning of the year, for the more timely help and advice of our people in our great and important affairs; and having of late, not only by message, but also of ourself, put our house of commons in mind of our pressing occasions, and of the present state of Christendom, wherein they have equal interest with us, as well in respect to their own former engagements, as of the common cause; we shall not need to tell them with what care and patience we have, in the midst of our necessities, attended their resolutions; but because their unseasonable slowness may produce at home as ill effects as a denial, and hazard the whole estate of things abroad, we have thought fit by you, the speaker, to let them know, that without more loss of time, we look for a full and perfect answer to what they will give for our supply, according to our expectation and their promises; wherein, as we press for nothing beyond the present state and condition of our subjects, so will we accept no less than is proportional to the greatness and goodness of the cause; neither do we press them to a present resolution in this, with a purpose to precipitate their counsels, much less to enter upon their privileges, but to shew that it is unfit to depend any longer upon uncertainties, whereby the whole weight of the affairs of Christendom may break in suddenly upon us, to our dishonour and the shame of this nation. And for the business at home, we command you to promise them in our name, that after they have satisfied us in this reasonable demand, we shall not only continue them together at this time so long as the season will permit, but call them shortly again to perfect those necessary businesses which will be now left undone; and now we shall willingly apply fit and seasonable remedies to such just grievances which they shall present unto us in a dutiful and mannerly manner, without throwing an ill odour upon our present government, or upon the government of our late blessed father; and if there be yet who desire to find fault, we shall think him the wisest reprehender of our errors past, who, without reflecting backward, can give us counsel how to settle the present state of things, and to provide for the future safety and honour of the kingdom."

To enforce the intention of this letter, Sir Edward Weston, chancellor of the exchequer, delivered to the house the following message.

"1. That his majesty's fleet being returned, and the victuals expended, the men must, of necessity, be discharged, and their wages paid; otherwise a mutiny will be the consequence, which may, at this time, prove dangerous.

"2. That his majesty hath fitted out about forty ships, for a second attempt against the enemy: these want only victuals and a few men, but without a present supply of money, cannot sail, nor be kept together.

"3. That the army assembled on the coasts must soon be disbanded, if they be not supplied with victuals and cloaths.

"4. That if the companies lately sent to Ireland be not provided for, instead of defending that country, they will become the authors of rebellion.

"5. That

"5. That the season for providing healthful victuals will be past, if this month be neglected.

"His majesty therefore commanded me to tell you, that he desired to know, without farther delay, what supply you will give him for these his present occasions, that he may frame his course and council accordingly."

This message contained such strong reasons, that, notwithstanding all the arts of the opposition, and the unbounded ascendancy the leaders of it had acquired over the minds of the people, they thought proper to join very readily in the following answer to Weiton's message:

"Most gracious sovereign,

"Your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons, now assembled in parliament, in all humility, present unto your royal wisdom this their loyal answer to the message which your majesty was pleased, by the chancellor of your exchequer, to send unto them, desiring to know, without any farther deferring of time, what supply they would give to your majesty for your present and extraordinary occasions, that you might form your courses and counsels accordingly. First of all, they most humbly beseech your majesty to know, and rest assured, that no prince was ever dearer to his people than your majesty; no people more zealous to maintain and advance the honour and greatness of their king than they, which, as upon all occasions they will be ready to express, so especially in support of that cause wherein your majesty and your allies are justly engaged. And because they cannot doubt but your majesty, in your great wisdom, even out of justice, and according to the example of your famous predecessors, will be pleased graciously to accept the faithful and necessary information and advice of your parliament, which can have no end but the service of your majesty, and the safety of your realm, in discovering the causes, and proposing the remedies of those great evils which have occasioned your majesty's wants, and your people's grief.

"They therefore, in confidence and full assurance of redress therein, do, with one consent, propose (though, in former time, such course hath been unused) that they really intend to assist and supply your majesty in such a way, and in so ample a manner, as may make you safe at home, and feared abroad; for the dispatch whereof, they will use such diligence as your majesty's pressing occasions shall require."

But notwithstanding this answer, instead of immediately applying themselves to finish the bill relative to the subsidies, they still pursued their favourite project against Buckingham; and having voted, upon the queries of Dr. Turner, "that common fame was a sufficient ground of accusation by the commons," proceeded to frame regular articles against the minister. They accused him "of having united many offices in his person; of having bought two of them; of neglecting to guard the seas, so that many merchant-ships had fallen into the hands of the enemy; of delivering ships to the French king, in order to serve against the Hugonots; of being employed in the sales of honours and offices; of accepting extensive grants from the crown; of procuring many titles of honour for his kindred; of administering physic to the late king, without acquainting his physicians; of extorting a sum of ten thousand pounds from the East-India Company; and of confiscating some goods belonging to some French merchants, under pretence of their being the property of the Spaniards." Among all these accusations, the two last only could be regarded as of any importance; the rest seem to be frivolous, or false, or both. But the duke's answer to these particulars was so clear and satisfactory, that it is impossible to refuse our assent to it.

Perceiving that the commons were determined to pursue their own measures, notwithstanding the pressing necessities of the state, Charles ordered the lord-keeper to forbid the house meddling any farther with his minister and servant, Buckingham; and ordered them to finish, in a few days, the bill they had begun for the subsidies; and to make some addition to them, otherwise they must expect to sit no longer.

This was the language of an eastern, rather than an English monarch: it tended to destroy the constitution, and to reduce Britons to that abject state of slavery known only in the most despotic kingdoms. It destroyed all confidence between the king and his parliament. At the same time, he sent to demand satisfaction of Mr. Coke for the words he had spoken, and of Dr. Turner for the queries he had presented to the commons. The house was astonished at such proceedings; some were intimidated with fear; some were filled with indignation; some with true patriotic zeal for a coalition between the king and his people; and others, instigated by a secret ambition, rejoiced at this despotic language of the king, as it tended to throw every thing into confusion. These different passions produced different effects; and so many left the committee, that the committee was obliged to resume the chair, and it was ordered that no member should leave the house without leave.

The alarming circumstances of the king's message were taken into consideration. They saw Charles lay down a principle, which, unless it could be destroyed, rendered it impossible for parliaments ever to reach the guilty head of a minister who enjoyed the favour of his master. They presented a spirited remonstrance to the king, in which they boldly justified their proceedings against Buckingham, as being founded upon precedents, and consistent with every principle of natural liberty and safety: and concluded with putting the king in mind how readily they had agreed to grant him a supply, and requested his majesty not to be prejudiced against their proceedings. But neither these messages nor remonstrances had any power to withdraw the attention of the commons from their favourite project, that of supporting their articles of impeachment against Buckingham; though they must have known, that few of the articles exhibited against him contained real crimes, and that these were impossible to be proved. It is, indeed, surprizing, that men of such remarkable abilities as the leaders of the house of commons were, inveterate in their hatred, and keen in their pursuit of a favourite minister, young and giddy at his entrance into power, bold and insolent in its exercise, unfortunate and disappointed in his measures, should find so little real matter against him, during the space of almost fourteen years. The truth is, that Buckingham had always been faithful to his masters; and had been sometimes, to gratify their arbitrary inclinations, forced upon measures his judgment disapproved; and he had, for some years, been struggling in vain against the tide of popular fury. The breath of the king, instead of dissipating, swelled the storm. It was now agreed to demand of the lords that Buckingham should be committed to safe custody. When this message was delivered to the upper house, the duke addressed the lords in the following manner:

"My lords,

"If I hold my peace, it will argue guilt; if I speak, it will argue boldness, when accused of so many crimes. Your lordships see what complaints are made against me by the house of commons. How well I stood in their opinion not long since, your lordships well know: what I have done since to lose their good opinion, I protest I am intirely ignorant. I cannot so greatly distrust my own innocency, and my heart, which abhors guilt, as to decline any course, or court of justice; and had they not brought my cause before your lordships, it would have been my own work: they have done me a favour, by delivering me out of their hands into those of your lordships.

"I will not endeavour to throw any reflection on those who have taken pains to represent me in so

"vile

"vile a light; it will be sufficient for me to protest my innocence, which I hope to prove, as the cause is now before just judges: I desire that my trial may be hastened, that I may suffer no longer than is absolutely necessary: and as my accusers have not been content with my process only, but to prescribe to your lordships the manner of your judgment, and to punish me before I am heard, I shall not give way to any of their unjust demands."

About this time, the earl of Suffolk, chancellor of the university of Cambridge, died; and Buckingham, though then under impeachment, was chosen in his place. The commons resented, and loudly complained of this affront; but the king was so far from regarding the censure of the commons, that he wrote a letter to the university, extolling the duke, and giving them thanks for his election.

Two members of the house, Sir Dudley Digges, and Sir John Elliot, who had been employed as managers of the impeachment against Buckingham, were sent to the Tower. This highly exasperated the commons, who immediately declared, that they would proceed no farther upon business till they had received satisfaction with regard to their privileges. Charles alledged, as a reason for this violent measure, certain seditious expressions, which, he said, had dropped from those members in their accusation of the duke. Upon inquiry, it appeared that no such expressions had been used; upon which the members were released; and the king reaped no farther benefit from this attempt than to exasperate the house still farther; and to shew, that notwithstanding his character for solid reflection, he was sometimes capable of precipitate indiscretion.

The example of the house of commons was now imitated by the peers. They claimed liberty for the earl of Arundel, who had been lately sent to the Tower. The king made several attempts to elude the demand of the lords, but was at last obliged to comply, and the earl was accordingly released from his confinement.

Charles having complied with the demand of the commons, with regard to the discharge of their members, and even declared that he had been imposed upon, there were no plausible reasons for withholding the supplies. A great majority of the house would readily have passed the bill, but were opposed by others who had formed dangerous views: a firm coalition between the king and parliament was repugnant to their intentions. These turbulent members began by intimating, that they had some doubts whether the money would be properly applied, and whether there was any real intention of sending out the fleet that year. These insinuations were at once both groundless and malicious, yet many events concurred to render them possible. The king had as yet given them no satisfaction, nor even an answer to their remonstrance. The house of peers had refused to proceed against Buckingham, or even to admit that he might be criminal, by sending him to the Tower. The French court had made peace with the Hugonots, by the mediation of the English ambassadors: they had paid off, and sent home, the English ships employed in their service; they had taken off the embargo laid on the English merchantmen; and, after renewing the treaty of 1610, seemed entirely disposed to act with vigour against the house of Austria. For this purpose, Lewis had offered to make a diversion, with twenty-five thousand men, in Germany; and to continue the war, if necessary, for four years to come, provided England would enter into the same engagements; but refused to be concerned any farther against the house of Austria, than the reinstating the palatine, and other deprived German princes, in their dominions. From these circumstances the discontented members took the opportunity of urging, that there would be no occasion for the operations of the fleet, and that the house ought to be very careful how they granted money for that purpose. These artful speeches made a visible impression to the disadvantage of the court, and the commons seemed persuaded that the supply was not necessary. Charles endeavoured to quicken their proceedings by messages; and even proceeded so far as to threaten the commons, that if they did not furnish him with the supplies, he should be obliged to have recourse to "new councils." This language could not be mistaken; but lest any of the members should consider it as ambiguous, Sir Dudley Carleton, vice-chamberlain, took some pains to explain it fully. "I pray you consider (said he) what these new councils are. I fear to declare those that I conceive. In all christian kingdoms you know that parliaments were formerly in use, by which those kingdoms were governed in a most flourishing manner; until the monarchs began to know their own strength, and seeing the turbulent spirit of their parliaments, at length they, by little and little, began to stand on their prerogatives, and at last overthrew the parliaments throughout Christendom, except here only with us.---Let us be careful, then, to preserve the king's good opinion of parliaments, which bringeth such happiness to this nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this sweetness between his majesty and the commons; lest we lose the repute of a free people by our turbulence in parliament." These imprudent suggestions rather gave the commons warning of the designs formed against them, than struck them with terror. They considered a precarious liberty, or that preserved by unlimited compliance, as no liberty at all. They were determined to preserve the substance, or lose the shadow. Instead, therefore, of passing the bill for the supplies, they renewed their inquiries into grievances; they ordered the house to be called over, and all absent members to be punished.

The never-failing cry of popish recusants was revived; and the nation said to be in danger, from their unwearied endeavours to re-establish the catholic religion in England. But their attack on the revenues of the crown was the most dangerous. They entered on a remonstrance against the levying of tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament. This article, together with the new impositions laid on merchandize by James, constituted near one half of the royal revenues. This attack, therefore, had it succeeded, must have proved decisive; and as they were not able to fix any legal crime upon Buckingham, they intended to present a petition to his majesty for removing him from his person and councils. To preserve, however, the appearance of moderation, the subsidy bill was again read, but kept in such suspense as sufficiently indicated, that if all the grievances presented by the commons were not removed, the bill would never pass into a law.

Alarmed at these proceedings, Charles determined to dissolve the parliament. The lords endeavoured to dissuade him from this resolution, but in vain; the king was determined; and when they petitioned him, that he would allow the parliament to sit some time longer, he answered, in a very hasty manner, "Not a moment longer." The commons had just finished their remonstrance when the king carried his threats into execution, by dissolving the parliament, before they had completed a single act.

The remonstrance of the commons began with a kind of recapitulation of the reasons why the present and former parliament had been in a manner abortive, and the whole blame thrown upon Buckingham. Among other things they charged him with appointing Sir Edward Coke, and several other leading members against him, sheriffs of counties, in order to disqualify them from serving their country in parliament; and for sending Mr. Glanvill abroad, as secretary of the fleet, for the same purpose. They afterwards declared it was their firm resolution to have signally supported his majesty in the prosecution of the war, had not all their intentions been blasted by the enormities of Buckingham, whose crimes they sum up in the

the following manner. "We found, say they, that the most pressing and comprehensive mischief and grievance suffered by the late king, was fundamentally settled in the vast past power and enormous actions of the said duke, being such, by reason of his plurality of offices; some procured by ambition, and some by money; expressly against the laws of your majesty's realm; his breach of trust in not guarding the seas; his high injustice in the admiralty; his extortion; his delivering over the ships of this kingdom into the hands of a foreign prince; his procuring the compulsory buying of honour for his own gain; his unexampled exhausting of the treasures and revenues of the kingdom; his transcendent presumption of that unhappy application of physic to your royal father of blessed memory, some few days before his death; of these and some other of his offences carefully examined by us, we made a parliamentary charge against him to the lords; by your majesty assembled in parliament, there expecting some remedy by a speedy proceeding against him; but may it please your most excellent majesty, not only during the time of our examination of the matters and offences of the said charge, we were often interrupted and diverted by messages, procured, through misinformation, from your majesty, which with most humble duty and reverence we did ever receive, whence it first fell out that so, not only much time was spent among us, before the said charge was perfected; but also within two days after the same charge was transmitted by us to the lords, two of our members, Sir Dudley Digges, and Sir John Elliot, upon untrue and malicious informations, privately and against the privilege of parliaments, given to your majesty of certain words, were by your majesty's command committed to close imprisonment in the Tower of London, their lodgings presently searched, and their papers taken away; by reason whereof not only our known privileges of parliament were infringed, but we ourselves, who in full hopes of speedy course of justice against the said duke, were preparing with all dutiful affection to proceed to dispatch the supply and other services of your majesty, were wholly, as the course and privilege of parliament bind us, employed for several days in taking into consideration the proper methods to be pursued for the ratifying and preserving the privileges so infringed."

They next complain of the insolence of lord Conway, secretary of state, who had ordered the messengers, who, by their warrants, were to have apprehended the members at their lodgings, to seize them in the very house of commons. This outrage they also charge upon the duke, as they do all the interruptions they received, when they were well disposed to grant the supply. They next attack that nobleman for procuring himself to be elected chancellor of the university of Cambridge, because, say they, the same university, having two burgesses in parliament, did, by the same burgesses, a few weeks before, consent with us in the charge against him, for his ambition in procuring such a plurality of offices; such was his ambition to sue for it; such was his power to make them give it him, contrary to what they had agreed in parliament with all the commons of England." They next charge him "with having screened Montague, and despair of being able to do any thing for the public service, while Buckingham remained in possession of his power, continued to abuse the confidence of his majesty, and enjoyed the arbitrary disposal of rewards and punishments to all ranks of people. They promise to reply to this answer to the articles they had exhibited against him. They tremble to think of the consequences that must attend his majesty's following new councils, as he had intimated, if, by new councils, he meant to govern and raise money without consent of parliament. They added, that they had reason to fear, that this was really his meaning, or perhaps that of his minister, "the rather, say they, because the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, which determined on the death of your most royal father, our late sovereign, and were never payable to any of your majesty's ancestors, but only by a special act of parliament, and ought not to be levied without such an act; yet, ever since the beginning of your majesty's happy reign over us, the said subsidies have been levied by some of your majesty's ministers, as if they were still due; altho' one parliament hath since that time been held and dissolved, by procurement of the said duke, wherein no act passed for the same subsidies. Which example is so much against the constant use of former times, and the known right and liberty of your subjects, that it is an apparent effect of some new counsels, given against the ancient settled course of government of this your majesty's kingdom, and chiefly against the right of your commons, as if there might be any subsidy, tax, or aid levied upon them, without their consent in parliament, or contrary to the settled laws of the kingdom. But if any such do so ill use an office, as by the misrepresentation of the state and right of your majesty's loyal subjects, advise any such new counsels, as the levying any aid, tax, or subsidy, among your people, contrary to the settled laws of your kingdom, we cannot, most gracious sovereign, but esteem those who shall advise, not only as vipers, but pests to their king and commonwealth, and also capital enemies as well to your crown and dignity, as to the commonwealth. And we shall, for our parts, shew, in parliament, as occasion may require, and be ready to declare their offences of this kind such, as may be rewarded with the highest punishment your laws inflict on any offenders."

The conclusion of this remonstrance has something in it very great, and very pathetic. After laying before the king the dangers and miseries which must attend his continuing to place his confidence in this single minister, they proceed in the following manner: "Give us then leave, most dear sovereign, in the name of all the commons of this your kingdom, prostrate at the feet of your sacred majesty, most humbly to beseech you, even for the honour of Almighty God, whose religion is directly undermined by the practice of that party whom this duke supports; for your honour, which will be much advanced in the relieving your people in this their great and general grievance; for the honour, safety, and welfare of your kingdom, which by this means is threatened with almost unavoidable dangers; and for the love which your majesty, as a good and loving father, bears unto your good people, to whom we profess, in the presence of Almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, you are as highly esteemed and beloved, as ever any of your predecessors were, that you would be graciously pleased to remove this person from having access to your sacred presence, and that you would not balance this one man with all these things, and with the affairs of the Christian world, which do all suffer, so far as they have relation to this kingdom, chiefly by his means. For we protest to your majesty, and to the whole world, that until this person be removed from intermeddling in the great affairs of state, we are out of hope of any good success; and do fear, that whatever money we can or shall give, will, through his mismanagement, be turned rather to the hurt and prejudice of this your kingdom than otherwise; as by lamentable experience we have found in those large supplies we have formerly and lately given."

"But no sooner shall we receive redress and relief in this, which, of all others, is the most insupportable grievance, but we shall forthwith proceed to accomplish your majesty's own desire, for supply; and likewise, with all cheerfulness, apply ourselves to the perfecting of divers other great things, such as we think no one parliament in one age can parallel, tending to the stability, wealth, strength and honour of this your kingdom, and the support of your friends and allies abroad: and we doubt not but through God's blessing, as you are the best, so shall you be the best

Such was the famous remonstrance of this parliament. The commons intended to have presented it to the king, but being prevented from carrying their design into execution, they caused it to be dispersed among the people in justification of their conduct. Charles was no stranger to its contents, but determined not to make the sacrifice requested of him. He thought that the great guilt of Buckingham consisted in being his friend and favourite. All the other complaints against him he considered as mere pretences. A few months before he was the idol of the people; and no new crime had since been pretended to be discovered. After the most diligent enquiry, prompted by the greatest malice, the smallest appearance of guilt could not be fixed upon him. What idea, he asked, must all mankind entertain of his honour, should he sacrifice his innocent friend to pecuniary considerations? What farther authority would he entertain in this nation, were he capable, in the very beginning of his reign, to give, in so signal an instance, such matter of triumph to his enemies, and discouragement to his friends? Indeed the whole charge against Buckingham was so general, that it might have been thrown out against a virtuous as well as a wicked minister. It was equally absurd in them to suppose, that the act of the two members for the university of Cambridge, was the act of the university itself; nor did the representatives of that body, by agreeing or not agreeing to the charge against the duke, make it more or less binding upon the university to approve or disapprove of the same charge. The raising of tonnage and poundage, without consent of parliament, was indeed a strong and an alarming circumstance, and laid, as it were, the axe to the root of liberty. An English house of commons could not, therefore, be too loud upon this head; they acted as true patriots, when, while such an arbitrary measure was pursuing, they made the post of honour the place of danger, and poured out the vials of public indignation against any minister, guilty or not guilty, who should dare to serve a prince that avowed such dangerous principles.

The government also dispersed a declaration, shewing the reasons which induced the king to dissolve the two last parliaments; but it is one of the weakest pieces ever published by any ministry. It contains nothing in answer to those strong facts and principles which had been urged by the commons in their remonstrances; it consisted of particulars which no body pretended to deny, namely, That the king by the advice of his parliament, had been engaged in a war with the house of Austria; that this war had been attended with great expence; that he had called the two last parliaments for furnishing him with supplies for carrying on the war; that he had pressed them again and again for that purpose; and that being always disappointed in his expectations, he had dissolved them. These were facts never disputed; nor did the most violent opposers of the court ever deny, that the occasions for strengthening the hands of his majesty were great and urgent. But the true questions were, whether the foreign war was of so much importance, as to interpose between them and every thing that ought to be dear to a free people? Whether they ought to support a prince, who threw his favourite into one scale as a counterpoise against his parliament in the other? Whether this favourite, sole and supreme as he was, might not, when possessed of money granted by the parliament, make use of it to rivet those chains he was then forging, and to establish the principles his master had avowed? Charles in all his papers and declarations, gave no constitutional satisfaction as to any one of those doubts, and his silence admitted of the worst construction.

The new councils which Charles had threatened were now to be tried, in order to supply his necessities. Had he immediately made peace with Spain, he might perhaps have found the necessary resources to have supported the expences of government in times of peace. Nothing could be more easy in the execution than this measure, nor more agreeable both to his own and the national interest. But besides the treaties and engagements which he had entered into with Holland and Denmark, the king's thoughts were at this time entirely averse to pacific counsels. He was determined to carry on the war, and to feed it by opening the sluices of prerogative. He was always persuaded that he had much less to fear from the papists than the puritans; and to take away the great objection which the latter urged for exclaiming against the violent part of the church of England, he issued a proclamation against preaching or disputing either for or against the religious tenets of Arminius. It was long before Buckingham could gain this point; and perhaps no prince ever committed more folly than James and Charles did, in so long supporting the principles of the Anti-Arminians, contrary to their own private opinions, and to the sense of almost every man to whom they trusted for the advancement of their measures.

The attention of the council was now entirely engaged in forming measures for raising the supplies necessary for carrying on the war, and it was resolved that the king might continue to levy all those duties upon goods and merchandize, called by the several names of customs, subsidies, and imposts, in the same manner as they had been levied during the late reign. The other proceedings of the government were of the same kind. It was well known that nothing could be more disagreeable to the people of England, than the least attempt to favour popery; yet the king granted a commission to the archbishop of York, Sir John Saville, and others, "to treat and make compositions with the said recusants for all forfeitures in not going to church, under such conditions and immunities as they shall see meet and convenient, according to such instructions as his majesty hath, or shall give for that purpose: his majesty rather desiring their conversion than destruction."

Charles was persuaded that he could not effect a more popular action, than to increase the strength of the royal navy; and in the commission for compounding with the recusants, he had assigned the necessity of guarding the northern ports, as the reason for his appropriating the composition money to himself. Advantage was also taken of some precedents, by no means applicable to the present times, for charging the sea-ports with certain sums of money for fitting out ships. This demand fell heavy upon the city of London, which was ordered to fit out twenty ships. But the king soon perceived that this measure would be attended with some difficulty. Not only the capital, but the deputy-lieutenants and justices of Dorsetshire, remonstrated strongly against this imposition, which they conceived to be without precedent. This sufficiently shewed that they were little conversant in English history; as many precedents occur, though they were in themselves either tyrannical, obsolete, or warranted by immediate necessity. They were, however, to be found; and the council considering them as sufficient for their purpose, rejected all petitions, and particularly that of the city of London, to have this imposition abated.

To increase the appearances of necessity, Charles augmented the wages of his sailors from fourteen to twenty shillings a month; and published several proclamations, giving them other encouragements. At the same time, rigorous directions were issued for putting all the sea-coasts; and the principal fortresses of the kingdom, in a posture of defence, as if an actual invasion or rebellion had already taken place. Nothing was seen throughout the kingdom but musters and arrays of forces; and the military law, with all its terrors, was suspended over the heads of the astonished people.

It was not, indeed, long before Charles had occasion for all these precautions, though the event was not, not, perhaps, foreseen. He had paid the king of Denmark large subsidies; and that prince, by his encouragement, having, for some time, acted as the patron of the Germanic liberty, had marched his army towards the Weser, where he took Minden and Hamelin; but upon the approach of count Tilly, at the head of an army of veteran imperialists, he retired towards Ferdin, to wait the arrival of Mansfeldt with twelve thousand English and Dutch forces. While he remained in that situation, he had several skirmishes with the imperialists, who were ordered to keep him fully employed, till the emperor could place the crown of Hungary on the head of his eldest son. This coronation exasperated the famous Bethlem Gabor, a prince of Transylvania, who aspired to the throne of Hungary, and proposed to enter into the league formed against the house of Austria. His offer was accepted; and it was agreed that he should invade Hungary, and be joined by the troops under count Mansfeldt, as soon as he arrived in Silesia. But before this could be effected, the emperor had assembled one army on the Weser, another under the famous Wallenstein on the frontiers of Silesia, and a third under count Tilly in Lower Saxony. This obliged the king of Denmark to divide his army, which, by the junction of Mansfeldt and the German princes, was now increased to sixty thousand men, into three bodies. The first, commanded by duke Christian of Brunswick, was to act upon the Weser; the second by Mansfeldt, was to oppose Wallenstein, and, if possible, force a passage into Silesia; and the third, commanded by the king of Denmark in person, was to act in the intermediate space between the other two. The active count Mansfeldt, in his route to Silesia, made himself master of the whole province of Magdebourg, before Wallenstein could come up to oppose him; but being stopped by general Altringer at Dessau upon the Elbe, Wallenstein had time to march to the relief of the place; and falling upon his army, obliged Mansfeldt to retire, with the loss of the greater part of his infantry, baggage and artillery, into the marquisate of Brandenburg. Mansfeldt did not, however, abandon his principal design, that of penetrating into Silesia, and gaining some marches upon Wallenstein. He was so industrious, that he soon recruited his army, which now consisted of twenty-five thousand men, and advanced, at their head, to join Bethlem Gabor. But that prince, upon the first news of Mansfeldt's defeat, made peace with the emperor. This behaviour so greatly disgusted Mansfeldt, that he resigned the command of his troops to duke Ernest of Saxe Weimar, and retired to Buda, whence he set out for Venice, but died on his journey in an obscure village of Dalmatia. About the same time, the brave duke Christian of Brunswick, who commanded another division of the confederate army, paid the debt of nature; and soon after, the duke of Saxe Weimar, Mansfeldt's successor. The loss of those three great generals was irreparable to the confederates, whose hopes now intirely centered in the king of Denmark. Tilly, who had all this time watched the motions of that prince, had now retaken Minden and some other places; but was very near being surprized in his camp by the king of Denmark, at a time when he thought that prince was at thirty leagues distance. But Tilly, after making a masterly retreat, was reinforced by so great a body of veterans, that the king of Denmark, who had no great opinion of his own new-raised troops, would, in his turn, have gladly declined a battle; but this was impossible. The contest was very bloody, but ended in favour of the imperial general; and the king was obliged to retire, with the loss of his baggage and artillery, towards Holstein. Three thousand men of the confederate army were slain on the field of battle, and three thousand taken prisoners.

Charles no sooner heard of the defeat of the king of Denmark, than he redoubled his endeavours to obtain supplies. He had sent a squadron of ships to lie at the mouth of the Elbe; to prevent the Spaniards from furnishing themselves with naval stores from that country. But this not only exasperated the Hamburgers, whose commerce was thereby greatly lessened; but the attempt itself was ineffectual, because the enemy was supplied from Lubec, and the passage of the Sound was left open. The squadron was therefore recalled at the intercession of the Hamburg merchants. The public did not fail to make their own reflections upon these inconsistent dispositions of the court; for either the destination of the squadron had been improper; or the recalling of it impolitic.

But the truth is, the object of Buckingham's resentment was changed. Besides his passion for the young queen of France, and his resentment at the refusal of Lewis to receive him as ambassador, he had the greatest reasons to watch the conduct of cardinal Richelieu. The protestants of France had accepted the peace, under the guaranty of the king of England. By concluding this treaty, Charles committed a great political error. He gave peace to France, hoping that France would then join him against the Spaniards; but he was deceived. Instead of fulfilling their promises, they made use of this tranquillity, as an argument for extorting advantageous terms from Spain. Richelieu, the better to conceal his real intentions from the allies during this negotiation, had procured the prince of Piedmont to be appointed lieutenant-general of the French armies in foreign parts: preparations were made in every province of France; and it was expected that the storm, which had been so long gathering, would soon burst upon the house of Austria. But no such thing was intended: for, in a few days, it was publicly known, that a peace had been concluded between France and Spain. This perfidious conduct raised Richelieu many enemies, particularly the duke of Savoy, and the duke of Orleans, brother to the king. The former was now left exposed to the vengeance of the Spaniards; and the latter, for reasons foreign to this history, was more exasperated against the minister than ever. But Richelieu's fortune rose superior to all difficulties. Fearful of a correspondence between England and the duke de Vendôme, governor of Britany, which lay so convenient for a descent from England, he prevailed upon Lewis to undertake a journey into that province, where he caused the duke of Vendôme to be arrested. But the most active agent against Richelieu was the abbot of Scaglia, ambassador in England from the duke of Savoy, a restless, intriguing minister, who hated Richelieu, and was now become very intimate with Buckingham. This produced a secret correspondence between England, the court of Savoy, and the duke of Rohan, head of the French Hugonots, who were now convinced that all the great preparations in France were intended against Rochelle, the principal place in their possession.

It was not difficult for the abbot of Scaglia, by the assistance of Buckingham, and the duke of Soubise, who managed the affairs of the French Hugonots in England, to inspire Charles with a contemptible opinion of the duplicity of the French court; and to persuade him, that having now lost all hopes of prevailing upon Lewis to join in the alliance against the house of Austria, he ought to revive the ancient policy of England, in preventing the total ruin of the Hugonots. The abbot gave him the strongest assurances of his master's friendship and assistance; and it was accordingly determined to support the protestants of France.

But supplies were wanting to pay both the fleet and the army; the necessities of Charles increased as his extensive engagements were augmented. It was therefore determined to have recourse to a general loan, in which every man was to be assessed according to the rolls of the last subsidy. But this expedient answered not the intentions of the minister: the people refused to subscribe to the loan, and the whole country became a scene of confusion. Among other articles of secret instruction, the commissioners appointed to levy these loans were enjoined, "If any man shall refuse to lend, and shall make delays or excuses, and persist in his obstinacy, that they examine him upon oath, whether he has been dealt with to deny or refuse to lend, or make any excuse for not lending? Who has dealt with him, and what speeches or persuasions were used for that purpose? And that they also charge every such person in his majesty's name, upon his allegiance, not to disclose to any one what his answer was." It is astonishing that the king could be prevailed upon to suffer so impracticable an attempt to be made by his officers. A very little reflection would have been abundantly sufficient to have convinced him, that the secrecy he enjoined was impossible; and that so violent an inquisitorial power could not fail of exciting the indignation of his subjects.

The consequence was what might naturally be expected. The principal leaders in the late parliament, and others who had adopted their sentiments, refused to submit to an imposition not agreed to by the legislature. Most of them were thrown into prison; the goals were filled with illustrious offenders. All who petitioned the clemency of the king were released; but five gentlemen, Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hamden, not only refused to solicit the clemency of his majesty, but boldly demanded their release, not as a favour from the court, but as a right derived from the laws of their country. The question was at last solemnly argued in the court of King's-bench, when it appeared, beyond contradiction, that the personal liberty of the subject had been secured against the arbitrary power of the crown by six several acts of parliament, besides an article of the great charter itself, the most sacred foundation of the laws and constitution of England. The judges, however, thought proper to remand the gentlemen to their prisons, though they refused to enter a general judgment, that no bail could be granted upon a commitment of the king or council. But liberty loses not her nature by confinement: her voice was heard from all quarters of the kingdom, and became much louder than those of venal pursuivants, who spread the king's proclamations to excite terrors.

Nor was imprisonment the only engine employed by the government to force the people to submit to the arbitrary orders of the court: recourse was also had to religious prejudices: the duty of unlimited obedience was preached from the pulpit. Manwaring, one of his majesty's chaplains, distinguished himself on this occasion. Among other curious passages in his elaborate discourses, the following are remarkable: "That the king is not bound to observe the laws of the realm, concerning the subjects rights and liberties; but that his royal will and command in imposing loans and taxes, without the common consent of parliament, is sufficient to oblige the conscience of the subject, under pain of eternal damnation. That those who refused to pay this loan, offended against the law of God, and the king's supreme authority, and became guilty of impiety, disloyalty, and rebellion. That the authority of parliament is not necessary for the raising of aids and subsidies, and that the slow proceedings of such numerous assemblies are not fitted for the supply of the state's urgent necessities, but would rather occasion many impediments to the just designs of princes." Sibthorpe was another divine that exerted all his abilities in recommending the same slavish tenets. Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, refused to license these sermons. This was considered as so heinous an offence, that the prelate was suspended from the exercise of his office, and confined to one of his country-seats. This sequestration and confinement of the first peer and prelate of England, were alarming monuments of Buckingham's power over the mind of his master. The archbishop had always acted with the greatest moderation, and was considered by the public as a sincere friend to the liberties of his country; but he could never be brought to offer incense to the favourite minister, and this marked him out as an object of disgrace.

Even an indifference in the service of despotic purposes was now considered as criminal by the government. Sir Randal Carew was removed from his post of lord chief justice of the King's-bench for his coldness in promoting the loan; and Williams, the late lord-keeper, whose great abilities had rendered him a favourite of the people, was not suffered to enjoy the retirement he had chosen. He was considered as an encourager of the puritans; for every person who favoured the cause of liberty, whatever his religious tenets might be, was branded with that epithet, and was considered by the minister as an enemy to the government.

While the people were thus harassed with persecutions with regard to the loan, vigorous preparations were making for covering the seas with armaments. The duke of Soubise, who was then in England, received a commission from Charles for employing the ships fitted out by the Hugonots in his service, and for cruising on the Spaniards. This occasioned great confusion in the business of the English admiralty, where it was difficult to distinguish between the prizes made by the English and those taken by the French protestants.

A.D. 1627. The French court was in a very bad condition to support a war against England; but all the catholics in the kingdom were united, and desirous of exerting all their power against the enemies of their religion. On the other hand, the unpopularity of Buckingham, the high exertion of the prerogative, and the imprisonment of some of the worthiest men in England, rendered the sincerest intentions of Charles distrustful; nothing could be expected from the efforts of a nation divided within itself. A fleet of one hundred sail, having on board an army of seven thousand men, were fitted out for the invasion of France; and both intrusted to the command of the duke of Buckingham, though he was wholly unacquainted both with the land and sea-service.

The fleet appeared before Rochelle; but the inhabitants of that city were then divided into two factions, one for the court of France, and the other for the English. The former endeavoured to persuade the people, that if the English were admitted into the town, they would, by their great superiority at sea, seize the government, and keep possession of the place in defiance of the whole power of France. The latter, which was headed by the mother and sister of the dukes of Rohan and Soubise, opposed these assertions; declaring that the English were their friends, and were come to support their religious privileges. The French party, however, prevailed, and it was determined not to admit the English. Buckingham, who was surprized that the gates were not opened, sent Soubise and Sir William Beecher ashore, but it was not without difficulty they were permitted to enter the gates. The council was immediately assembled, and Soubise did every thing in his power to persuade them of the friendly intentions of the English monarch, and that he had fitted out this large and expensive armament purely for their service. The council, however, thought proper to decline the proffered assistance, under pretence that they could not determine on an affair of such importance without consulting the whole body of the Hugonots. Exasperated at this refusal, Buckingham determined to make a descent on the island of Rhé. It had before been agreed between Soubise and Buckingham, that the English should land on Oleron, a fertile and then defenceless island, where refreshments refreshments of every kind might be easily procured, and the troops in no danger of any attack from the enemy. But the English general thought proper to alter this plan of operations, and stood immediately for the island of Rhé, then well garrisoned and fortified. Had the military abilities of Buckingham been equal to his personal courage, he might have acquired immortal honour both to himself and his country. Thoyras, the French general, who commanded in the island, no sooner perceived the English were preparing to land, than he drew out his forces to oppose them; but imagining the first debarkation was only a feint to draw his attention to that quarter, while the main body of the English army was landed at another, he thought it imprudent to attack them, till they were followed by greater numbers. Thoyras now perceived his mistake, and marched immediately to give them battle; but the English volunteers jumping ashore, and performing wonders in their own persons, so animated the soldiers, that they pressed forward with the utmost intrepidity, and put the enemy to flight, though far superior in numbers.

Sobise, who was an excellent soldier, advised Buckingham to pursue his victory, and immediately attack the castle of St. Martin's. Had this prudent advice been followed, there is the greatest reason to think that the attempt would have succeeded; but Buckingham pretended that it would be imprudent to march his troops against that fortress, till intelligence could be procured of the strength of the enemy. By this dilatory method of proceeding five days were lost to the English, and that loss was irretrievable. He also neglected to take fort Prie, which was then but meanly garrisoned, and being situated on the shore, would have afforded an excellent retreat, in case of accident, to the English.

At last, on the twenty-seventh of July, he opened his trenches before St. Martins, and was so confident of success, that he assured the king by express, he would be master of the castle in eight days time. This occasioned a ridiculous proclamation to be published in England, for encouraging people to transport themselves and their families to the island of Rhé. But Buckingham was not born to shine in a camp. Though determined to starve the garrison into a surrender, he took so little care to guard the seas, that the French found means to throw ammunition and provisions into the place.

Buckingham now perceived that the taking the castle would not be so easy a task as he imagined, and endeavoured to make himself master of fort Prie; but the garrison had been reinforced, and the attempt miscarried. The French had now in the island an army, under the command of marshal Schomberg, superior in numbers to that of the English; and Buckingham determined to make an attack upon the place, in order to put an end to the siege by one desperate attempt. He had been informed by some French deserters, that there were no more than eight hundred soldiers in the castle, and that the courtin towards the sea was but poorly fortified. It was therefore resolved to storm the courtin without attempting to make any breach in the wall. The army was accordingly divided into two bodies, one of which was to attack the castle on the land side, and the other on the sea. The latter was the principal attack, and it was proposed to mount the courtin with their scaling-ladders. But the measures were so improperly taken, that there were no hopes of success. The French immediately perceived their intention, and suffered them to advance to the foot of the courtin, where the English soon perceived their ladders were too short for scaling the wall. They behaved, however, in both attacks with amazing intrepidity, but were at last obliged to retreat with the loss of five hundred men killed, and fifty taken prisoners.

The French were, however, convinced by this specimen of British valour, that it would be dangerous to attack them in an open field; Schomberg did not chuse to press closely so brave an enemy. After this miscarriage it was sufficiently evident that any farther attack upon the castle would be the height of imprudence; and Buckingham accordingly began his march in excellent order towards his ships, intending to pass through a hollow way, the only passage by which he could retreat. The French army under marshal Schomberg followed him at a distance. Buckingham perceived it, and offered the marshal battle, which he declined, and the English continued their march towards the hollow-way, their rear, by some strange neglect, consisting only of the insignificant guard of eighty horse. When the English had advanced a considerable distance in the hollow-way, they were attacked by the French cavalry, who forced the English rear-guard to break the ranks of their own men, and there being no room for the foremost battalions to form, a general rout ensued. But they had no sooner passed the hollow-way, than they faced about and once more offered the marshal battle, notwithstanding the great loss they had sustained. Schomberg was too prudent to venture a general engagement; he retired with his army, and Buckingham embarked his forces, after losing near two thirds of his army.

Thus ended an expedition which totally discredited Buckingham, both as an admiral and a soldier; he acquired no praise but that vulgar one of courage and personal bravery. If he was unpopular before, he was now detested by the people; the enemy triumphed in the narrow seas, and insulted the English in their own harbours. The inhabitants of Rochelle, who had declared for the English, were now in the most dreadful situation. They were threatened with an immediate siege from their enraged master, and had expended great part of their provisions in subsisting Buckingham's forces on the island of Rhé. The deputies from that city were loud in their complaints; but so greatly was Charles infatuated with Buckingham, that all their instances joined with the general voice of his people, could not prevail upon him to censure his conduct.

It was, however, sufficiently apparent, that something must be done to silence the clamours of the people. They believed their liberties had been ravished from them, and illegal taxes extorted. They saw their commerce daily declining, and the military honours transmitted to them by their ancestors, shamefully stained by two ill-concerted and unsuccessful expeditions. They dreaded the calamities of a war carried on against two of the most powerful kingdoms in Europe, and feared for their domestic safety from the general clamour excited in every part of the nation. These evils were solely ascribed to the obstinacy of the king in adhering to the counsels of Buckingham, whose abilities were far from deserving such implicit confidence. The only expedient that offered to relieve the government from this embarrassing situation, was that of calling a parliament. It was expected that the miscarriage of the attempt upon Rhé would be severely censured, and the duke's conduct made the subject of the closest scrutiny. Sir Robert Cotton therefore advised his majesty, that Buckingham should make a motion in the council for assembling the parliament; hoping that by his appearing to favour a measure so highly agreeable to the people, his former faults would be forgotten, and that instead of a tyrant and oppressor, he would be considered as the deliverer of his country.

A. D. 1628. The parliament assembled on the seventeenth of March, and was opened by a speech from the throne, in which the king very pathetically enumerated the necessities of the government; and required the assistance of his parliament; but concluded with fairly telling the commons, "that if they did not do their duty in contributing to the necessities of the state, he must, in discharge of his conscience, use those other means which God had put into his hands, in order to save that, which the follies of a few particular men may otherwise endanger. Take not this as a threatening, added he, for I scorn to threaten any but my equals; but as an admonition from him, who, by nature and duty, has most care of your preservation and prosperity."

When Charles had finished his speech, the lord-keeper, by the king's command, laid before the house the state of affairs in Europe, and the motives which induced the king to attempt the reduction of the dangerous power of the house of Austria, and to interpose between the French king and his protestant subjects. He observed that the powers which used to balance the alarming greatness of the house of Austria, were now otherwise employed; the Turk in an Asiatic war, and the Swede in a war with Poland, fermented by Spain; that the king of Denmark was already stripped of great part of his dominions, and the house of Austria on the point of being masters of all the sea-coasts between Dantzick and Embden: that they were arming all the ships they can procure in the Baltic seas, and endeavouring to engage the Hans Towns in their quarrel, in order to deprive the English of the Eastland trade, and make themselves masters of the sea, without striking a blow: that the fleets of France and Spain, were preparing in conjunction to ruin our fishery, and to render it dangerous for our merchant ships to pass from one part of the kingdom to another: that a large armament was fitting out at Lisbon, in order, as there is the greatest reason to fear, to make a descent either in England or Ireland. He then strongly recommended unity, as the only means of disappointing the intentions of the enemy, and pressed them in the most earnest manner to assist the government, as the most constitutional method of imposing the necessary taxes. "This way of parliamentary supplies, added he, as his majesty told you, he hath chosen, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he is destitute of others, but because it is most agreeable to the goodness of his own most gracious disposition, and to the desire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, necessity and the sword of the enemy make way to others. Remember his majesty's admonition, I say remember it."

Though the members of this parliament were men of the same independent spirit with their predecessors, and possessed of such large estates, that it was computed their riches surpassed three times that of the house of peers; though they were all inflamed with the love of liberty, and many of them had suffered by the violent measures of the government; yet they entered upon business with great temper and decorum. They feared that the king, disgusted with popular assemblies, wanted only a fair pretence, offered by any incident or undutiful behaviour of the members, to govern alone with a despotic power; and should that ever happen, no remedy could be hoped for, but from insurrection and civil war, of which the issue would be extremely uncertain, and must, at all events, prove infinitely distressing to the whole nation. Decency of conduct was therefore absolutely necessary to carry on the great work of reformation in the government, and to pass some laws which might secure the privileges of parliament, and the liberties of the people.

But though the popular leaders had prescribed a decent conduct to themselves, they did not propose to suffer calmly the grievances under which the nation had lately groaned. They knew that the constitution of their country was at stake, and that every effort must be exerted in its defence. The cry of liberty was therefore echoed in the house of commons as it had anciently been in the Roman senate. "We are called here by his majesty, said Sir Francis Seymour, to give him faithful counsel, such as may conduce to his honour and dignity, and we ought to do it without flattery. We are sent here by the people to deliver them from their grievances, and we ought to do it without fear. Not to be disposed to part with life and fortune when the interest of our king and country required the sacrifice, were not to be good subjects; but, on the other hand, to suffer our property to be taken from us, inconsistently with liberty, our inclination, and the laws of our country, this were to be slaves. While we oppose such encroachments we tread only in the steps of our great ancestors, who always preferred the public to their private interest, nay even to their very lives. It will be the highest injury to ourselves, to our posterity, to our consciences, if we forego this claim and pretension."

"I can live, said Sir Robert Phillips, though another, who has no right, be joined with me; nay, I can live, though burthened with impositions, beyond what at present I labour under: but to have my liberty, which is the soul of my life, ravished from me; to have my person pent up in a goal, without relief from law, and to be so adjudged, O! improvident ancestors! O! unwise forefathers! to be so careful in providing for the quiet possession of our lands, and the liberties of parliament; and, at the same time, to neglect our personal liberty, and suffer us to lie in prison during pleasure, without redress or remedy! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties? Why trouble ourselves with disputes about a constitution, franchises, property of goods, and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the liberty of his person?"

"The same evil, added Sir Thomas Wentworth, affects the king and the people, and the same remedy must heal it. We are to defend,—what?—any new object?—no—our ancient, our legitimate, or vital liberties; we must confirm the laws established by our ancestors; we must put such a seal to them, as no licentious spirit shall dare to break." The whole house agreed in these noble and generous sentiments; even the court party themselves did not pretend to offer any thing but the plea of necessity in defence of the late measures pursued by the ministry, and to which the king had been reduced by the obstinacy of the two last parliaments. No opposition was therefore made to a vote against arbitrary imprisonments and forced loans. This being passed, the house unanimously voted the king five subsidies. This supply, though not equal to his wants, satisfied his majesty, and even the tears of affection started from his eyes, when he was informed of this concession in the commons.

But though the supply was voted, the bill necessary to give it the force of a law was not yet passed, and the commons, in order to have time sufficient to consider the grievances of the nation, appointed a committee to prepare the model of so important a statute, before any draught of it was laid before the house. Some of the commons were, indeed, for passing the subsidy bill with as much expedition as the nature of the subject would admit, before the grievances of the kingdom were taken into consideration; but this was opposed by others with all the enthusiastic warmth of true patriotic zeal. Mr. Creswell, a young gentleman of the law, delivered his sentiments in a very masterly manner. "Give me leave, said he, to resemble justice to Nebuchadnezzar's tree; for she is so great that she shades at once the palace of the prince, the house of the noble and the cottage of the beggar. If therefore either the blasts of indignation, or necessity, the irresistible violator of laws, hath so bruised any part of the branches of this tree, that either our persons, goods, or possessions have not the same shelter as before, let us not, for that reason, neglect the root of this lovely plant; but rather use every possible endeavour to apply to it fresh and fertile mould, and to water it even with our tears, that these bruised branches may be recovered, and the whole tree once more prosper and flourish."

"I well know that kings, though they are only men before the Almighty, are gods among the people: and therefore to my gracious and dread sovereign, whose virtues are ingenerate both in his judgment and nature, let my arm be cut off, nay, let not my soul survive the day that I shall dare to lift

" lift up my hand to touch those forbidden productions, those flowers of his princely crown and diadem. But yet, in our Eden, in this garden of the commonwealth, as there are flowers of the sun, which are too glorious to be touched by any but the hands of royal majesty; so are there also some daisies and wholesome herbs, which every common hand that lives and labours in this garden, may pick and gather up, may take comfort and repose in them. Among all these, this eye of day, this lovely liberty, is, perhaps, the principal. This should be cultivated with the utmost care, nor should any consideration, not even the frowns of power, prevail upon us to abandon its culture."

The speeches of the patriots prevailed; and a committee was appointed to draw up the form of some statute, which having obtained the force of a law, might form a sufficient barrier to their rights and liberties, so lately violated. Forced loans, benevolences, taxes without consent of parliament, arbitrary imprisonments, billeting soldiers in private houses, and the imposition of martial law, were the grievances complained of, and against these an eternal remedy was to be provided. At last the famous petition of right was drawn up, and presented to the lords for their concurrence; that having thus obtained the sanction of both houses, it might have the force of an act of parliament, as soon as it received the royal assent. Charles used every art to divert this fatal blow to an unlimited prerogative. He repeated his messages to the commons; he endeavoured to gain over some by promises of favour, and to terrify others with threats. All the eloquence of the crown lawyers was exhausted to destroy the principles upon which the petition was founded; and, as the last resource, the king wrote a letter to the lords, informing them, that he could not give up the point of committing offenders to prison in matters of state, without expressing the causes, as that method must often be attended with the most dangerous consequences, such delinquents being generally beyond the reach of the ordinary courts of judicature. He promised, however, to be very tender of his people's privileges, and to commit none for the future for refusing to lend money, and that the causes of all commitments should be expressed as soon as it could be done with safety. This letter, together with the influence of the court party in the house of peers, had great effect on their proceedings; and six weeks were spent in hearing the pleadings of the king's council against, and the arguments of the commons for, the petition of right. During the whole time of the dependence of this petition, the court party did every thing in their power to disconcert the commons in their proceedings; and, in a conference between the two houses, the archbishop of Canterbury, who was sincerely desirous of effecting an union between the king and the commons, proposed, for the sake of peace, to throw the substance of the petition into the form of propositions, to be presented by both houses to the king for his consent. These propositions were the following:

" 1. That his majesty would be pleased graciously to declare, that the good old law called Magna Charta, and the six statutes conceived to be declarations, or explanations of that law, continue still in force to all intents and purposes.

" 2. That his majesty would be pleased graciously to declare, that according to Magna Charta, and the statutes aforesaid, as also according to the most ancient customs and laws of this land, every free subject of this realm hath a fundamental property in his goods, and a fundamental property in his person.

" 3. That his majesty would be pleased graciously to declare, that it is his royal pleasure to ratify and confirm unto all, and every his faithful and loyal subjects, all their ancient, several, just liberties, privileges and rights, in as ample and beneficial a manner to all intents and purposes, as their ancestors did enjoy the same, under the government of the best of his most noble progenitors.

" 4. That his majesty would be pleased most graciously to declare, for the good contentment of his loyal subjects, and for the securing them from future fears, that in all causes within the cognizance of the common law, and concerning the liberties of his subjects, his majesty would proceed according to the laws established in the kingdom, and in no other manner.

" 5. And as touching his majesty's royal prerogative, intrinsic to his sovereignty, and intrusted him from God ad commune totius populi salutem, et non ad destructionem, his majesty would resolve not to use or divert the same to the prejudice of any of his loyal people, in the property of their goods, or liberty of their persons. And in case, for the security of his majesty's person, the common safety of his people, or the peaceable government of his kingdom, his majesty shall find just cause to imprison or restrain any man's person, his majesty would graciously declare, that within a convenient time, he shall, and will, express the cause of his commitment, or restraint, either general or special, and upon a cause so expressed, will leave him immediately to be tried, according to the common justice of the kingdom."

These propositions were by no means agreeable to the commons; but being very desirous of maintaining a good correspondence with the lords, without whose concurrence all their labours in forming the petition of right must be abortive, they made use of every reason in their power to convince the peers that these propositions were not sufficient to secure the liberty of the subject; a positive law only, in which the rights of the people were fully defined and strongly asserted, could answer the intended purpose. Their reasons at last prevailed. The lords consented to the petition of right, but proposed to subjoin to it the following clause: "We humbly present this petition to your majesty, not only with a care of preserving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave intire that sovereign power, with which your majesty is entrusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people."

It required not the penetration of the leaders of the commons to perceive, that this clause, if suffered to be added to the petition of right, would be sufficient to elude its whole force; and it was therefore unanimously rejected. "If (said Sir Thomas Wentworth) we admit this addition, we shall leave the subject in a worse state than we found him, and receive little thanks for our labour when we return home. Let us leave all power to his majesty to punish malefactors; but these laws are not acquainted with sovereign power; we desire no new thing, nor do we offer to trench on his majesty's prerogative; we may not recede from this petition, either in part or in whole." Another conference was therefore held with the lords, where these reasons were thought satisfactory: the petition of right passed both houses of parliament, and is as follows:

" To the king's most excellent majesty,
I. Humbly shew to our sovereign lord the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, That whereas it is declared and enacted, by a statute made in the reign of king Edward I. commonly called Statutum de tallagio non concedendo, that no tallage or aid shall be levied by the king or his heirs in this realm, without the good-will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm; and by authority of parliament holden in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, That, from thenceforth, no person should be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, because such loans were against reason, and the franchise of the land; and, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, " that none should be charged by any charge or imposition called a benevolence; or by such like charge: by which the statutes before-mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent in parliament.

II. " Yet, nevertheless, of late divers commissions directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have issued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty; and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered to them not warrantable by the laws and statutes of this realm; and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance before your privy council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in several counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majesty, or your privy-council, against the laws and free customs of this realm.

III. " And whereas also, by the statute called The Great Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, That no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseized of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

IV. " And in the eight and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, That no man, of what state or condition that he be, should be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.

V. " Nevertheless, against the tenor of the said statutes, and other the good laws and statutes of your realm to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned without any cause shewed; and when, for their deliverance, they were brought before justice, by your majesty's writs of habeas corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy-council; and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to law.

VI. " And whereas, of late, great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed in divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, against their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. " And whereas also, by authority of parliament, in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, That no man should be fore-judged of life or limb against the form of the great charter and law of the land: and by the said great charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of the same realm, or by acts of parliament: and whereas no offender, of what kind soever, is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, under " your majesty's great seal, have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the justice of martial law, against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever, and by such summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death according to the law martial.

VIII. " By pretext whereof some of your majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death; when and where, if, by the laws and statutes of the realm, they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

IX. " And also sundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming an exemption, have escaped the punishments due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused or forborn to proceed against such offenders, according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said offenders were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissioners as aforesaid: which commissions, and all other of like nature, were wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of your realm.

X. " They do therefore humbly pray your most excellent majesty, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent, by act of parliament; and that none be called to make answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof: and that no freeman, in any such manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned or detained: and that your majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be so burthened in time to come: and that the aforesaid commissions, for proceeding by martial law, may be revoked and annulled: and that hereafter no commissions of like nature may issue forth, to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid, left, by colour of them, any of your majesty's subjects be destroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.

XI. " All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: and that your majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, That the awards, doings, and proceedings to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence or example: and that your majesty would also be pleased, for the further comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, That in the things aforesaid, all your officers and ministers shall serve you according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom."

The royal assent now only was wanting to give this famous petition the force of a law. The king accordingly came to the house of peers, sent for the commons; and being seated in the chair of state, the petition was read to him; but, to the astonishment of all men, instead of the clear, concise, and usual form by which every bill is confirmed or rejected, Charles made the following answer to the petition: " The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm; and that

"that the statutes be put into due execution; that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppression, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds himself as much obliged, as of his prerogative."

Nothing proves the imprudence of Charles's council more than this strange answer given to the petition of right. He certainly ought either to have passed it in the usual form, or rejected it with firmness. This evasive answer tended only to raise the jealousy and inflame the anger of the commons; for it could not be imagined they would rest satisfied with so vague and undetermined a reply. They accordingly returned in a very ill humour to their house; and gave vent to their indignation by censuring the sermons of Dr. Manwaring, whom they impeached before the peers.

But this censure was far from dissipating the chagrin of the commons, a gloomy silence for some time prevailed, and several of the leading members burst into tears. Their consternation was increased when Sir John Elliot, delivering himself in his usual manner against the minister, was stopped by the speaker, who declared that he was ordered to suffer no such speeches to proceed. Upon this the house came to the following resolution; "That every member of the house is free from any undutiful speech, from the beginning of the parliament unto this day; and ordered that no member presumed to leave the house on pain of being sent to the Tower." This resolution being passed, the speaker, at his own earnest request, was permitted to leave the house, and the debate was immediately renewed in the committee with greater vigour than ever. At last Sir Edward Coke, after an elaborate detail of the power and privileges of the commons, proceeded in the following manner: "What shall we do? Let us palliate no longer; if we do, God will not prosper us. I think the duke of Buckingham is the cause of all our miseries, and till the king be informed thereof, we shall never go out with honour or sit with honour here: that man is the grievance of grievances; let us set down the causes of our disasters, and all will reflect upon him."

This speech was received with the highest applause, every part of the house rang with approving acclamations. Mr. Selden advised that a declaration should be drawn up under four heads. 1. To express the dutiful behaviour of the house towards his majesty. 2. To represent their liberties that are violated. 3. To present what was the real intention of the house. 4. That the duke of Buckingham, fearing lest he might be questioned, interposed and occasioned this distraction. "All this time, continued he, we have cast a mantle over what was done in the last parliament; but being now forced again to look upon that man, let us proceed with what was then well begun, and let the charge be renewed that was made against him last parliament, to which he returned an answer, but the particulars were too insufficient that one might demand judgment upon that answer only."

During these debates the speaker was with the king, informing him of the sense and disposition of the house. Charles was in the utmost perplexity how to behave in this alarming crisis; but understanding by another messenger, that the commons were on the point of naming Buckingham as the author of all their grievances, he sent back the speaker, who obtained a respite of their proceedings till the next day. Charles spent the intermediate space in meditating on what answer he should return to the joint address of both houses for a more satisfactory answer to their petition of right. When the commons met the next day, they proceeded on their intended declaration. Among other heads they mentioned a design which the king had formed of bringing over into England a body of German troops; and Burlamachi, a foreign merchant, being ordered to attend, acknowledged his receiving thirty thousand pounds by privy seals, for purchasing horses, a thousand of which were actually bought; and were to have been brought over into England; but that he had since heard they were countermanded. No measure surely could be projected more odious to the whole nation. It must, however, be confessed, that the king was so far right, that he had at last fallen upon the only effectual method for supporting his prerogative. But at the same time he should have been sensible, that till he was provided with a sufficient military force, all his attempts, in opposition to the rising spirit of the nation, must, in the end, prove abortive.

It was now sufficiently evident that the whole storm which had been so long gathering, would soon burst upon the head of Buckingham, unless some method could be discovered to prevent it; and no method seemed so proper as that of giving the commons satisfaction with regard to their petition of right. The king, therefore, came to the house of peers, and pronouncing the usual form of words, "Let it be law as is desired," gave full satisfaction and authority to the petition. The acclamations with which the house resounded, and the universal joy diffused over the whole nation, shewed how much this petition had been the object of the views and expectations of all men.

Had the king given the same answer when he came first to the house of peers, there is the highest probability that it would not have been in the power of the ill-designing members, for such there certainly were at that time among the commons, to have prevented an entire union between him and his people. But the repeated declarations he had made to support every branch of the prerogative, and the avowed tendency of his principles, through the whole progress of the debate, towards despotism, gave many of the members, who wished well to the peace and tranquillity of their country, strong prepossessions against his designs, which through the intermediate discoveries that were made and aggravated to his disadvantage, were improved by his enemies into certainties; and the house of commons thought, that they had now no safety without a change of men as well as of measures. It was therefore pretended, that the petition of right was only declaratory of what the people's rights really were, but was no defence against abuse of the public treasure, against the like miscarriages of national expeditions, and against similar errors in the executive power. This was directly contrary to the opinion of his majesty. He imagined that by passing the petition of right, he had given a full compensation for all that his subjects had suffered through the abuse of prerogative, and that they ought to look upon it as a sufficient security for the future; that he had passed it on condition that all enquiries should cease, both against men and measures, and that the necessary supplies should be cheerfully granted. But though the commons determined to carry on their scrutiny, the bill for five subsidies which had been formerly voted, immediately passed the house; because the granting of that supply was, in a manner, tacitly contracted for, upon the royal assent being given to the petition; and had faith been here violated, no farther confidence could have subsisted between king and parliament.

Buckingham in the mean time was labouring to retrieve his popularity, but in vain; the nation in general had conceived such strong prejudices against him, that all his endeavours could not remove them. About one hundred and fifty members of the commons were for moderate measures, and had voted against the remonstrance; but his enemies prevailed, and every method was employed to force the king to part with his minister. Some time since a commission had been granted to the most considerable officers of the crown, empowering them to concert among themselves the best methods of levying money by impositions or otherwise. The commons endeavoured to make Buckingham the author of this commission, which they termed a commission of excise, though that term is not so much as mentioned in it. But Charles, to remove even the shadow of a dispute, upon the first suggestion that this commission was contrary to the petition of right, ordered it to be cancelled.

This condescension was, however, far from satisfying the commons. Grievances were every hour multiplied; several resolutions were passed against the authors of them, and the vindictive spirit against the minister was carried on to a much higher pitch than ever. It was now openly said in the house, that the king, by the petition of right, could no longer levy tonnage and poundage. All the members therefore who were desirous of consolidating an union between the king and his parliament, were for granting the king tonnage and poundage by a bill in parliament; because they knew that without this aid, the five subsidies would not be sufficient to defray the expenses of government. But it was necessary that these rates should be settled, and the proportion in which they were to be levied, clearly determined. These, by the arts of the designing members, proved so perplexed a work, that the king, despairing of any farther assistance from this parliament, sent a message to the house, declaring his design of putting an end to the session in a few days. This gave his enemies a pretence for dropping the bill, and to draw up a remonstrance, in which they enumerated the right enjoyed by the people during several reigns of not paying tonnage and poundage, till laid upon them by their own consent in parliament; and then declared to the king, "that receiving tonnage and poundage, and other impositions, not granted by parliament, is a breach of the fundamental liberties of this kingdom, and contrary to his majesty's royal answer to the petition of right."

Exasperated at the behaviour of the commons, Charles no sooner heard of this remonstrance being formed, than he determined to put an end to the session before it could be presented. He accordingly, while the remonstrance was reading in the lower house of commons, came suddenly to the upper, and sending for the commons, prorogued the parliament with the following speech from the throne.

"It may seem strange that I came so suddenly to end this session, before I give my assent to the bills; I will tell you the cause, though I must avow, that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one, that a while ago the house of commons gave me a remonstrance, how acceptable every man may judge, and for the merit of it, I will not call that in question; for I am sure no wise man can justify it.

"Now since I am fully informed that a second remonstrance is preparing for me, to take away the profit of my tonnage and poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my crown, by alledging, I have given away my right thereto, by my answer to your petition.

"This is so prejudicial to me, that I am forced to end this session some few hours, before I meant, being not willing to receive any more remonstrances to which I must give an harsh answer. And since I see, that even the house of commons begin already to make false constructions of what I granted in your petition, lest it be worse interpreted in the country, I will now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof.

"The profession of both houses, in the time of forming this petition, was no way to trench upon my prerogative, saying they had neither intention nor power to hurt it. Therefore it must needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my subjects. Yet to shew the clearness of my intentions, that I neither repent, nor mean to recede from any thing I have promised you, I do here declare myself, that those things which have been done, whereby many have had some cause to expect the liberties of the subject to be trenced upon, which indeed was the "first and true ground of the petition, shall not hereafter be drawn into example, for your prejudice; and from time to time, on the word of a king, ye shall not have the like cause to complain. But as for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me, I am sure, to grant."

"To conclude, I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have spoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but especially you, my lords, the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of laws; for none of the houses of parliament, either joint or separate, (what new doctrine soever may be raised) have any power either to make or declare a law, without my consent."

It will perhaps be needless to make any reflections on the insatiation which seems to have possessed both the king and the commons at the close of this session. Charles, notwithstanding his passing the petition of right, and receiving the greatest subsidy ever granted to a king of England; notwithstanding the manifest indications that his people were resolved to make him greater and happier than any of his predecessors, could not divest himself from that fatal notion that the taking tonnage and poundage without the consent of parliament, was a prerogative of the crown. The declaration he made in the above speech, that he never meant to give up tonnage and poundage, and that the commons never meant to ask it, was a wretched piece of sophistry. The intention of the commons is sufficiently implied in the petition of right, where it is said, "That they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, without consent of parliament." On the other hand, the leading members of the commons cannot be wholly cleared of a duplicity of conduct in this affair. It is certain that they foreado the difficulty that afterwards happened, and for that reason carefully avoided, in all their debates, the least mention of tonnage and poundage, lest it might obstruct the passing of the petition. This conduct, however, is to be imputed to a few only; for it is sufficiently evident from the great progress made in the bill for granting to the king by law, what he was determined to levy without it, that the house in general meant well. After all some difficulties still remain: nor is it easy to determine, whether Charles had suffered the parliament to continue, some of the members, who were no friends to monarchy, would not have found means to have thrown out the tonnage and poundage bill, or at least to have rendered it ineffectual. But however that be, the precipitate measures pursued by Charles greatly increased that influence, which, by a little moderation and forbearance on his part, must have been destroyed, by the real designs of its authors being discovered.

The nation had now but a melancholy prospect, with regard to the war carried on against France and Spain. Rochelle had for some time been invested, and it was apparent by Richelieu's taking the conduct of the siege upon himself, that he intended to exterminate the Hugonots, whose whole dependence was now upon the English. Charles was sincerely desirous of relieving them, and had given them from time to time assurances of his intention. The earl of Denbigh was accordingly sent in the beginning of May with a fleet to their assistance. This armament consisted of ten ships of the line, and about sixty smaller vessels, most of them transports, carrying about two thousand, two hundred soldiers. As soon as the fleet reached Rochelle, Denbigh found means to inform the inhabitants of that city, that he was come to their relief, and desired they would place lights on as many of the steeples as the months for which they had still provision; but no such signals appearing, it was concluded that they were already in the greatest want of necessaries. The English admiral found the entrance into the harbour guarded by a great a great number of French ships; and promised the Rochellers, that he would, upon the return of the tide, attack the fleet of the enemy. During the night, a battery of nine pieces of cannon was erected at the mouth of the harbour, and played furiously on the English; and before noon the next day, the French ships were filled with troops; an army of land forces was drawn up upon the shore to oppose their landing, and all the necessary dispositions were made for a vigorous defence, in case any attack should be made by the English. These difficulties did not, however, intimidate the English admiral; he prepared to relieve the place, and to sink the French ships that guarded the passage into the harbour; but the wind changing, he was obliged to lay aside his design. Three days after, he attacked the French ships on one side, while the Rochellers cannonaded their land forces on the other, and brought up four of their largest vessels, which had been purposely built to draw as little water as possible, in order to pass the bar; but found the attempt impracticable, not only for want of water, but also from the dispositions the French had made to defend the passage. A few of the smaller ships, however, passed the bar, but were so warmly opposed by the French artillery, that they were obliged to return. Upon this miscarriage, a council of war was held; where some of the English captains were of opinion, that the relief of the place was impracticable, and that the Rochellers had deceived them with regard to the facility of entering the harbour. This opinion was, however, by no means unanimous; for the English vice-admiral, and one captain Carr, exclaimed against the pusillanimity of the rest; and the few small ships in the fleet, belonging to the French protestants, offered, by the assistance of four merchantmen well armed, with three fire-ships, and a proportional number of land forces, to throw a quantity of provisions into the town. The earl of Denbigh, however, refused the offer, notwithstanding the Rochellers agreed to pay for all the English ships that might miscarry in this attempt. But neither this offer, nor the tears and prayers of the deputies of Rochelle, could prevail upon Denbigh. He returned to England, where he was loaded with calumny and disgrace.

The enemies of Buckingham had industriously circulated the remonstrances of the commons against him in every part of the nation. He perceived his dreadful situation; and found the wings of royal authority, broad as they were, too narrow to shelter him from the dreadful storm raised against him by the parliament. He plainly saw that no efforts of his own, no concessions of his master, could recover his credit, and that nothing less than his blood could satisfy his enemies. He therefore threw aside all other considerations, and resolved, if possible, to signalize himself, and recover the favour of the people, however he might stand with the parliament; and well knew, that nothing could so readily effect this as his relieving Rochelle. He accordingly caused ten ships of a particular form, and peculiarly adapted to pass the bar, to be built with the utmost expedition, and made the necessary dispatches for sailing, to relieve that place, now reduced to the last extremity. But a fixed gloom was settled on his countenance; he appeared abroad with omens of misfortune in his aspect; his unsteady motions, his dark expressions, his earnestly recommending his wife and children to Charles, his frequent solitary entertainments with his mother, his reflections on the tender ties of nature, and the soft endearments of life, which he was just going to leave behind him, sufficiently declared that he feared his approaching fate. But nothing unbecoming a man escaped from his lips: and the fleet being ready to sail, he repaired to Portsmouth, determined to relieve Rochelle, or perish in the attempt.

One Felton, a man of a good family, but of a gloomy, enthusiastic disposition, had served in the station of lieutenant under the duke, in his late expedition to Rhé. His captain being killed in the retreat, Felton applied to Buckingham for the company; but being refused, he threw up his commission, and retired, discontented, from the army. The remonstrance of the commons roused at once both his resentment and enthusiastic fury; he was now convinced, that it would be a meritorious service in the sight of heaven to murder Buckingham, whom the parliament had accused as the author of all the misfortunes of his country. Filled with these ideas, he repaired to Portsmouth, fully determined to put his bloody design into immediate execution.

Early in the morning of the twenty-third of August, Buckingham received some advices, informing him, that a small convoy of provisions had got safe into Rochelle. This intelligence he communicated to the duke of Soubise, and other French gentlemen in his train, who insisted, with great vehemence, that the whole was false, and calculated only to retard the sailing of the fleet. During these assertions, the duke drew towards the door; and turning himself in the passage, to speak to Sir Thomas Fryar, a colonel in the army, he was stabbed by an unknown hand, over Sir Thomas's shoulder. The knife, with which the wound was given, reached his heart; and, without uttering any other words, than "The villain has killed me," he drew out the knife, and immediately expired in a deluge of his own blood.

As no person had seen the hand that gave the blow, it was conjectured, that the murder had been perpetrated by the French gentlemen, whose angry tone of voice had been heard, while their words had not been understood by the people. Some were for putting them to death immediately, but were prevented by the more considerate part, who thought it highly reasonable they should undergo a lawful trial. In the midst of this confusion, a hat was found near the door, in the inside of which was sewed a paper, containing three or four lines of the remonstrance of the commons, which declared Buckingham an enemy to the kingdom. All were now convinced that this hat belonged to the assassin; but there was sufficient reason to think he had escaped far enough; during the tumult, not to be found without a hat. They were, however, mistaken; Felton never attempted to fly from justice, and he was soon perceived walking very sedately before the door without his hat. He was immediately seized, confessed the murder, and seemed to triumph in the action. The enraged soldiers drew their swords, and were for sacrificing him immediately on the spot. Their fury had no effect upon Felton; he readily exposed his breast to their swords, and seemed willing to fall a present victim to their anger. Their fury was, however, prevented; and the assassin was secured. Some gentlemen, desirous of finding whether Felton had any accomplices, hinted that Buckingham, though dangerously wounded, was not dead, and that there were great hopes of his recovery. Felton smiled at this, and replied, in words very expressive of his enthusiasm, "I know that he is dead; (said he) for I had the force of forty men when I struck the blow." Being questioned with regard to the persons by whose instigations he had performed the horrid deed, he told them, that their inquiries were useless; that no person upon earth had credit sufficient with him to have disposed him to undertake such an action; that no man living was privy to his purpose; that the resolution proceeded wholly from the impulse of his own conscience; and that if his hat was found, his motives would sufficiently appear: for, persuaded that he should perish in the attempt, he had taken care to explain them; that no innocent person might suffer on his account.

Charles was at church when the news was brought him of his favourite's death; but he was so earnest in his devotions, that no discomposure appeared in his action, nor alteration in his countenance. The service was, was, however, no sooner over, than he retired to his chamber, and gave vent to his sorrows in a flood of tears. And during his whole life, expressed his regard for Buckingham by a series of munificent acts towards his widow, his children, and his friends. Some of the council, and bishop Laud in particular, threatened Felton with the rack, if he did not discover his accomplices. But this had no effect upon the assassin: he calmly replied, "that if he was put to the torture, he did not know whom he might name in the extremity of anguish, perhaps the bishop himself." The judges, however, being consulted, declared, that though that practice had been formerly common, no man, by the laws of England, could be put to the torture. Reflection and confinement had more effect on the enthusiastic spirit of Felton than all their threatenings. He seemed, in some measure, to recover from his delusion, expressed remorse for what he had done, and suffered death with composure and resignation.

Thus fell, in the thirty-seventh year of his age, the celebrated George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, whose rise was sudden, his promotions rapid, and his end untimely. As a minister, he deserved the public hatred, as much as he was unworthy of the favour of the two monarchs whom he had exposed to so many misfortunes. As a man, he merited the highest reproaches of the good and the virtuous. It is impossible to excuse either James or his son for their attachment to a man who had neither merit nor virtue. To how many calamities are states exposed, when the royal favour invests with power an unprincipled wretch, who lies under no restraint with regard to its exercise!

The concern shewed by Charles for the death of his favourite did not, however, extinguish his desire of relieving Rochelle. He gave the command of the armament to the earl of Lindsey, and repaired in person to Portsmouth, in order to hasten the sailing of the fleet. His presence had such effect, that more was done in ten or twelve days, than in almost as many weeks before. It was, however, the eighth of September, before the fleet sailed from Portsmouth, when the vast genius of Richelieu had finished a work thought impossible to be executed in so short a space of time: this was a mole of more than a mile in length, carried across the mouth of the harbour, in that boisterous ocean, and by means of which all relief by sea was cut off. On the eighteenth of September, the fleet reached the road of Rochelle; but a calm coming on, it was the twentieth before the ships approached the mole, when a furious cannonade began, and continued for two hours, without any great loss on either side. Next day the cannonading continued, but with less vigour; though it was known, by a gentleman who had found means to escape from Rochelle, that the inhabitants, unless relieved in two days, must surrender. But even this intelligence produced no effect on the English captains, who appear to have been destitute of experience, and some of them of courage. The duke of Soubise offered to attempt the mole with the French ships, provided the English would promise to follow him; but this proposal was rejected, in a council of war, by a majority of the English captains. The count Laval next proposed, with the help of artificial mines, contrived in three ships, to attempt to blow up the mole; but this was also rejected, and the time was spent in fruitless cannonading. At last it was determined, in a council of war, to make one general and decisive attack upon the mole; but before the design could be carried into execution, the besieged were obliged to capitulate. Of fifteen thousand persons who had been shut up in the town, four thousand only survived the fatigues and famine they had undergone. A more shocking scene of calamity was never beheld than Rochelle presented at the time of its surrender. The living were not sufficient to bury the dead, so that vermin and birds of prey devoured the uninterred bodies in the streets. Many carried their own coffins into the church-yards, to lie down in them, never more to rise; and the few inhabitants who survived appeared rather as spectres and skeletons than men.

The reduction of Rochelle was the first necessary step towards the prosperity of France. Foreign enemies, as well as domestic factions, being deprived of that resource, the kingdom began to shine out in its full splendor, and gradually to gain an ascendancy over the rival power of Spain. The French king, however, used his conquest with great moderation; the Hugonots still enjoyed a toleration, though every order of the state, and every sect, were obliged to pay submission to the lawful authority of the sovereign.

The failure of the enterprize to Rochelle tended greatly to diminish the king's authority in the parliament during the approaching session. Nor did his measures at home tend to raise the character of his government. He again revived the iniquitous opinions of the judges, and some oppressive practices in former times, to justify the imposition of twenty shillings a ton upon wines, and five shillings and sixpence a hundred upon currants; he even declared in full council, that the tax should be levied with rigour, and such merchants as refused to pay it exemplarily punished. He was not insensible of the ferment which these proceedings must occasion in the kingdom, but took no pains to prevent it. His coffers were now full, and he could talk with his parliament upon more equal terms than before. It was therefore resolved to justify the proceedings of the government upon this principle, that though his majesty's predecessors had raised tonnage and poundage by act of parliament, yet they had, in fact, levied it in the late reigns when no such act subsisted: that if the parliament would agree to pass such an act, and make it commence from the beginning of the king's reign, his majesty's proceeding would be justified under that act, and he would desist from his claim of raising the tax by his prerogative; but if no such bill passed, his majesty would be justified, because he did no more than had been done by his predecessors.

The king was confirmed in these resolutions by the late success that had attended his endeavours to bring over the famous Sir Thomas Wentworth to his interest. This gentleman had been a principal leader in the opposition, and was considered by all parties as one of the most able members of the British senate. On his embracing the measures of the court, he was created viscount Wentworth, and earl of Strafford, and placed at the head of the ministry. Ashamed at what the party he had abandoned termed apostacy, Strafford, for some time, concealed his change of sentiments; but at last boldly justified it, by saying, that he had gone as far in the opposition as was consistent with his conscience, or the constitution of his country; and that he had not left his party till he perceived they had views of a very different nature from the redress of grievances, or an alteration of measures. These excuses were treated as chimerical by the heads of the party he had forsaken; and Mr. Pym in particular desired Wentworth not to take any pains in justifying his conduct, but added, "Though you have left us, we will not leave you, while your head is on your shoulders."

AD. 1629 The parliament met on the tenth of January, and immediately proceeded to take into consideration every thing that had been transacted against the liberty of the subject, and in direct opposition to the petition of right. Several complaints were immediately made to the house by merchants, whose goods had been seized in consequence of their having refused to pay the duties of tonnage and poundage. While the members were employed in debating on this subject with their usual violence, the king sent a message to the commons, desiring they would proceed no farther in that business, till he could speak to both houses in person at Whitehall. The lords lords and commons accordingly attended him the next day, when he endeavoured to justify his conduct on the principles already mentioned to have been laid down in his council. He blamed the commons for their general resolution of enquiring into all the infractions of the petition of right, and recommended to their dispatch; the bill for tonnage and poundage, which, he said, would have been passed last session, had there been time sufficient for that purpose, and it was upon that presumption he had ordered his officers to act in the manner they had done.

But instead of following his majesty's directions, the violent members, who were no strangers to the effect of speeches in popular assemblies, turned the attention of the house to matters of religion; poured out the most inveterate invectives against Arminianism, which they termed the spawn of popery; but in reality they meant nothing more by the term, than bishop Laud and his party, who in that particular point of doctrine were more justifiable than in any other. An Arminian was said to be as bad as a papist, and some declared that they feared his success more, than a second invasion by a Spanish armada. When the house was sufficiently heated by declamatory speeches, Mr. Pym moved to give religion the precedency of all other matters. The motion was agreed to, and a committee appointed accordingly. This was a great point gained, especially as under the head of religion they voted "an enquiry into all ecclesiastical preferments; into the cessation of the execution of the laws against papists; into the employments and encouragements they had obtained; into the growth of superstitious ceremonies, of which Cousins, a prebendary of Durham, was mentioned as the principal author; and into the growth of heresies, false doctrines, and other opinions." The consideration of so many subjects could not fail of employing the house for a great length of time.

Charles saw the intention of the commons, but thought it imprudent to break with them immediately merely because they refused to proceed to the bill of tonnage and poundage; he thought, and indeed very reasonably, that he could better justify any violent measures he might afterwards be obliged to take, if he allowed them to carry to the utmost extremity their attacks upon his government and prerogative. He therefore contented himself for the present with soliciting the house by messages and speeches. But the commons, instead of listening to his solicitations, proceeded to carry their censorial scrutiny into his management of religion, the only grievance to which they had not as yet applied a sufficient remedy by the petition of right.

But though they pretended the utmost regard for religion, their principal design was to wrest from the king the duties of tonnage and poundage, in order to render him absolutely dependent on the parliament for support. The right of tonnage and poundage on the importation and exportation of merchandize, though originally the mere gift of the people, had been so strongly confirmed to the crown since the reign of Henry IV. that the kings of England had always claimed it from the moment of their accession. This right, which had been granted for life to former princes, was allowed to Charles only for one year. Finding that the intention of the commons was to strip him of it entirely, he sent them a message, importing, "That he had never pretended to look upon it as a branch of the prerogative; that necessity alone had compelled him to levy it till that time, and, in order to terminate all disputes upon that subject, requested that the commons would pass the bill, that he might receive it as a gift from his people."

This message, like all the rest, was disregarded by the commons, they continued to give the preference to religion, and made some attempts to annul the consecration of Montague, lately promoted to the see of Colchester, for certain complaints that had been offered against him by one Jones, an obscure person:

but failing in this unaccountable attempt, they attacked the pardons that had been granted to Montague, Mainwaring, Sibthorpe, and other divines of Laud's party, who had been censured by the commons. It was upon this occasion that Oliver Cromwell, who had then a seat in the house, first distinguished his zeal, by shewing how instrumental Neile, bishop of Winchester, had been in procuring these pardons. Sir Robert Philips called upon the attorney-general to give an account by what authority he drew these pardons, and a committee was appointed accordingly. Upon enquiry it appeared, that the warrants had been brought to the attorney-general by the earl of Dorset and the lord Carleton, and that the bishop of Winchester had corrected them with his own hand, and inserted the names of Cousins, Mainwaring and Sibthorpe. It also appeared upon farther enquiry, that an information had been given upon oath against Cousins, for denying the king's supremacy in matters of religion, and that the attorney-general had, from a hint given him by the bishop of Winchester, disregarded the information, because it came from one King, whom the bishop said was a very empty fellow and deserved no credit. Elliot upon this discovery was very severe upon the attorney-general, whom he threatened with an impeachment for high-treason for a neglect of duty.

While the house was engaged in these religious disputes, Mr. Rolls, one of the members, complained to the house, that he had the day before been served with a subpoena to attend the court of star-chamber, but that at night he received a letter from the attorney-general intimating, that it had been done by mistake of the messenger, and that the information should be withdrawn. The house, however, voted the serving of Rolls with a subpoena to be a breach of privilege. They also proceeded to enquire into the grievances of other merchants, and to censure the officers who had seized their goods for refusing to pay the duties of tonnage and poundage. These proceedings alarmed the king, and a council was summoned to consider the most proper method to be pursued on this occasion. And as the house of commons had founded their resolution upon an opinion, that the custom-house officers had seized the goods upon their own account, Charles thought proper to send a message to the house, importing, "That what was formerly done by his farmers and officers of the customs, was done by his own direction and command, being himself, for the most part, present in council: and if he had at any time been absent from the board, yet he was minutely acquainted with all their transactions, gave full directions in every particular, and therefore in this could not sever the act of his officers from his own, nor could his officers suffer for it without the highest dishonour to his majesty." The house was so highly exasperated at this message, that after many bitter speeches, the question was proposed to be put, that the seizing Mr. Rolls goods was a breach of privilege; but the speaker informed the house that he was commanded by his majesty not to put the question. This threw the house into the utmost consternation, and they adjourned themselves for one day. When they met, the speaker told them, that he had the king's command for a farther adjournment, and to put no question. Having made this declaration he rose and left the chair; but was pushed back again into it, and detained there by force by Mr. Hollis and Mr. Valentine, while Sir John Elliot read the following remonstrance:

1. "Whoever shall make any innovations in religion, or by favour or countenance seem to extend or introduce popery or Arminianism, or other opinions contrary to the truth and the orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to his kingdom and commonwealth.

2. "Whoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

3. "If any merchant or other person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield, or pay the said subsidies of tonnage and poundage; not being granted by parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England; and an enemy to the same."

This remonstrance was passed by acclamation rather than by vote; while many of the members, thinking the leaders had gone too far in their opposition, expressed their dislike of the whole proceeding, and the greatest indecencies, even to blows, were committed. The king sent the gentleman-usher of the house of lords, but the doors were locked and he could obtain no admittance till the remonstrance was finished. As soon as the door was opened, he, by the king's order, took the mace from the table, which put an end to their proceedings; and a few days after the parliament was dissolved.

Such were the proceedings of this famous parliament, whose heats concerning religion, and their bitterness against all who were suspected of what they termed Arminianism, were as unjustifiable and as undutiful, as the noble stand they made for the personal liberties and properties of the subject were memorable and glorious.

This violent rupture between the king and his parliament alarmed the nation; but Charles took no care to make use of lenient measures, which might, perhaps, have effected a reconciliation. On the contrary, he inflamed the discontents of the people, by a severity which he wanted power, perhaps inclination, to carry to extremity. He committed Denzil Holles, esq; Sir John Elliot, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, esq; William Coriton, Walter Long, William Shoude, and Benjamin Valentine, to prison, on account of the late tumultuous proceedings in the house, which were termed seditious. Elliot, Holles, and Valentine were brought to their trial in the court of king's bench: but refusing to answer before an inferior court for their conduct as members of a superior, they were condemned to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, to find sureties for their good behaviour, and to be fined, the two former a thousand pounds a piece, and the latter five hundred. Sir John Elliot died in custody, and was universally considered as a martyr for the liberties of England.

Charles, that he might no longer be harassed with the turbulence of the commons, made peace with France, abandoning the Hugonots to the mercy of Lewis XIII. and soon after concluded a treaty with the Spaniards, from whom he obtained nothing more than a general promise of their using their good offices in restoring the elector palatine. Being thus at peace with the neighbouring powers, eased of a burthen too heavy for him, instructed by experience, naturally moderate, virtuous from principle, no longer a slave to the pernicious counsels of Buckingham, and blest with an able minister in Wentworth, earl of Strafford, it was natural to think that the troubles of his reign were over, and that a series of tranquillity would succeed the storms of popular contention. But this was not the case. New difficulties, new causes of distrust, arose among the people, and the olive wand of peace diffused not domestic felicity over the kingdom. So difficult is it to govern happily, when faction has weakened the resources of government.

A. D. 1630. Charles, like his father, was a theologian, and equally zealous to maintain his system of religion, as to support the prerogative of his crown. Unfortunately for him, and unfortunately for the peace of the kingdom, the king honoured with his confidence Laud, bishop of London, a prelate whose disinterested principles and strict morals were doubtless praise-worthy; but whose superstitious prejudices, obstinate zeal, enterprising spirit, and inflexible firmness, in opposition to the spirit of the nation, threatened the greatest misfortunes to the state. Laud was very desirous of advancing the power of the priesthood, and of multiplying church ceremonies; several of which he introduced, and most of them very similar to those of the Romish church. The puritans beheld, with horror, what they termed abominable superstitions. The communion-table railed in, the ministers dressed in hoops to administer the sacrament, the communicants obliged to receive it kneeling, the crucifix and other images placed in the churches, were, in their eyes, so many scandalous attributes of anti-christ. The court of Rome itself entertained hopes of regaining its authority in this island; and in order to forward Laud's good intentions, an offer was twice made him in private, of a cardinal's hat, which he declined accepting. The general cry, however, was, that the bishop of London was endeavouring to restore popery. One of the daughters of the earl of Devonshire having turned catholic, was asked by Laud the reason of her conversion: "It is principally," replied she, because I hate to travel in a crowd: for perceiving that you and numbers more are making preparations for Rome, I thought it more convenient to set out before you, that I might not be jostled in the multitude."

But if the bishop and his partizans carried the spiritual jurisdiction too high on one hand, and thereby incurred the hatred of the people, they did not fail, on the other, to preach up the most implicit obedience to the royal authority, the sure means of obtaining the favour of his majesty. Laud was accordingly advanced to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury, which empowered him to exercise a kind of despotism with vigour in the church. Distressed for money, notwithstanding the strictest economy, Charles began to make a freer use of his authority. Illegal as the collection of tonnage and poundage was, the council pressed it with the utmost violence. This induced the great merchants to enquire more than ever into its legality, and were soon convinced that the principle on which it was founded struck at the root of liberty. This alarmed the whole fraternity of merchants, and their fears were greatly increased by the publication of the following resolutions of the council.

"That warrants should be directed to the officers of the customs in the port of London, and elsewhere, to seize and detain the goods of any person, who should attempt to land them without warrant till the duties were paid."

"And that such merchants goods as remained on ship-board, should be removed into store-houses on the custom-house quay; and for want of room into the Tower, there to remain till his majesty's duties, and the freight due to ship-masters were satisfied."

"And whereas attempts were made by replevin, directed to the sheriff of London, to obtain those goods out of the king's store-houses, the messengers of the council were ordered to detain them in their custody, and to apprehend all persons who should presume to make resistance."

At the same time strict orders were sent to the officers and chief magistrates of the chief ports of the kingdom, to assist the officers of the customs, in case any opposition should be made by refractory persons. Sir Francis Cottingham was authorized to call before him such merchants as had been trusted by the collectors for sums now due by customs, and who had protracted the payment; and to require them to pay the several sums they owed his majesty without delay.

Warrants were also issued from the council empowering their messengers to enter any ship, vessel, house, warehouse, or cellar, to break any bulk whatever, and seize the goods, in default of paying the accustomed duties; and to apprehend all persons who shall publish scandalous speeches against his majesty and his government, or cause any disturbance.

Nor were these the only methods taken by the king for raising money on his subjects without the consent of parliament. He published a proclamation, "declaring “ declaring his majesty’s royal pleasure to confirm to his subjects their defective titles, estates, and possessions, by his commission lately granted and renewed for that purpose.” But notwithstanding the specious title of this proclamation, the people in general considered it only as an expedient to raise money without the consent of parliament; and this increased the alarming discontent already disseminated in every part of the nation. But this was trifling when compared with the spirit raised by another proclamation, published on the thirteenth of July, “ for the ease of the subjects in making their compositions for not receiving the order of knighthood according to law.” The reader may recollect, that in the former part of this history, many instances have been given of subjects vested with a certain degree of property being obliged to take upon them the order of knighthood. This property was very fluctuating in different reigns; and there was an obsolete, though unrepealed statute, called, “ Statutum de militibus,” passed in the reign of Edward II. which obliged all subjects possessed of fifteen pounds a year in land, to take upon them the order of knighthood, provided they were fit for that duty. The order was generally conferred at the coronation; and Charles, on account of the plague’s raging in London at the time when he received the crown, had dispensed with the attendance of such subjects as were qualified to be knights. But being now distressed for money, this dispensation was considered only as a matter of convenience. It was pretended, that the right of imposing the honour, which was attended with a large expence of fees, remained still with the crown; and that the king was at liberty to oblige all persons, properly qualified, either to be knighted, or pay composition money to certain commissioners appointed to receive it: the qualification was fixed at forty pounds a year. It is not easy to conceive a project more absurd, more unreasonable, and more unjust, than this. As the whole system of feudal services in person, during war, was now abolished, there was not the least pretence for reviving this tax, but a statute which had been made when these services were in full force. Add to this, that if fifteen pounds a year was, in the time of Edward II. a proper qualification, two hundred pounds a year at least ought to have been the qualification under Charles I. The king, while any hopes remained of obtaining supplies from his parliament, had desisted from collecting so invidious a tax; but it was now revived with so much vigour, that many were put to great expences in the exchequer and star-chamber for refusing to pay the composition money, which was required to be one third and a half of what the persons so compounding were found rated in the subsidy.

These proceedings intimidated so many persons, that the king received above one hundred thousand pounds composition money. Besides these, Charles granted oppressive patents, and monopolies, among which those on soap and starch are particularly complained of as very burdensome to the lower class of people. It is surprizing with what patience these impositions were borne by the people; they occasioned no disturbances in any part of the kingdom. It must, however, be observed, to the honour of the judges, that they opposed many of these oppressions; and to the honour of the king, that he dropped them on their representations. Perhaps more of them had been annihilated, had not Charles been persuaded by his flatterers, that they were not burthensome to the people; that he had an undoubted right to levy them; that his parliament had been the aggressors; that the house of commons and the people were distinct bodies; that though he was, perhaps, acting against the sense of the former, he was acting for the good of the latter; while the tides of commerce flowed in so fast, that their riches, as well as patience, were inexhaustible.

Charles was better pleased to govern by his prerogative alone, than in conjunction with his parliament; and left the hopes of relief or protection from the commons might encourage opposition, the king issued a proclamation, in which he declared, “ That whereas, for several ill ends, the calling again of a parliament is divulged; though his majesty has shewn, by frequent meeting with his people, his love to the use of parliaments: yet the late abuse having, for the present, driven him unwillingly out of that course; he will account it presumption in any one to prescribe to him any time for the calling that assembly.” This was generally considered as a declaration, that, during this reign, no more parliaments were intended to be summoned.

The eyes of the English were now turned towards their beloved object, the queen of Bohemia; and the king was very desirous of procuring some relief for his unfortunate sister; and her family. He joined his good offices with those of France; and mediated a peace between the kings of Poland and Sweden, in hopes of engaging the latter to undertake the protection of the distressed protestants in the empire. This was the famous Gustavus Adolphus, whose heroic genius, seconded by the wisest policy, rendered him, in a few years, the most distinguished monarch of the age. Charles, to encourage and assist him in his projected invasion of Germany, agreed to furnish him with six thousand men; but in order to maintain the appearance of neutrality, he made use of the marquis of Hamilton’s name, a nobleman nearly allied to the crown. Hamilton accordingly entered into an engagement with Gustavus; and inlisting these troops in England and Scotland, at the king’s expence, he landed them at the mouth of the Elbe. Gustavus was greatly pleased when he heard the English were landed, and promised to join them as soon as possible with the stipulated number of forces destined to conquer Silesia.

It is inconceivable what service the appearance of so fine a body of men did to the protestant cause. Their numbers were greatly exaggerated by their enemies through fear, and by their friends through design; and so great was the reputation of their valour, that the celebrated victory gained a few weeks after by the Swedish monarch over count Tilly at Leipsick, was, in a great measure, owing to their reputation. What remained of that hero’s life was one continued series of victories, for which he was much less beholden to fortune than to those personal endowments which he derived from nature, and from industry. The veteran troops of Ferdinand, commanded by the most celebrated generals of the age, were foiled in every encounter, and all Germany was over-run in an instant by the victorious Swede. But, by this extraordinary and unexpected success of his ally, Charles failed of the purpose for which he framed the alliance. Elated by prosperity, and no stranger to ambition, Gustavus began to form more extensive plans; and after freeing Germany from the yoke of Ferdinand, he intended to reduce it under subjection to his own. Full of these ideas, he refused to restore the Palatine to his principality, except on conditions that would have kept him in total dependence. And thus the negotiation was protracted till the battle of Lutzen, where the Swedish hero perished in the midst of a complete victory which he obtained over his enemies.

A. D. 1631. The incapacity of the lord treasurer Weston to execute that important post; had been, for some time, evident, and now became every day more glaring by the contrast between his abilities and those of Wentworth, who was now made president of the council of York. This court had been erected, after a rebellion in the north, by a patent from Henry VIII. without any authority of parliament; and this exercise of power, like many others, was indulged by that arbitrary monarch. The council of York had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but besides some innovations introduced by James, Charles thought proper, some time after Wentworth was made president, to extend its powers, and to give it a large large civil jurisdiction; and, in some measure, a discretionary power. Possibly the king's intention in this was nothing more than to free the inhabitants of the northern counties from the trouble, expence, and fatigue, of attending the courts at Westminster; but it soon appeared, that the inhabitants were, by this means, deprived of the protection of the ordinary law; and subjected to an arbitrary authority. And accordingly, some irregular proceedings in that court were now complained of, and tended to exasperate the people still more against the government. When Wentworth was gained over to the court party, Sir Dudley Digges was made master of the rolls, Noy attorney-general, and Littleton solicitor-general. All these were leading men in the house of commons. But it soon appeared, that the same abilities which are sufficient to perplex a court by their opposition, are not capable of effectually serving it by their compliance. Charles flattered himself, that by engaging those eminent leaders in his service, his government would meet with no more opposition, and that a calm tranquillity would be established in this kingdom during the remainder of his reign; but his own upright intentions to make the virtues of his ministers supply the laws of his country, fatally deceived him. Laud pursued the puritans with unremitting fury, and was fond of introducing new ceremonies into the church, and of carrying to the utmost height the power of the priesthood.

A.D. 1632. But if the furious conduct of this imperious churchman alarmed the moderate English, it struck the Scottish presbyterians with terror. They were, in general, men as violent for one extreme as Laud was for the other; and the dreadful shock, when both afterwards encountered, crushed the church, the monarchy, and the constitution. When Mary was driven from the throne of Scotland, the constitution of that kingdom became such a confused mixture of monarchical, aristocratical, democratical, and ecclesiastical powers, that it hardly deserved the name. The prudent government of James, while he continued in Scotland, and the unsuccessful attempts of the bigotted zealots to establish their favourite model of religion, gave the crown great advantages; so that about the year 1621, episcopacy was restored in Scotland. James had been wisely cautious in the promotion of his bishops; they were, in general, men of great moderation, and well acquainted with the genius of the people; for which reason they strongly opposed every attempt to bring the discipline and worship of the church of Scotland to a nearer conformity with that of England. The truth is, nothing in the principles of the first reformers, either in Scotland or foreign parts, was against a subordination of ecclesiastical government. All of them, indeed, concurred, that the popish bishops should be removed; but neither their plan of government, nor that of power, was so fixed, as to enable them to agree who should succeed them, though, in general, they suffered those who embraced the tenets of the reformation to retain both their revenues and appellations. But what at first was no more than a matter of convenience, soon became a point of principle. The estates of their great men were chiefly composed out of the spoils of the church; and the misfortune was, that the power of the crown was not sufficient to prevent these dilapidations. The acts of parliament in favour of the present possessors, gave them infinite advantage; but the circumstances under which these parliaments were held, rendered their authority liable to many just exceptions. While the king touched not this jarring string of ecclesiastical government, the parliament submitted to the prerogative in as full a manner as it had ever been exercised; but the landholders of Scotland could not, without the utmost concern, see the least increase of episcopal power, or any nearer conformity of their church with that of England, because they considered every step as an approximation towards the re-assumption of church-lands. During the whole reign of James, the Scottish bishops had been contented to act rather as presidents in their ecclesiastical meetings, than the fathers of the church, in the common acceptation of their character. When a see happened to be vacant, James always ordered the bishops to present him with the names of such men as they thought most proper to fill it, and he generally pitched upon the best qualified. Hence the bishops, in a manner nominating one another, lived in harmony among themselves, and acted so moderately, that the noblemen and great landholders in Scotland became pretty well reconciled both to their temper and their character. Happy would it have been for Charles, had he preserved the same moderate conduct. But Laud detested all moderation in church government, and Charles would listen to no advice but that of Laud. That imperious churchman represented, in the highest terms, the dignity of the episcopal character: he displayed an army of martyrs who had died in its defence: he called to his aid all the tyrants of the eastern empire who had favoured it: he poured forth a profusion of quotations, from what he called the fathers of the church; and, upon the whole, succeeded in convincing Charles, that the least defect of reverence, either to the government, the doctrine, or the worship of his church, struck at the most sacred rights of the crown. Nor was this all: Laud was of opinion, that the church of England, as left by James, was imperfect in its worship. To prove this, he produced some opinions, which, in the twilight of reformation, when several prelates wavered between the old and the new religion, had been maintained in the convocation, and sometimes in their writings. The authorities of the weakest of the fathers of the church were produced, to prove, that certain forms and ceremonies, things as indifferent in themselves as Laud's own dreams, had been formerly practised, and hence he inferred that they were essentials in religion.

But Charles, however warm and serious in these matters, was persuaded that these ceremonies had so near a resemblance to popery, that it would be imprudent to attempt their introduction all at once among a people accustomed to think in the opposite extreme. It was therefore determined previously to new-model the hierarchy, by introducing gradually a set of men of very different principles from those that now filled the sees of Scotland, in order to restore authority and discipline to the church, and purity and splendor to her worship. The vacant bishoprics were accordingly filled with such men as had neither the virtues nor abilities necessary for filling their stations, in a country where the minutest parts of their conduct were severely scrutinized by the piercing eye of puritanical enthusiasm.

Enemies to episcopal government, but without either power or pretence of opposing these promotions, the Scots made not the least opposition; but under the pretence of fasts and other religious exercises, they formed many secret resolutions for strengthening their party. They, however, still behaved with all the external marks of the most implicit submission to the established government; they went no farther than a protest in parliament against the measures they could not approve. Charles was so much imposed upon by these appearances of acquiescence, that he thought he should meet with nothing in that country to oppose his pleasure; and imagined that his presence, the splendid appearance of his court, and the weight of his authority, would bear down the small remains of opposition, and fix the authority of the crown on a basis that could not be shaken.

A.D. 1633. Full of these pleasing ideas, and desirous of being crowned in his ancient kingdom, he set out for Scotland, attended by the whole flower of the English nobility, who vied with each other in the splendor of their equipages. It was the fifteenth of June before Charles reached Edinburgh; and on the eighteenth, he was crowned in that city with the utmost utmost pomp and magnificence. On the twentieth the parliament met, and gave Charles every thing he desired. Two acts, indeed, met with some opposition. The first, besides establishing the king's prerogative, gave him power to prescribe what habits he pleased to the ecclesiastics of Scotland; and by the second, the alienations formerly made of tythes, and other estates of the clergy, were revoked.

Many of the English nobility that attended the king, and disliked Laud and his principles, soon perceived the Scots were far from approving the bill that gave Charles the power of regulating the habits of the clergy. The dreadful surplice was before their eyes; and they apprehended, with some reason, that under the sanction of this law, it would soon be introduced among them. This discovery prompted the English nobility to attempt another; namely, the real strength of the royal party in Scotland. The courtiers had been at great pains to have it believed, that the Scots, who had been ennobled and enriched by Charles and his father, were men of the greatest interest, as well as property, in their country. But the falshood of these suggestions was easily perceived by Charles's attendants: they saw the Scots in general treat with great contempt the royal favourites of their own nation; and were soon convinced, that the persons of the greatest weight and property there were in the country interest. This discovery tended to lessen the terror, conceived by the English on account of the king's power in Scotland; and laid the foundation of a correspondence between the principal persons of the two kingdoms, and which was not broken off till both found themselves engaged in all the horrors of a civil war.

Soon after the king's return from Scotland, Juxon was placed in the see of London; and also made lord high treasurer. He was a person of great integrity, mildness, humanity, and understanding; but all his virtues could not procure him the friendship of the puritans. He was a lover of hunting, and other sports of the field; a sufficient reason, however eminent in virtue, to procure him the hatred of those whose religion admitted not of the least relaxation. Charles was very desirous of introducing a cheerfulness into the national devotion. He renewed his father's edict for allowing sports and recreations on Sunday, after the service was over, to such as attended the public worship; and ordered his proclamation for that purpose to be publicly read by the clergy after divine service. Those who were puritanically affected refused obedience, and were punished by suspension or deprivation. This tended greatly to widen the breach between the church and the dissenters, and promote that ill humour and discontent already too predominant in the nation. The queen, though strictly virtuous, was immoderately fond of pleasure, particularly the entertainments of the stage; and her example was followed by the whole court, and the greatest men in the nation.

In the midst of this dissipation, William Prynne, a puritanical barrister of Lincoln's Inn, published an enormous quarto of a thousand pages, intitled, Historio-Mastyx. Its professed purpose was to decry stage-plays, comedies, interludes, music, dancing, and other diversions of that kind; but he also took occasion to declaim against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping, bonfires, and May-poles. The author tells us, in his preface, that he was excited to write against these enormities, by observing that plays sold better than the choicest sermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than even the Bible itself. He maintained, that most of the players were papists, and all of them desperately wicked; that the play-houses were Satan's chapels, the frequenters of them little better than devils incarnate, and every step in a dance was a step to hell; that the principal crime of Nero was that of frequenting and acting of plays; and that those who conspired his death were chiefly excited to it by their indignation at that enormity. This publication gave so much offence to the court, that Prynne was indicted before the star-chamber, where his behaviour was remarkably obstinate and petulant, which tended to increase the rigour of his sentence. He was condemned to pay a fine of five thousand pounds to the king; to be put from the bar, and rendered incapable of his profession; to be excluded from the society of Lincoln's Inn, and degraded in Oxford; to stand on the pillory in Westminster and Cheapside, to lose an ear at each place, and to suffer perpetual imprisonment.

The remarkable severity of this sentence raised the government many enemies, and greatly augmented the numbers of the puritan party. It was thought extremely hard that an invective against plays should merit a punishment proper only for the greatest criminals. But it must be remembered, that this satire against the diversions in vogue, though the pretended, was not the real crime for which Prynne was condemned. He had severely censured the practices of the new hierarchy, and the ceremonies introduced by Laud; a crime not to be forgiven by that imperious prelate.

A. D. 1634. The Dutch were at this time the great rivals in commerce to the English. A prince of Charles's principles was shocked at the independent pretensions of that haughty republic, which had been nursed by the blood, and fed by the bounty of England; nor had he received any adequate satisfaction for the massacre of Amboyna. James had made several attempts for hindering the Dutch from fishing on the coast of England, but all his prohibitions were in vain; the Dutch, after various pretences, at last asserted they had a right to fish upon the British coasts, founded on immemorial possession. The states of Holland, however, disavowed this plea of their commissioners; but, at the same time, declared, that however unjust, and however contrary to the rights of sovereignty in the crown of England, their practice of fishing on the British coasts might be, it was so absolutely necessary to the very existence of their state, that they dared not either give it up, or pay any acknowledgment for it, lest their people should rise in open rebellion against them. This was an argument not to be answered by reason, and Charles was determined to drive them by force from the British coasts.

Vigorous measures were therefore begun in several parts of the kingdom; but these could not be carried on without proportional revenues; and those of Charles were only barely sufficient for maintaining the splendor of the court, performing his engagements with foreign princes, and defraying the necessary expences of his government. Noy, the attorney-general, was therefore commanded to discover ways and means for fitting out a fleet sufficiently powerful to execute this purpose. Noy fell upon the expedient of ship-money; grounding it upon obsolete usages and records, which justified a tax upon the people for furnishing a certain number of ships for the defence of the seas; and writs were issued accordingly.

These writs were accompanied with instructions and directions from the lords of the council for the assessing and levying the ship-money. These instructions were directed to the sheriffs of the several counties; and by them it appears, that the ships assessed upon the counties of Middlesex and Hereford was to cost three thousand pounds; and that those who refused to pay their proportion, were to be distressed, and their goods sold for payment, without any respect of persons. The rest of these instructions contain the particular manner of levying the tax, and gave very arbitrary powers to the officers of the peace. The writ being served upon the lord mayor of London, he immediately summoned a common council, where it was agreed to present the following petition to the king.

"To the king's most excellent majesty,
The humble petition of your faithful subjects, the mayor, commonality, and citizens of your city of London, most humbly sheweth,

“That whereas your majesty, by writ bearing teste 20 Octobris last, commanded your petitioners, at their own charge, to provide seven ships of war, furnished with men, victuals, and all warlike provisions, to be at Portsmouth by the first of March next, and to continue from that time during the space of twenty-six weeks in your majesty's service, upon the defence of the seas, and other causes in the said writ contained.

“Your petitioners do, in all submissive humbleness, and with acknowledgements of your sacred majesty's favours unto your said city, inform your majesty, that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and acts of parliament, which they are ready humbly to produce, they are exempt, and are to be freed from that charge.

“And do most humbly pray,

“That your majesty would be graciously pleased, that the petitioners, with your princely grace and favour, may enjoy the said privileges and exemptions, and be freed from providing of the said ships and provisions.”

But notwithstanding this opposition of the capital, Charles proceeded with as much violence as if ship-money had always been an established tax, and as if he did not expect to meet with the least attempt to oppose his arbitrary proceedings. Noy, the attorney-general, dying about this time, left the affair unfinished; but the necessities of Charles increasing, he resolved, that ship-money should be extended to the inland as well as the maritime counties. But in order to this, it was necessary to employ proper persons, and to invent plausible pretences. Sir Robert Heath, lord chief justice, had, in many respects, been found untractable, and was accordingly removed from his office, and his place supplied by Sir John Finch, a lawyer of great eloquence, and a firm friend to the court; and Sir John Banks was made attorney-general. It was, probably, owing to the opinion of those lawyers, who were far inferior in abilities to Noy, that Charles made ship-money a general tax; but even this attempt did not alarm the nation so much as was expected. The merchants, who generally take the lead on these occasions, were too well acquainted with the advantages of commerce to risk them by an opposition which might have given the court a pretence for imposing heavier duties upon goods; and as the tax proposed fell more heavy on the landed than the trading interest of the kingdom, they did not, for some time, consider it as a stretch of arbitrary power. This acquiescence gave the court a perfect security. Charles endeavoured to fill the kingdom with apprehensions, that the Dutch and the French having entered into a new alliance, would certainly attempt to make themselves masters of the narrow seas; and a proclamation was accordingly published, commanding all English seamen and shipwrights, who were in foreign services, to return home immediately.

But this calm was deceitful. The nation still continued to have the highest opinion of those patriots, who had, in a manner, forced the king to pass the petition of right, and rather acquiesced in, than approved of the many breaches daily made in that famous act, especially with regard to ship-money. It was about this time that Edward Coke, the eminent lawyer and patriot, paid the debt of nature, in the eighty-third year of his age. But there were not wanting men who trod in his paths, and endeavoured to rouse the public from their lethargy, by shewing, that the continual encroachments of the prerogative would soon banish all law from the constitution. These alarming suggestions had their weight; they occasioned such disputes with regard to the payment of ship-money, that not more than two hundred and thirty-six thousand pounds were collected during the whole year.

This opposition, however, produced no change in the conduct of Laud: he continued to exercise his ecclesiastical power with the greatest severity. He now attempted to oblige all foreigners settled in England to conform to the established church; notwithstanding all the privileges and indulgences that had been granted them by former princes, and the infinite advantages the nation acquired by their settling in this country. The French and Dutch churches, being joined by all the puritans in England, made a vigorous opposition, and refused, on account of the exemptions and privileges they had received from the crown, to pay any deference to Laud's authority. The primate, however, prevailed so far, that though all foreigners of the first descent were suffered to continue their own method of worship, yet those of the second descent, that is, those who were born in England of foreign parents, were ordered by the king to repair to their own parish-churches, under the penalty of being proceeded against in the spiritual courts.

A.D. 1636. The good effects of the arbitrary tax of ship-money began now to appear. A fleet of sixty sail of large ships was fitted out, under the command of the earl of Northumberland; and a proclamation was issued, strictly forbidding all persons, not the natural born subjects of these kingdoms, from fishing on the British coast, without proper licences from the king, who farther declared, that he intended always to keep a strong squadron at sea, in order to prevent all such encroachments for the future, and to protect those ships of his friends and allies who should take out licences. The earl of Northumberland sailed in the month of May; and coming up with some of the Dutch ships, he sunk all that refused to leave the coasts, and discontinued their fishery. This spirited conduct struck a terror into all the maritime powers of Europe, even the haughty Richelieu himself, who had formed a design of rendering the Dutch the rivals of the English on the ocean, was obliged to abandon his project. The Dutch themselves applied to Charles in the most earnest manner; and at last consented to pay thirty thousand pounds for a licence to fish during the remainder of the year, when it was hoped a proper regulation would be made for fixing an annual tribute for the necessary licences.

But no advantages of commerce, reputation of safety, could prevail upon the people to pay the odious tax of ship-money with alacrity. The progress of the sciences had increased their thirst for knowledge; and the excellent writings and speeches on the constitution of England, during the late reign, were now purchased and read with the greatest avidity. But particularly the plain inconsistencies between the levying of that tax, and the petition of right, were evident to the most slender capacity; so that neither the sermons of divines, the opinions of lawyers, the threats of power, nor the arts of courtiers, had any effect: they firmly adhered to the dictates of common sense, and set all the sophistical arguments of the artful and the eloquent at defiance. Such, however, was their veneration for the government, and so high an opinion did they entertain of the natural equity of the king, that many paid the tax, though they were persuaded the law could not oblige them. They knew that the judges had taken great pains to recommend it from the bench, and doubted not but an attempt would soon be made to render it legal by a formal decision. Chambers, a merchant of London, absolutely refused to pay, and was sent to prison by Sir Edward Bromfield, lord mayor, one of the commissioners for levying ship-money. But Chambers was not to be intimidated by the hand of power: he brought his action against Bromfield for a trespass and false imprisonment. Sir Robert Berkeley, one of the judges of the court, would not, however, suffer Chambers's council to argue against the legality of ship-money, declaring openly in court, “That there was a rule of law, and a rule of government; and that many things which might not be done by the rule of law, might be done by the rule of government.”

This was the detestable doctrine, which, like an ignis

ignis-fatuus, led Charles to those dangerous precipices from whence he fell, to the ruin of himself, and the ruin of his people. A regular distribution was now drawn up of ships adapted to the several shires of England and Wales, with their tonnage, number of men, and monthly expence; together with the sums charged upon the respective corporate towns in each county. And Charles, that he might proceed with more safety, and remove the several objections that had been started against paying the tax, procured the opinion of the judges, "that when the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the nation in danger, the king might lawfully levy a tax for fitting out such a number of ships as shall be necessary for the defence of the nation; and that his majesty is the sole judge both of the danger, and when and how it is to be prevented."

Charles was now satisfied that he had not acted contrary to the laws, and determined to punish, with the utmost severity, all who should, for the future, dare to oppose his royal pleasure. It is amazing with what reluctance the people paid this tax, though they were no strangers to this prostitution and perversion of the laws of their country: their usual asylum, the courts of law, were shut against them, and there was no medium; they must either submit, or have recourse to violence, an expedient which no wise man would chuse. A chosen few, however, were still in reserve; men who dared to think with justice, and act with intrepidity; who, armed with the principles of civil and natural liberty, were determined to support the cause of their country, and not tamely submit to the arbitrary power of the crown. Strong reasonings, bold elocution, deep learning, and upright intentions, were not, however, sufficient to sustain this dreadful combat; a leader must be found, who, besides all these accomplishments, had intrepidity sufficient to stand forth in the cause of his country. Such a man was John Hambden, a gentleman possessed of a considerable estate, and descended from an ancient family in Buckinghamshire; which being an inland county, afforded him the better pretence for refusing to pay the tax of ship-money. His share did not amount to more than thirty shillings, yet he absolutely refused payment, and determined to venture a trial, the event of which would clearly point out to the whole kingdom, whether arbitrary power was to prevail over justice.

A. D. 1637. After many pleadings and traverses, the case was argued, during twelve days, in the exchequer-chamber, before all the judges of England; and the nation regarded, with the utmost anxiety, every circumstance of this celebrated trial. It will be easily conceived, from the opinion of the judges, that the great question in this cause was, Whether the kingdom was in such imminent danger, that the king had a right to assess his subjects, without waiting for the necessary forms of parliamentary proceedings? It was confessed on all hands, that both public and private dangers may be so great, that all property may cease, while the parties are providing for their own safety. But none of the crown lawyers pretended, that the danger of the kingdom was then so pressing, as to give the king a right to the property of the subject; and the small portion of Mr. Hambden's assessment was no argument for his paying it, unless they could prove it to be according to law. Whether the king was, or was not, the sole judge of the public necessity, was strongly debated, but greatly to the disadvantage of the court; since nothing could be more obvious than this, that when public danger becomes so pressing as to confound all property, the case will be notorious; and self-preservation becomes the common principle with both prince and people. It is true, the king may have reasons, unknown to his subjects, to fear the attempts of some public or private enemy, and make the necessary preparations to render the whole abortive; but nothing here occurred to convince any man of common understanding, that the danger, if indeed any was apprehended, might not have been prevented by regular parliamentary methods. With regard to the precedents brought by either side from former reigns, they were equally strong for both parties; and therefore were of no weight in deciding this great national cause. The truth is, we have too many melancholy instances in the English history of inquiry being established, not only by precedents, but by law; and that liberty often borrowed her gloom or lustre from the vices or virtues that filled the throne. The lawyers, however, that pleaded the cause of Hambden, or rather that of their country, had infinite advantage over their antagonists, by unanswerably proving the illegality of the tax from the positive and fundamental articles of the great charter, and other constitutional acts, which no practices, no precedents ought to affect or destroy. And whoever examines with attention the instances produced on both sides, will perceive, that the current of precedents runs always strongest for the people in the most virtuous periods of government: while those for the crown spring from the fear of arbitrary power, from slavish complaisance, from immediate danger, from gross ignorance, or from prevailing corruption.

But notwithstanding the force of the arguments used by Hambden's counsel, the event was what had been long foreseen. The prejudiced or prostituted judges, four of them excepted, gave sentence in favour of the crown. Hambden, however, obtained, by the trial, the end for which he had so generously sacrificed his safety, and his quiet: the people were roused from their lethargy, and became fully sensible of the danger to which their liberty was exposed. These national questions were canvassed in every company; and the more they were examined, the more evidently it appeared to many that liberty was totally subverted, and an unusual and arbitrary authority exercised over the kingdom. Slavish principles, it was said, concurred with illegal practices, ecclesiastical tyranny lent assistance to civil usurpations: iniquitous practices were supported by arbitrary punishments; and all the rights of the nation, transmitted through so many ages, secured by so many laws, and purchased by the blood of so many heroes and patriots, now lay prostrate at the feet of the monarch.

Laud, however, proceeded in the same imperious manner, and whoever refused to submit to his arbitrary measures, was sure to feel the weight of the hand of power. Among others, Williams, bishop of Lincoln, was singled out as a person who opposed the measures of the government, and was a friend to the puritanical party. He was accordingly indicted in the star chamber on very frivolous pretences, fined ten thousand pounds, suspended from his office, and committed to the tower during the king's pleasure. Williams, when deprived of his post of lord keeper, retired to his bishopric, joined the country party, and became one of the chief leaders of those who opposed the government. This was a crime not to be forgiven by Laud; though the primate himself had been indebted to Williams for his first promotion. But to see a bishop countenance puritans, a creature of the court become its obstinate enemy, and oppose with great firmness and vigour all the measures of government; these were circumstances that excited indignation, and engaged the ministers to pursue him with the utmost vengeance. Men of more generous, and more moderate principles, however, beheld these transactions in a very different point of light; they considered the prosecution of Williams as one of the most iniquitous measures pursued by the court during the time that the use of parliaments were suspended.

Burton a minister, and Bestie a physician, were also tried in the star-chamber, for writing seditious and schismatical libels; and condemned to suffer the same punishment as had been inflicted on Prynne. These writers had attacked, with great severity, and even intemperate zeal, the ceremonies, rites, and government of the church, crimes for which no pardon could be expected from the furious primate. Full of the enthusiastic principles they had endeavoured to support in their writings, they behaved with the greatest insolence before the court; and the very answers they gave in were so full of contumacy, and invective against the prelates, that no counsellor could be prevailed upon to undertake their defence. The sentence of the court was, however, greatly condemned, as very unworthy men of their profession; and the patience, or rather the alacrity, with which they suffered the punishments inflicted on them, still farther increased the indignation of the public.

But notwithstanding all these measures, there would have been no danger of the government's being overturned, if fanaticism, stronger than all human passions, had not armed the people against a monarch, who, in his own person, merited their esteem. We have already seen how desirous Charles was of establishing in Scotland the discipline and worship of the church of England. He was fond of episcopacy, and invested the bishops with an authority which he thought equally advantageous to religion and government. He loved church ceremonies, and wanted to have them received as essentials in divine service. Without reflecting how much all men are attached to their particular mode of worship, Charles, confident of his own power, now sent down canons for the government of the church of Scotland, and a new liturgy for regulating the manner of worship. The people were far from being disposed to receive them. The nobility from a jealousy of power, and the dissenting clergy from principles of equality, were enemies to the hierarchy; and their universal hatred of the church of Rome, made them abhor whatever had the least resemblance to the method of its worship. On the sixteenth of July, public intimations were given from the pulpits, that on the following Sunday the new liturgy would be introduced into the principal churches. Both the bishop and dean of Edinburgh attended to give the greater solemnity to this new form of worship. The latter, dressed in a surplice, began the liturgy. But he had not proceeded far in the service, before the people cried out, "A Pope! a Pope! stone him!" The bishop, however, mounted the pulpit, and attempted to appease the tumult. But his endeavours were in vain: they threw a bench at his head, and it was with the utmost difficulty that both him and the dean escaped with life. The contagion soon spread through the city. The magistrates suffered a thousand insults. The clergy declaimed with the utmost vehemence against innovations, and compared the populace to Balaam's ass, whose mouth the Lord had opened.

But notwithstanding these alarming tumults, no man of any consequence joined the people. The laws in Scotland were very severe against treason, and men of property were cautious of trusting their lives and fortunes to the furious declarations of an insubstantial multitude. Charles was fatally deceived by this appearance of restraint, and attributed their silence to an approbation of his measures. He had long been deluded by pretensions, and raised to the first posts in the ministry, those men who hated his person, his family, and his religion; they flattered him the more abjectly, that they might ruin him the more securely. The whole cabinet council, indeed, was composed of persons who wished well to the measures they seemed to oppose, and which they were sometimes obliged to punish. A deep foundation for public discontent being thus laid, nothing was wanting but a proper cement for the materials that were to compose the superstructure; and this required great skill to perform. The Scottish nobility and principal gentry were at that time very fond of travelling into foreign parts, where their countrymen served with great honour in the armies of different princes; and the knowledge they by this means acquired of men and things, gave them great advantages. It was easy for them to see, that without a common principle of action, the spirit of the people must soon evaporate, and their whole party lie prostrate at the footstool of power. What his principle ought to be required attentive consideration. Interest, indeed, was an obvious one in men of property, but this centered in a few, compared to the whole body of the nation, and was therefore destitute of force sufficient to animate the mass of the populace. A common principle was at last agreed upon, and this was religion. They knew with how much advantage the Holy League had been introduced in France, and had seen how easily the people are animated into rebellion, by the late tumult in the capital.

The crisis which was to decide the fate of the established religion in Scotland was now approaching. The spirit against the new liturgy daily increased among the common people, and the repeated commands of the court to introduce it proved at once ineffectual, and dangerous to the bishops. The magistrates of Edinburgh, where these disturbances chiefly prevailed, were, in secret, enemies to the liturgy, but, in public, they expressed the utmost abhorrence of the riotous proceedings of the populace, and frequently assembled in order, as they pretended, to concert measures for putting a stop to those alarming attempts of the multitude. They even promised to assist the king to the utmost of their power to appease the tumultuous populace, and introduce the new liturgy. But in the mean time a breach ensued between the bishops and ministers of Scotland; and soon after another between the bishops and the nobility of that kingdom. The counsel of the moderate bishops, who had always opposed the violent methods of introducing the liturgy, was disregarded by the new prelates promoted by Laud, and who were persuaded that the interest of their patron with the king was abundantly sufficient to support them. This induced them to disregard not only the advice of their more moderate brethren, but also that of the nobility, who took advantage of this neglect to withdraw their countenance entirely from the proceedings of the clergy.

Animated by the countenance of their ministers and the nobility, the people began to unite, and to encourage one another to oppose the religious innovations introduced into the kingdom. Petitions to the council were signed and presented by persons of the highest quality: the women, as is common in every religious disturbance, joined with great violence in the opposition: the puritan ministers declaimed vehemently against popery; and the pulpits resounded with the most violent invectives against anti-christ. In a word, fanaticism mingling with faction, and private interest with the spirit of liberty, soon produced the symptoms of the most dangerous insurrection and disorder in every part of the kingdom.

A. D. 1638. Charles was, however, determined to persevere. He seemed to despise the threats of the vulgar, and even the defection of the nobility. The primate of Scotland, a man of great temper, wisdom, and religion, always averse to the introduction of the new liturgy, represented to his majesty in faithful colours, the state of the nation. The earl of Traquair, lord treasurer, repaired to London, in order to lay the matter more fully before the king. But all their representations were in vain: Charles was inflexible. He had, however, nothing to oppose to so violent a combination of the whole nation but a proclamation, wherein he promised pardon for all past offences, and exhorted the people to be more obedient for the future, and to submit peaceably to the use of the liturgy. But this was so far from producing the desired effect, that it was immediately opposed by a public protestation, presented by the earl of Hume and lord Lindesey. This was the crisis of the opposition: the insurrection which had been gathering by degrees, now broke out at once; the standard of rebellion was displayed, and the sword of civil discord on the point of being sheathed in the bowels of that unhappy country. No disorder, however, attended these these dreadful appearances of war and devastation: on the contrary, a new order, or rather a new administration, immediately took place; a sufficient indication that this disturbance had been secretly fomented by persons in a station far exalted above the common people. Four tables, as they were called, were formed in Edinburgh: one consisted of nobility, another of gentry, a third of ministers, and a fourth of burgeses; and in the hands of these four tables the whole authority of the government was placed. One of their first, and, at the same time, the greatest act they performed, was that of the solemn league and covenant.

This celebrated compact consisted first of a renunciation of popery formerly signed by James in his youth, and composed of many invectives well adapted to inflame the minds of men against their fellow-creatures, whom heaven hath enjoined them to cherish and to love. Then followed a bond of union, by which the subscribers bound themselves to resist all religious innovations, and to defend each other against all opposition whatsoever: "and all this for the greater glory of God, and the greater honour and advantage of their king and country." It is astonishing with what eagerness all ranks of people flocked to sign this covenant, considered by them as the bulwark of the christian religion, which, according to their narrow way of thinking, was practised nowhere in its original purity but in Scotland.

Though a people cannot be too jealous of their liberties, and though no government has a right to attack, much less to destroy them; yet this jealousy ought to have its bounds in reason, in nature, and in duty. The first never warrants resistance, but under provocation; the second makes self-preservation to be her primary law; and the latter, by supporting subordination in government, preserves the peace, the happiness, and the tranquillity of human society. Could the Scots have produced any positive fundamental act of their constitution, unintelligible as it then was, which Charles had violated; had he governed their country with a rod of iron, or arbitrarily introduced a religion essentially different from that established by law, associations might have been defensible, though they are never eligible, till after the regular applications for redress have been made in vain. But how did this matter stand between Charles and the Scots? His father's and his own unsparing hand had enriched, embellished, and ennobled their country, beyond what they ought to have done, in justice to their other dominions. If any iniquity had been established there, it had not only been established, but acquiesced in, by the legislative power; the wholesomeness of their laws had not been corrupted into poison by judges, who held over their heads the rod of the king's displeasure. Their civil liberties had never been attacked by power; prerogative had not, as in England, mocked at their calamities; nor set at nought the provident wisdom of their ancestors. Episcopal government was the legal institution; nor could an attempt to introduce a disputable mode of worship, approved of by the government, both ecclesiastical and civil, warrant that worst part of popery, an association against the civil power, under pretence of religion.

But the voice of enthusiasm listens not to the declarations of reason. The Scottish preachers, determined to carry their point, though they involved the government of their country in confusion, recommended the strongest opposition to the people. Charles was alarmed, and offered to suspend the introduction of the liturgy, provided they would retract the covenant. Their answer was, that they would sooner renounce their baptism. He then relaxed in other matters, in order to preserve episcopal government, and permitted a general assembly to be summoned at Glasgow. By this unadvised measure the whole design was finished. The laity, whom the presbyterians admitted, and who formed the strongest part, began with impeaching the bishops, whom they charged indiscriminately with all sorts of crimes. They afterwards declared all acts with regard to ecclesiastical matters, made since the advancement of James to the crown of England, null and void. Thus the canons, the liturgy, the court of high commission, and even episcopacy itself, were abolished in Scotland at one stroke. A measure so audacious could be supported only by arms. They accordingly prepared openly for a civil war, seized all places of strength, fortified the town of Leith, and so remarkable was the desire of completing the work, that women of quality mixed with the populace, and carried on their shoulders the materials necessary for the erecting the fortifications. A prophetess, seconded by the harangues of a seditious preacher, wonderfully excited the general zeal and courage of the people: she said, that the covenant was registered in heaven; called the Saviour of mankind Jesus the Covenantor; and sacrificed all that was great and sacred in religion.

A. D. 1639. Charles, though he was fond of peace, and of Scotland, his native country, could not avoid raising troops to reduce his rebellious subjects to reason, and subdue the refractory spirit of the Scots. By his œconomy, he had saved two hundred thousand pounds; and the queen, by her influence with the catholics, engaged them to grant the king a considerable supply. The English fleet was very formidable, and well provided with every necessary. Five thousand land forces were embarked on board this squadron, the command of which was given to the marquis of Hamilton, who had orders to sail to the Frith of Forth, and cause a diversion in the forces of the rebels. An army of near twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse was levied, and commanded by the earl of Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but famous neither as a soldier nor a statesman. The earl of Essex, a nobleman extremely popular, and of great military abilities, was appointed lieutenant-general, and the earl of Holland general of the horse. On the twenty-ninth of May, the king himself joined the army, and summoned all the peers of England to attend him. Few disregarded the summons; so that the English army resembled rather the court of an eastern prince than a military expedition against an enemy.

The forces of the malecontents were little inferior in numbers to that of the English, but almost destitute of cavalry. The infantry consisted, indeed, of an undisciplined and ill-armed rabble, but animated with a religious fervour, which, in some measure, supplied the want of discipline, and rendered them very formidable. The declamations of the clergy had greatly assisted the officers in gaining recruits, by thundering out anathemas against all "who went not out to help the Lord against the mighty." But the leaders of the malecontents did not omit the more safe and prudent method of negotiation. They knew that a defeat must be fatal; and however their troops might be inspired with an enthusiastic fury, they were unable to stand the regular attacks of disciplined forces. They therefore immediately sent very submissive messages to the king, begged leave to be admitted to a treaty, in order to restore tranquillity to their native country, and sheathe the destructive sword of civil discord.

Several conferences were accordingly held; but so many difficulties occurred, that it was some time before even any preliminary articles could be established. At last, however, a pacification was agreed to, on the following terms:

"1. The forces of Scotland to be disbanded, and dissolved, within eight and forty hours after the publication of his majesty's declaration being agreed upon.

"2. His majesty's castles, forts, ammunition of all sorts, and royal honours, to be delivered after the said publication, so soon as his majesty can send to receive them.

"3. His majesty's ships to depart presently after the delivery of the castles, with the first fair wind, and in the mean time to cause no interruption either to trade or fishing.
Y y y the

"4. His majesty has been graciously pleased to cause to be restored all persons, goods and ships, detained and arrested since the first of November last.

"5. That there shall be no meetings, treatings, consultations, or convocations, of his majesty's subjects, but such as are warranted by act of parliament.

"6. The works on all fortifications to be abandoned, and the places themselves to be delivered up to his majesty.

"7. To restore to every one of his majesty's subjects their liberties, lands, houses, goods, and all other particulars whatsoever, taken or detained from them since the above term."

The Scottish deputies were at a loss how to appease their principals with regard to these articles, which fell far short of what their sanguine hopes had taught them to expect. Accordingly the earls of Cassils, and several other noblemen and heads of the malecontents, loudly exclaimed against a pacification, which was to disarm them, and leave them, in that condition, to the mercy of the court. No abolition of episcopacy, nor acknowledgment of the assembly at Glasgow, had been stipulated, as they had been made to believe; the restitution of ships taken since the first of November was but a poor consideration, in comparison of the common cause; and the drawing off the English fleet from the coast was of little importance, because the ships might return whenever his majesty pleased. Add to these considerations, that Charles, in one of the answers he had given to the deputies, had actually disowned the assembly at Glasgow; nor would he consent to any thing farther than to refer civil matters to a parliament, and ecclesiastical affairs to a general assembly; both of which he could call or dissolve at pleasure.

Nor was the peace more agreeable to the English; they exclaimed against it as loudly as the Scots; and there seemed very little hopes that it would be of any long continuance: the seeds of disaffection were sown in Scotland, and it was no easy task to prevent their growth.

While Charles was thus engaged in reducing his rebellious subjects to reason, an incident happened on the coast of England, which seemed to threaten alarming consequences. The firmness of Charles in steadily preserving his neutrality disconcerted Richelieu's plan for attacking the sea coast of Flanders; and the count d'Estrades was sent to conclude a new treaty of subsidy with the prince of Orange, in order to enable the Dutch to attack Antwerp, while the French were to besiege St. Omers. The success of those attempts are foreign to this history. It will be sufficient to observe, that these dispositions induced the court of Spain to fit out a strong squadron at Corunna, consisting of fifty ships, under the command of Don Antonio Doguendo, a celebrated sea officer. Twelve thousand foot were embarked on board this squadron, which was designed to join another fleet of Spanish ships at Dunkirk. Richelieu gave immediate notice of the sailing of this fleet to the prince of Orange, who soon after discovered, that the Spanish admiral was ordered not to fight, if he could possibly avoid it; but put himself under the protection of the English, and land his men upon the coast of Flanders. This armament, and the fear of its being joined by the English fleet, greatly alarmed both the French and Dutch; and extraordinary efforts were made to put their fleets to sea, in order, if possible, to render any attempt of the Spaniards abortive. A small squadron of the Dutch, then at sea, fell in with, and attacked the Spanish fleet, but with considerable loss to themselves. Soon after, the Spanish admiral came to an anchor near Dover, where he thought himself safe under the protection of the English. But the ambitious Richelieu had no regard to the rights of neutrality, when they opposed his views. He ordered d'Estrades to lay before the prince of Orange, "the glory that would attend his defeating the measures of two great monarchs, and of crowning all his noble exploits in war by a victory over the fleet of Spain under the protection of the English, and, perhaps, actually assisted by their ships." He added, "that such an action would infallibly lay Flanders open to the united forces of France and Holland." The prince of Orange, fond as he was of glory, especially when acquired against Spain, was startled at the thoughts of committing so gross an insult on the English flag; and asked d'Estrades, with some emotion, "Whether Richelieu was in earnest?" D'Estrades assuring him he was, the prince sent orders to Van Tromp to harass the enemy with a kind of flying squadron; but not to venture a general engagement, till he was joined by admiral Evertsen. As soon as this junction was performed, Tromp was ordered to send a message to the English admiral, acquainting him, that having received orders from his masters to attack their enemies wherever he found them, he requested that the English ships might leave the Spanish squadron, because he was commanded not to attack them, unless they assisted the enemy, and in that case his orders were to attack both without distinction. Charles was in the utmost perplexity how to behave on this alarming occasion. The haughty republicans were now at the height of their power: their fleet, when united, consisted of one hundred and fifty sail of ships of war, commanded by the best sea-officers in the world; they were highly exasperated against Charles for refusing them the liberty of fishing on the British coasts, and wished for an opportunity of revenging the affront, by destroying his fleet. At the same time, the public were persuaded, that the Spanish fleet was either intended to conquer England, or assist the king in subduing his rebellious subjects. Charles therefore knew that he could not trust to the fidelity of his seamen, even if the Dutch should violate their neutrality. At the same time, he knew that the Spanish fleet, which consisted of sixty-seven large ships, was in want both of cannon and ammunition; while the Dutch were liberally supplied with both from Calais, and other sea-port towns in France. It was some time before the whole Dutch fleet appeared, and made the proper dispositions for attacking the enemy. During this interval, the Spanish minister presented repeated memorials to Charles, for his protecting the Spanish fleet, which was now riding at anchor under the guns of the English castles near the South Foreland, while the Dutch remonstrated strongly against any English ship being employed in the Spanish service. Charles knew not how to behave in this critical conjuncture, but at last determined to observe a strict neutrality; and immediately issued orders, that no English ship should take any Spaniards on board, or pass from London below Gravesend without a licence. At the same time, he acquainted the Dutch ambassador, that he could not, without the highest dishonour, refuse the Spaniards that protection on his coasts they had a right to demand from the law of nations; and that he had sent orders to Sir John Pennington, who lay in the Downs with thirty-four sail of English men of war, to join that fleet which should be first attacked. This declaration lessened the ardour of the Dutch, and the Spanish admiral found means to send twelve large ships and four thousand men to Dunkirk. Charles was, however, fearful of the consequences; and sent the earl of Arundel to persuade the Spanish admiral to slip away the first fair wind, as he could not be answerable for the success of an engagement, if the Spaniards were attacked by the Dutch. Doguendo would gladly have followed this advice, but could not, on account of contrary winds: and the Dutch fleet being now completely reinforced, Van Tromp sent a letter to Pennington, demanding the benefit of his neutrality, under pretence of the Spaniards having violated their privilege of protection, by firing on the Dutch admiral's barge, barge, and killing one of his men. Tromp accordingly attacked the Spanish fleet with the utmost fury, forced them to cut their cables, drove twenty-three ships ashore, of which three were burnt, and two sunk. The Theresa, mounted with a hundred brass guns, was burnt, sixteen were taken, and sent to Flushing; with four thousand five hundred prisoners, and fourteen ships were lost near Boulogne; the Dunkirk squadron, under Doguendo, only escaping. The victory was complete on the side of the Dutch, though it was not obtained without some loss; ten of their ships perishing in the action.

Charles did not fail to represent this conduct of the Dutch, as an insult upon the British flag; and made use of it as an argument for enforcing the payment of ship-money, in order to be able to keep a sufficient fleet at sea to curb the insolence of those republicans. New writs were accordingly issued and sent to all the counties of England and Wales for collecting the tax. About this time the lord-keeper Coventry, who had the good fortune to hold the great seal many years, died in possession of that high office. Every day now increased the obstinacy of Charles, when it ought rather to have increased his caution. He determined to seize by violence that power which would enable him to govern the nation without controul, and to exercise it with prudence and equity, or, at least, with something which Laud and his own conscience termed equity. The great seal was given to Finch, a man fit for promoting every arbitrary purpose.

But though the odious tax of ship-money was raised with great severity, and other acts of despotic power were daily exercised, the people discovered no remarkable uneasiness at the neglect of parliaments and the unconstitutional measures of the government. Peace and plenty reigned in the kingdom, and the wars that raged in the other nations of Europe, made England the repository of riches from every part of the world. This greatly contributed to render the people almost passive in their present situation. They knew indeed their rights; they murmured at their being violated; they publicly proclaimed their grievances; they protested against illegal exactions: but this was nothing more than forming a rope of sand; a parliament was wanting to give their complaints strength and consistency. On the other hand, the situation of affairs seemed to be irremediable even by wisdom itself, and men of sense plainly perceived that if the affairs of Scotland did not oblige the king to call a parliament, he would continue to govern by his present arbitrary methods, till the use of those assemblies was forgotten.

The conduct of Charles in Scotland answered the most sanguine hopes of the warmest patriots; and the dispositions of the Scots were equally favourable for bringing matters to the crisis they desired. The nobility and persons of consequence in that kingdom, were persuaded they had sufficiently guarded against all resumptions of church revenues by exacting a promise from Charles to call a free parliament and an assembly of the clergy. They would willingly have waited the result of both; and that great point, the only one they dreaded, being gained, they would willingly have concurred and acquiesced in every dutiful measure towards the crown. But they found the people untractable: they refused to stop till episcopacy was totally abrogated, and the principles of civil liberty founded on a more solid basis than at present. This scheme might have answered the just expectation of men of property, and, at the same time, if not have fully satisfied the wishes, have calmed the spirit of the people; but the whole was defeated through a want of moderation on the part of government. The marquis of Hamilton laid before Charles the destructive consequences that must attend his not acting with sincerity, by leaving the approaching parliament and assembly in Scotland, at free liberty to gratify the people with regard to every thing that had been understood to have been granted by the late pacification. By this he meant the total abolition of the episcopal order both in church and state; but he perceived by the manner in which the king received his representations, that this would not be granted. He therefore resigned the office of high-commissioner in Scotland, and that invidious post was given to the earl of Traquair.

The moderate part of the Scottish nobility would have been contented with some restraints being laid on episcopal power in parliament; but so furious was the spirit of the people, that it was thought there was less danger in an entire abrogation of the order, than either in continuing it, or risking the consequences of popular fury. The marquis of Hamilton was entirely of this opinion, and fairly laid all his reasons before the king, who had continued some time at Berwick. Charles was astonished, and ordered fourteen of the chief covenanting lords to attend him, in order to consult the proper measures for settling the affairs of Scotland. The people were alarmed at this message, and openly declared, that it had been proposed by their own leaders in order to elude the force of the covenant. This so greatly intimidated the noblemen, that three only of the fourteen lords, could be prevailed upon to obey his majesty's orders. Montrose, Loudon, and Lothian, were the persons who despised the fury of the populace when it tended to prevent their obedience to the king. The business of Charles was serious and important: he was desirous of learning the whole design of the covenanters, and what they intended to demand in the approaching parliament and assembly. Montrose was one of those noblemen who thought the king had done enough to satisfy all his Scottish subjects, who had no dangerous or fanatical views. His two companions, particularly the earl of Loudon, were of the same opinion, but wished to have security for the performance; and this they thought could only be effected by some additional bulwarks to the liberties of their country, established in a full and free parliament. They therefore laid fairly before Charles what they expected from the next parliament.

In the first place the currency of the coin in that country was not very large; but its value might be raised or lowered by the crown in so arbitrary a manner, that all property, in a great measure, depended upon the king, and, at best, was very uncertain. The same power had formerly been exercised in England, and proved an intollerable grievance; but it carried with it its own remedy when commerce enlarged. For foreigners, without regarding the orders of the English government, always proportioned the price of their commodities to the intrinsic, not the nominal value of the coin. This conduct at last obliged the crown to lay aside those destructive practices, which could serve only some mercenary immediate ends, and the English mint had been, for some time, under excellent regulations. But Scotland had not the same remedy against this alarming oppression, because the commerce of that kingdom was more restrained, and money of much greater value than in England. It was therefore justly thought, that the subject ought to have some security against this grievance; and that the king should declare, "that the coin should not be meddled with, but by advice of parliament."

The next grievance enumerated by the Scots, was that of the command of their garrisons being given to strangers. Both James and Charles had, indeed, to use their own expressions, broken down the partition-wall between the two kingdoms; and the Scots had poured by multitudes into England, where they enjoyed a great number of offices both ecclesiastical and military. But the wisest men in both nations condemned this partiality in favour of the native country of their prince; and even the generality of the Scots themselves were dissatisfied with the encouragement many of their great men met with in England, which induced them to spend both their money and and estates in that country. The English, a great and powerful people, had far less to apprehend from the Scots than the Scots from them. The castles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton were already garrisoned by the English; and it was always easy for their navy to destroy the commerce of Scotland. The Scots therefore thought it reasonable, that no stranger should be intrusted with the government of any of their castles, unless by the advice of the states.

The heritable jurisdictions of Scotland were thought, even by the natives themselves, to be dangerous, because they created too great a dependence of the inferior people on particular families. They demanded, therefore, that no commission of justiciary or lieutenancy might be granted, but for a limited time.

Lastly, they excepted against the precedency of the lord treasurer and lord privy-seal, as not being warranted by any positive law. This exception was, probably, intended to prevent arbitrary promotions, which might eclipse the lustre of their ancient nobility, and create too powerful an influence of the crown in parliament.

Such were the demands intended by the Scots to be made in the ensuing parliament; and, possibly, if Charles had acted with sincerity, they had stopped there; but he could not be prevailed upon to consent to the abolition of episcopacy. The covenanters saw this, and were convinced that all concessions made by the king must be forced, and that he would retract them the first favourable opportunity. Their chiefs, therefore, thought they had no safety but in uniting more closely than ever, and openly opposing the power of the crown itself. Though their army had separated on the conclusion of the late treaty, they continued still in large bodies; the fortifications of Leith were continued; they issued commissions for purchasing large quantities of arms and ammunition abroad; and Lesley still kept up the character and title of general.

As soon as Traquair received his commission, he returned to Edinburgh, where both a parliament and an assembly were held. They immediately passed a bill for abolishing episcopacy, and another for removing the grievances already mentioned. The king was greatly exasperated at these precipitate proceedings, and Traquair received orders to prorogue both the parliament and assembly; but his authority was disregarded; they continued their session, and sent the bill, they had passed to Charles for the royal assent, pretending that no prorogation could take place without the consent of the estates of the kingdom in parliament.

The assembly proceeded with equal violence; and all that Charles could obtain was an explanation of the famous covenant, in the following terms: "We do swear not only our mutual concurrence and assistance for the cause of religion, and to the utmost of our power, with our means and lives, to stand to the defence of our dread sovereign, and his authority, in the preservation and defence of the said true religion, liberties, and laws of this kirk and kingdom: but also in every cause which may concern his majesty's honour, we shall (according to the laws of this kingdom, and the duties of good subjects) concur with our friends and followers, in quiet manner or in arms, as we shall be required of his majesty's council, or any having his authority." Charles was not contented with this explanation, though it was more than could have been expected from persons of their disposition. The assembly paid not due deference to the king's prepossessions, though they gave the utmost indulgence to their own. They voted episcopacy to be unlawful in the church of Scotland: the king was willing to allow it, contrary to the institutions of that church. They stigmatized the liturgy and canons as popish: he agreed simply to their being abolished. They denominated the high commission tyranny: he was willing to set it aside. Both were determined to persevere; and on this account recourse was again had to arms, and it was now supposed the sword alone must decide the dispute.

A. D. 1640. The king, on signing the late pacification, had disbanded his army, a very considerable sum of money was necessary for raising another, and the council was greatly perplexed to discover necessary ways and means for that purpose. The only constitutional method, by summoning a parliament, was thought a dangerous experiment; but the necessities of the crown were so pressing, that it was determined to summon that assembly. It was, however, thought, that there was a necessity for striking some bold, speedy, and effectual blow, to intimidate the rebels; and that the parliamentary supplies would be too slow and uncertain to answer the purpose. The earl of Strafford therefore proposed a subscription, and generously opened it with twenty thousand pounds. The young duke of Richmond followed his example, and subscribed the same sum. Their examples influenced many of the nobility and clergy; so that a large sum was soon subscribed, in order to enable the king to oppose his rebellious subjects.

On the thirteenth of April, the parliament met at Westminster; and were informed by the lord keeper Finch, that the king had been able to assemble and support his army, not by any revenue he possessed, but by means of a large debt, amounting to three hundred thousand pounds, which he had contracted, and for which he had given security upon the crown lands. He represented, that it was necessary to grant supplies for the urgent demands of his military armaments: that the season was far advanced, the time precious, and that none of it must be lost in deliberations: that though his coffers were empty, they had not been exhausted by unnecessary pomp, sumptuous buildings, or any other kind of magnificence: that whatever supplies had been levied from his subjects, had been employed for their advantage and preservation; and, like vapours arising out of the earth, and gathered into a cloud, had fallen in sweet and refreshing showers on the same fields from which they had, at first, been exhaled: that though the king desired such immediate assistance, as might, for the time, prevent a total disorder in the government, he was far from any intention of precluding them of their right to enquire into the state of the kingdom, and to offer him petitions for the relief of their grievances: that as much as was possible of this season should be allowed them for that purpose: that as he expected only such supplies at present as the current service absolutely required, it would be necessary to assemble them again next winter, when they should have full leisure to conclude whatever business had been left imperfect and unfinished: that the parliament of Ireland had twice put such trust in his good intentions, as to grant him, in the beginning of the session, a very large supply, and had always experienced good effects from the confidence reposed in him: and that in every circumstance his people should find his conduct suitable to a just, pious, and gracious king, and such as was calculated to promote an entire harmony between prince and parliament.

But these topics, however plausible, produced not the desired effect. The leaders of the discontented party began to foresee the consequences of the Scottish insurrection, and to hope that the time so long wished for was at hand, when royal authority must become wholly subordinate to popular assemblies; and when public liberty must acquire the full ascendant. A reasonable compliance with the measures of the court was now considered as slavish dependence; a regard for the king, servile flattery; a confidence in his promises, shameful prostitution. It was hoped, that by reducing the crown to necessities, the king would be pushed into violent measures, which could not fail of serving their purposes; and that by multiplying these necessities, his prerogative, undermined on all sides, must at last be overthrown, and rendered no longer dangerous to the privileges of the people.

Full

Full of these sentiments, every measure that had a tendency to preserve the government in its present form was zealously opposed by the popular leaders. Instead, therefore, of taking notice of the king's complaints against his Scottish subjects, or his applications for a supply, the house entered immediately upon grievances, and a speech made by Pym upon that subject was much more attended to than the harangue delivered by the lord keeper in the name of their sovereign.

During these transactions in England, the Scottish covenants were not idle; they proceeded in their preparations with a spirit far above their strength. The noblemen and gentry of that party stripped themselves of every luxury, and the ladies of their jewels and ornaments, in order to support the necessary expences of what they termed a holy war. Some of the fortifications of Edinburgh having fallen down, the covenanters not only refused to suffer them to be rebuilt, but openly opposed an order sent by the king for throwing in stores, provisions and soldiers, to reinforce that fortress. Men, women, and children, worked with amazing alacrity on the fortifications of Leith; and the covenanters having demanded that the castle of Edinburgh should be delivered into their hands, declared Ruthven, the governor, a traitor, for refusing to deliver up the fortrefs.

In the mean time, the scene of grievances was every day extended in the house of commons. But still there wanted a proper cement for the rougher and less valuable, though not less strong and useful materials, that were to compose the mighty fabric of opposition. Many gentlemen sat in the lower house, easy in their circumstances, unmolested in their properties, and therefore unsuspicious of any dangerous attempts against public liberty. They had seen Charles pursue methods which they knew to be illegal; but excepting a few instances, and these far removed from themselves, no rigorous severities had been inflicted; and the fortune of other nations, now desolated by war, taught them to enjoy their own tranquillity. They were not affected with apprehensions of public, while they continued to enjoy private liberty. But though insensible to realities, they were alarmed by appearances; the substance was less formidable than the shadow; the danger which they imagined attended religion, united them all in the preservation of liberty. They accordingly divided the public grievances into three classes, the infringement of parliamentary liberties, innovations in religion, and grievances against property, and the common liberties of the kingdom. Each of these branches was referred to a proper committee; and it was determined to apply themselves to remove the grievances of the nation, before they granted any supplies to his majesty.

This perverse behaviour of the commons excited the indignation of the king. He came to the house of peers; and having sent for the commons, he told them, "That the cause of his coming was to put them in mind of what had been delivered in his name by the lord keeper, at the opening of the session.

"That, contrary to his expectations, the house of commons had held consultations with regard to religion, property of goods, and liberty of parliament; had voted some things on each of these three heads, and therefore given them precedence to the matter of his supply: that his necessities were so pressing, as not to bear delay; but if the commons would trust him, whatever had been promised in his name by the lord keeper should be faithfully performed.

"That with regard to religion, his heart and conscience went together with that established in the church of England; and that he would issue strict orders to his archbishops and bishops, that no innovations might be made.

"That as to ship-money, he never made, nor intended to make any profit of it himself, but had levied it merely to preserve the dominion of the seas, which was so necessary, that without it the kingdom could not subsist; but left it wholly to them; whether they would raise the necessary supplies for the defence of the kingdom by ship-money, or any other means.

"That as for property of goods and liberty of parliament, he always desired his people should enjoy them, and considered no monarch so great as he who governed a rich and free people; but if they had not property of goods and liberty of persons, they could neither be opulent nor free.

"That if the house of commons refused to trust him, the affairs of government must be disordered; and the present opportunity of retrieving them irrecoverably lost: that though they trusted him in part at first, yet before the conclusion of the parliament, he must totally trust to them; and they, at last, wholly confide in him for the execution of every thing passed in the present assembly: that since there was nothing more than who should be first trusted, and that the trust in him was but a trust in part, he desired the lords to take into their serious consideration his and their own honour, the safety and welfare of the kingdom, and the great danger with which it was now threatened; and that they would endeavour, by their advice, to dispose the house of commons to give him the precedence to grievances."

This speech either convinced the house of lords; or they were gained over to the interest of the court, for they immediately voted that the supply ought to have the precedence of all other matters. But this determination of the peers produced not the desired effect; the commons voted it a breach of their privileges, the proposing and granting subsidies naturally belonging to their house. The commons were, however, fully sensible of the necessity of granting the king a present supply; and nothing but the violent counsels of Laud, and the other ministers, could have prevented its being granted. But instead of listening to any remonstrance from the commons concerning their grievances, Charles absolutely insisted, that the supply should have the preference of all other matters. Accordingly, on Monday the fourth of May, he sent the following message by Sir Henry Vane:

"Whereas on Saturday last, his majesty was pleased to send a message to this house, desiring you to give a present answer concerning his supply; to which, as yet, his majesty has had no other answer, than that, upon this day, you will again take the matter into farther consideration: his majesty; therefore, the better to facilitate your resolutions this day, has thought fit to let you know, that, of his grace and favour, he is pleased, upon your granting him twelve subsidies, to be presently passed, and to be paid in three years, with a proviso, that it shall not determine the session, his majesty will not only, for the present, forbear the levying any ship-money, but will give way to the utter abolishing of it, by any method you yourselves shall propose.

"And for your grievances, his majesty will, according to his royal promise, give you as much time as may be now and the next Michaelmas; and expects a present and positive answer, upon which he may rely; his affairs being in such a condition as can endure no longer delay."

The house immediately resolved itself into a committee; and a debate ensuing, the speaker, by a pathetic speech, turned the attention of the members on the business so strongly urged by his majesty; and the only question was, the proportion of supply that should be granted. Vane now stood up, and told them, that he had authority to say, the king would accept of nothing less than what had been mentioned in his message. This ill-timed speech threw the whole house into a flame, and they immediately adjourned till the next day.

Charles was highly exasperated, especially when Vane informed him that the commons intended to abolish ship-money, and all the other branches of the revenue. Determined to prevent any attempt of that kind, Charles came the next morning to the house of lords; and having sent for the commons, dissolved the parliament.

It is agreed by all historians that no parliament ever met with better dispositions than this, both with regard to king and people. Even Strafford himself had advised its being called, and Charles, in his last message, had proposed an expedient, which would have healed all the breaches between himself and his people. But the truth is, a state of public tranquillity must, to many, have become a state of private danger. The secret connections with the Scots had, by those who were enemies to tranquillity, in both houses, been carried into treason, and might have been punished by the approbation of the public. Hambden, Pym, and other members of parliament, had been deceived in their opinion of the temper of the nation, which was much more favourable for the king than they imagined. Had the house been brought to trust the king in one instance, he had probably gained their confidence for ever. The influence of the Scots, their erecting the banner of their covenant against the authority of a sovereign who appeared to have done so much to give them satisfaction; their repeated menaces of invading England, and their application to the French for assistance, were such flagrant characters of rebellion, that the parliament could not have failed to have voted a war against them to be just; the consequence of which would infallibly have involved all their abettors, whether secret or open, in inevitable ruin. Add to this, that Vane's antipathy to Strafford, whose talents he could not equal, undoubtedly influenced him on this occasion, to make that ill-timed speech in the house of commons.

Strafford had discovered amazing abilities for government. Nor did those consist in low intrigue, in forming cabals, or airy speculative notions of policy, but in the manly, practicable, executive part. He had for some time been made lord-deputy of Ireland, and in that capacity experienced the misfortune which attends every prince or minister, who attempts to humanize a people, that of being forced to have recourse to many severities, which, in a well regulated government are unjustifiable, though necessary in an unsettled state. Many great men in Ireland, though otherwise friends to the English administration, could not bear that impartial rigour which Strafford always exerted. But his great merit and success were sufficiently conspicuous through the cloud of malice and envy. The king drew upwards of an hundred pounds a year, clear revenue, from that kingdom. Its manufactures flourished, the people prospered, the parliament was pleased and dutiful, and the army regular and powerful. Strafford was persuaded that these particulars spoke so strongly in his favour, that the voice of calumny could not be heard; he imagined his public conduct stood in need of no private management, either to vindicate or recommend it; and as he was as great an economist for himself as for his master, he was above the necessity of mean, oppressive practices, to increase his own fortune. He had also the merit of advising Charles to call the last parliament, a fact not only publicly known, but mentioned with applause in both houses. Strafford's enemies were therefore in danger of seeing him at once both popular and powerful. It is therefore no wonder that both puritans and papists conspired his destruction; for he was no friend to either.

Charles had hardly dissolved the last parliament before he was convinced of his error. He perceived he had acted too precipitately, and was desirous, when it was too late, to retrieve it. He was now obliged to call upon his friends for their subscriptions; and such was their ardour, joined with that of the public, that in a few weeks no less than three hundred thousand pounds were brought into the exchequer. This sum, with the assistance he expected from Ireland both of men and money, enabled him to purchase arms, erect magazines, and levy forces in every part of England. The earl of Northumberland was appointed general, the earl of Strafford lieutenant-general, and lord Conway general of the horse. According to the original plan of this campaign, an army of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse was designed to act on the borders of Scotland, near Berwick; ten thousand foot and five hundred horse were to be landed from Ireland, and to take possession of the town of Aire, in Scotland; ten thousand foot and five hundred horse were to be sent into the north of that kingdom; and a fleet of ships, having a considerable number of soldiers on board, were to sail into the Frith of Forth. Had the sums of money raised by the king been sufficient to execute this scheme with vigour, Scotland must have trembled to its foundations.

The heads of the Scottish covenanters, ever since the breaking up of the last assembly, had been employed in modelling their church, their state, and their army, according to their own pleasure, without the least regard to the royal authority. They had blocked up the castle of Edinburgh, imprisoned several noblemen who were friends to the king; and a resolution was taken, in a meeting at Edinburgh, to march their army into England, under the command of Lesley, their former general. Their parliament met on the seventh of June, pursuant to their prorogation; and though an order was sent down from the king to prorogue it for a longer time, the king's message was disregarded, under pretence of its being defective in form. They endeavoured to excuse this proceeding in a letter to the secretary of state; but added the severest menaces, if the king did not order Ruthven to deliver up the castle of Edinburgh, and withdraw his ships from their coast, where they did infinite prejudice to their commerce. They considered the dissolution of the late parliament in England as a proof of their strength in that kingdom; and looked upon the queen, Laud, and Strafford, as the only enemies they had in the nation. This opinion, however unjust, gave them infinite spirits; and it is astonishing with what alacrity the gentry, the citizens, and even the lower ranks of people, threw their plate and money upon the tables of the covenant, taking only the bonds of their chiefs for their security.

The English convocation was still sitting; where Laud, from his zeal to support the royal authority, pushed on the most destructive measures. After granting the king a liberal benevolence, they framed seventeen new canons, and assumed to themselves the name of "the holy, sacred synod." One of those canons was calculated to prevent the increase of popery, but all the rest were strongly tinged with arbitrary doctrines.

It was, however, evident, notwithstanding the vast sums brought into the royal exchequer, that they were insufficient to answer the expences of an offensive war against Scotland; and recourse was accordingly had to a cabinet council; the fatal result of which was, to employ the whole force of the prerogative in raising money. All the various oppressive methods already enumerated were accordingly employed in the most execrable manner. The feudal grievances were revived, knight-money was exacted, the tenants who held of the king in capite were unreasonably taxed for men, horses and arms. Privy-seals were every where circulated for a loan; ship-money was rigorously exacted; cart and conduct-money for the soldiers was levied, under the empty promise, indeed, of re-payment. It was with great difficulty that Charles was dissuaded by the merchants from seizing all the bullion in the Tower, and to content himself with forty thousand pounds. Commissions were renewed for compounding with recusants; patents, and pardons of all kinds, were sold for money; and great quantities of India goods were purchased upon credit by the king's officers, and sold at vast discount for ready money. But what was of still worse consequence to the royal cause, an order was issued, commanding the city of London to furnish four thousand men with cart and conduct-money, for the expedition against Scotland. The lord mayor and aldermen were also summoned by the council to give in the names of such citizens as were best able to lend the king two hundred thousand pounds; and, upon refusal, Sir Nicholas Rainton, and the aldermen Soams, Atkins, and Geere, were sent to the Tower.

It was no wonder if these violent measures occasioned a universal disgust. The very soldiers caught the infection, and repaired so unwillingly to the several places of rendezvous in the north, that in some of the towns they mutinied, and murdered their commanders, and in others were guilty of the greatest disorders. Notwithstanding this, an army of twenty thousand men was raised, and continued their march to the northward. In the mean time, the earl of Northumberland was taken dangerously ill; and Strafford being very lately recovered from a very alarming distemper, was unable to join the army; so that the active part of the command fell upon lord Conway, who was by no means equal to the task.

The Scots army, though superior in numbers, was sooner ready than the king's, and advanced with great alacrity to the borders of England. To engage them to proceed, besides their general knowledge of the discontents of the kingdom, lord Saville had forged a letter, in the name of six noblemen, the most considerable in England, in which the Scots were invited to assist their neighbours in procuring a redress of their grievances. But notwithstanding these warlike preparations, the covenanters still made use of the most pacific and most submissive language; and entered England, as they pretended, with no other view than that of obtaining access to the king's presence, and laying their humble petition at his royal feet.

On their reaching Newburn upon Tyne, they were opposed by a detachment of four thousand five hundred men, under the command of lord Conway, who seemed determined to dispute with them the passage of the river. The Scots first intreated them, with great civility, not to stop them in their march to their gracious sovereign; but being refused, they attacked them with such fury, that they gained the passage, and drove the English from their intrenchments. A panic now seized the whole army, and the forces left to defend Newcastle fled, with the utmost precipitation, to Durham; and not yet thinking themselves safe, they left that city, and retreated into Yorkshire.

The Scottish army marched immediately to Newcastle; and though sufficiently elated with their victory, they preserved an exact discipline; well knowing, that if they acted otherwise, the people would become their enemies, join the king's army, and drive them back into their own country. They also dispatched messengers to the king, who was now arrived at York; and were particularly careful, after the advantage they had obtained, to redouble their expressions of loyalty, duty, and submission to his person; and even made apologies, full of sorrow and contrition, for their late victory.

Charles had summoned a great council of the English peers to meet at York, and was highly exasperated at the proceedings of his Scottish subjects, but he was in no condition to chastise their insolence. Served by officers whom he could not employ; surrounded by counsellors whom he dared not trust; his exchequer empty, his spirits low, his general detested, and his cause disliked by the public, to what side could he turn for advice? When he mentioned war and the chastisement of the rebels, he met with coldness in every look of his peers, more expressive of disapprobation than the most violent debate. Such fullness forced him to ask counsel of his faithful Strafford, who frankly confessed he was for fighting the rebels. This advice was, doubtless, the best that Charles could have pursued at that critical juncture. Notwithstanding the coldness of his peers, and the dislike many of them entertained against Strafford, the English would have gladly revenged upon the Scots the insult of invading their country. The refinements of the great had not reached their inferiors, and every man who could see or feel was touched with the indignity suffered by the English. The emptiness of the exchequer was no argument against fighting, because the two armies might have met in a few days, and the contest have been soon decided. Should the attempt have been unsuccessful, Charles, even after the loss of a battle, could not have been more distressed, or reduced to a more deplorable situation: on the contrary, it would, in all human probability, have so exasperated the English, that they would have forgot, at least for a time, their hatred of the court, and exerted all their efforts to take a dreadful revenge on their insulting enemy. The marquis of Hamilton retained still his pacific sentiments; he trembled for the danger of his native country, should the king be victorious; and for his majesty's situation, should the Scots succeed. He was therefore very earnest for concluding a treaty; and was so well seconded by the rest of the council, that Charles determined to embrace pacific measures.

During these transactions in the English council, the Scots actually gave themselves over for lost, and the heads of the army held several consultations on the most eligible measures to be pursued in this alarming crisis. It was even proposed to throw themselves entirely upon the king's mercy, and to give up the names of the English, who had not only encouraged, but invited them to invade their country. They were, however, diverted from this resolution, by intelligence received from their friends in the English camp; but it was not without difficulty they were persuaded to continue in their present situation, and to endeavour to conciliate the friendship of the Londoners by some signal act of kindness. They wrote a very affectionate letter from Newcastle to the mayor and aldermen of London, inviting them to continue the Newcastle trade, and assuring them of all imaginable security. This was a very prudent and successful measure, and induced the citizens to send a petition to his majesty for calling a parliament; and soon after, twelve noblemen presented a petition to the same purpose. As these petitions seemed to express the sense of the whole nation, Charles issued writs for the meeting of the parliament on the third of November.

On the twenty-fourth of September, Charles opened the great council of peers with a speech, in which he demanded their advice with regard to two particulars of the utmost importance. What answer was proper to be given to the rebels, and in what manner they were to be treated? And what methods must be used for raising money till a parliamentary supply could be obtained? After various debates, it was resolved to name commissioners for treating with the Scots; and fourteen noblemen, all of them professed friends to moderate measures, were named as commissioners. It was first proposed, as most consistent with the king's dignity, that the conferences should be held at York; but the Scots, not so much from any real apprehension they entertained of danger, as to increase the popular odium against Strafford, refused to meet in a place where he had any power, and Rippon was accordingly appointed for that purpose. With regard to the king's second question, it was proposed to borrow two hundred thousand pounds of the city of London: but this loan could not be obtained till the peers assembled at York joined in the request; so low was this unfortunate prince already fallen in the eyes of his own subjects!

The Scots, during the whole conference, behaved with that insolence, as sufficiently shewed they were not ignorant of their own importance. The earl of Rothes, though no commissioner, upbraided the lord Mandeville for not having more early appeared, pursuant to the promise he had made under his own hand. Mandeville, seemingly surprized at this, Rothes Roths put the forged letter, already mentioned, into his hand. The signatures were so exactly copied, that it would have been difficult for the lords, whose names were forged, to have denied the writing; but by their all concurring in the most solemn assurances that the whole was a forgery, the Scots were satisfied they had been imposed upon.

After proposing some insolent preliminaries, the Scots demanded forty thousand pounds a month for the subsistence of their army during the treaty. Charles would very gladly have consented to the disbanded of both armies, but could not prevail, and soon perceived that nothing advantageous to him could result from the conferences at Rippon. He therefore made another attempt to remove the meeting to York, where the great council of peers were still sitting; but was again disappointed through the obstinacy of the Scots. Some of the English noblemen, exasperated at their insolent behaviour, advised Charles to break up the conferences, and fortify himself in York, where he might be able to set his enemies at defiance, and, in all probability, render their expedition abortive. This was, indeed, the only expedient Charles could have taken to support his own authority; but the majority of the council were of a different opinion, and it was therefore rejected.

The conferences, though they still continued at Rippon, were carried on in so languid a manner, that the commissioners seemed to meet rather to consult measures than to settle differences. The Scots, who were very assiduous in caressing the English, solemnly protested, that they intended nothing more than to concur with the parliament in limiting the prerogative, in circumscribing the high claims of the clergy, in chastising the insolence of the papists, and in settling the constitution of the two kingdoms upon free and equitable principles. Nothing but the facility of the English commissioners could have given the Scots such great advantages on this occasion, though it must be admitted they behaved with great address. They had treated Wilmot, and other English officers taken prisoners at Newburn, with the utmost politeness; and after giving them the highest ideas of their courage, resolution, discipline, and good intentions, sent them back to the English camp. This behaviour was of the utmost consequence to their affairs, which were far from being in so promising a condition as the public imagined. The earl of Montrose had kept up a secret correspondence with the king; and one of his letters, either through accident or treachery, fell into the hands of Lesley, the Scottish general. This affair was at once both alarming and delicate. The Scots were particularly desirous of carrying on their designs with an air of candour, in conjunction with their English friends; but the reputation of Montrose, the most able officer they had, together with the sense of his services, which were far superior to those of any other nobleman, rendered him dear to the whole army. His correspondence with the king, after the many professions of loyalty the Scots had made for his majesty's person, could not, with any appearance of justice, be deemed treasonable; but, at the same time, the heads of the covenanters were convinced that he had abandoned their cause. Montrose soon perceived that his correspondence was discovered, by his being no longer admitted to the private consultations and councils of war held by the other general officers; but he took no pains either to conceal or excuse the fact; he openly avowed and justified it. Lesley was for bringing him to a court-martial, and putting him to death; but the other noblemen were more cautious: they knew that the soldiers loved Montrose, and the loss of their leader might make such a division in their army as might prove their ruin. Charles was reduced to so unfortunate a situation, that he could take no advantage even of this favourable incident. His own commissioners pressed him to remove the conferences from Rippon to London; and he was obliged to comply, though he was very sensible of the great advantages the Scots would reap by it. A cessation of arms was also agreed to, by which the Scots were assured of maintenance for their army, and the river Tees was made the boundary between both parties.

The utmost endeavours had been used throughout the nation in electing members for the ensuing parliament; and the persons returned were, perhaps, men of the greatest abilities that any age or country ever saw convened together at one time. Happy had it been for England, had the virtues of some of them been equal to their abilities! The circumstances of the juncture were as extraordinary as the characters of the members. The army of an enemy, whose riches were not sufficient to support it ten days beyond the bounds of their own country, lay in a friendly manner in the heart of England. So violent were the prepossessions of all ranks against the conduct of the ministry, that the sword of the enemy was thought less dreadful than the power of the court. The nobility also, whom the king had no means of retaining by offices and preferments suitable to their rank, had been seized with the general discontent, and unwarily threw themselves into the scale, which began already too much to preponderate. Sensible of some encroachments that had been made by royal authority, the people entertained no jealousy of the commons, whose enterprizes for the acquisition of power had always been covered with the appearance of public good, and had hitherto gone no farther than some disappointed efforts and endeavours. The progress of the Scots had reduced the crown to an entire dependence for supply; their union with the popular party in England brought the latter a great accession of authority; the near prospect of success roused all the latent murmurs and pretensions of the nation, which had hitherto been held in such violent constraint; and the torrent of general inclination and opinion ran so strong against the court, that the king was in no situation to refuse any reasonable pretensions of the popular leaders, either for restraining or limiting the powers of his prerogative.

The parliament met on the third of November, and the session was opened by a speech from the throne; but this was very little regarded; the grievances of the kingdom engaged the whole attention of the commons. Unfortunately, the English constitution, obscure, uncertain, and ill-settled in ignorant and troublesome times, opened a wide field for troubles and discord. The monarch concluded he was maintaining an inviolable right, in supporting an authority which the Tudors enjoyed in tranquillity. He thought it would be a disgrace to him to sacrifice any branch of the prerogative. The parliament, on the other hand, perceiving open attempts were made against the laws, exulted in the defence of civil liberty, of which they had acquired much clearer ideas, and the love of which was now the prevailing passion among the people. Encouraged by their first attempts, and animated by resistance, they forgot the respect and submission due to the sovereign, and determined to establish a new system of government, under the specious pretence of restoring the ancient constitution. Interest, ambition, cabals, and, above all, fanaticism, united their formidable influence with that patriotic zeal, which, while it was contending for liberty, threw the whole nation into a flame. At the very opening of the session, one of the members complained, that religion was stigmatized with the name of puritanism. "Whoever (said he) will conform his actions to divine and human laws, is a puritan. Whoever declines to do what others chuse he should do, is a puritan." The great object of these declarations was to render those odious who professed the catholic religion, by representing them as disaffected to the state.

Strafford was too much devoted to the interests of his master, too vigilant, and too firm in his administration, not to be universally hated by the popular leaders. Pym began the attack in a long speech, speech, divided into many heads, after his general manner; wherein he enumerated all the grievances under which the nation laboured; and inferred, from a complication of such oppressions, that a deliberate plan had been laid for changing entirely the form of government, and subverting the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom. "Could any thing (said he) increase our indignation against so enormous and criminal a project, it would be to find, that, during the reign of the best of princes, the constitution has been endangered by the worst of ministers, and that the virtues of the king have been seduced by wicked and pernicious counsels. We must enquire (continued he) from what fountain these waters of bitterness flow: and though, doubtless, many evil counsellors will be found to have contributed their endeavours, yet there is one who challenges the infamous pre-eminence, and who, by his courage, enterprise, and capacity, is intitled to the first place among the betrayers of his country; I mean the earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, and president of the council of York, who, in both places, and in all other provinces where he has been intrusted with authority, has raised ample monuments of tyranny, and will appear, from a survey of his actions, to be the chief promoter of every arbitrary counsel." He proceeded to enumerate some particulars of imperious actions and expressions; and then entered on a more personal attack of that minister, and endeavoured to expose his whole character and manners. At last the orator concluded, that it belonged to the house to provide a remedy proportioned to the disease, and to prevent further mischiefs, which might otherwise be justly apprehended from the influence he had acquired over the measures and counsels of their sovereign.

Several other speeches were made against the minister; and it was at last moved, that Strafford should be impeached of high-treason. This motion was received with universal applause; nor was there a single person who spoke in his favour. Lord Falkland alone, though known to be his enemy, modestly desired the house to consider, whether it would not be more conformable to the gravity of their proceedings, first to digest, by a committee, many of those particulars that had been mentioned, before they ventured to send an accusation against him to the lords. But this was over-ruled, the accusation was voted, and Pym chosen to carry up the impeachment, and was followed by the greater part of the commons. Strafford was in the house of peers when Pym brought up the impeachment. The lords seemed almost as much prejudiced against him as the commons, for all the favour he could obtain was to be heard in his place. He urged how unreasonable it was, upon a general charge, unsupported by evidence, to deprive him of liberty, which was in itself a punishment, before any crime had been proved against him; and how dangerous a precedent to the peerage itself they would establish, by admitting such precipitate measures. But these considerations, however just, had very little weight with the house: the earl was committed to the custody of the black rod, till the commons should exhibit a more particular charge against him.

Having been thus successful against a man who was considered as their capital enemy, they proceeded to consider more particularly the grievances of the nation, which they reduced under the heads, Privilege of parliament; prejudice of religion; liberty of the subject.

"Under the first head were reckoned, 1. Restraining the members of parliament from speaking. 2. Forbidding the speaker to put a question. 3. Imprisoning divers members for matters done in parliament. 4. Proceeding against them in inferior courts. 5. Enjoining their good behaviour, and continuing them in prison till death. 6. Abrupt dissolutions of parliament."

"Under the second head of religion were mentioned, 1. The suspension of the laws against persons professing the popish religion. 2. Their places of trust and honour in the commonwealth. 3. Their free resort to London, and to the court, to communicate their counsels and designs. 4. Their being permitted to have a nuncio here, to execute the orders of the pope.

"Under innovations in religion were enumerated, 1. Maintenance of popish tenets in books, sermons, and disputes. 2. Practices of popish ceremonies countenanced and enjoined, as altars, crucifixes, and images. 3. Discouragements of protestants, by rigid prosecutions of the scrupulous, for things indifferent; no vice being considered so great as non-conformity. 4. Encroachment of ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

"Under the third head were classed the grievances.

1. By tonnage and poundage unduly taken. 2. Composition for knighthood. 3. The unparalleled grievance of ship-money. 4. Enlargement of the forests beyond due bounds. 5. Selling of nuisances, by compounding for them. 6. The commission for building. 7. The commission for depopulation. 8. Unlawful military charges, by warrant of the king, letters of the council, and orders of the lieutenants of the counties, and their deputies. 9. Extra-judicial declarations of judges, without hearing counsel or arguments. 10. Monopolists countenanced by the council-table, and justices of the peace required to assist them. 11. The star-chamber court. 12. The king's edicts and proclamations lately used for maintaining monopolies. 13. The ambitious and corrupt clergy preaching divine authority, and absolute power in kings to act as they please. 14. The intermission of parliaments."

These heads of inquiry sufficiently indicated, that a total alteration in government was intended, and this intention was supported by speeches enforced by all the learning and eloquence of that age. Almost every county in England had its peculiar grievances, which were presented to the house by members, many of whom were afterwards the firmest friends to the king, and suffered deeply in his cause. They who were the warmest asserters of the king's legal prerogative, inveighed with the greatest vehemence against its abuse. Among others, Mr. Capel, who afterwards fell a victim to his loyalty, expatiated in the warmest manner on the grievances of the county of Hertford, which he represented in parliament. Hyde, afterwards lord Clarendon, and Falkland, were also in this number: but, in their ultimate views and intentions, they differed widely from the majority, though they were equally desirous of removing the real grievances of the nation, and of placing proper bounds to the royal prerogative.

The house of lords were not backward in encouraging this spirit of the commons. Lord Digby, who afterwards suffered so deeply in the cause of royalty, was among the first who inveighed against the oppressions of the court. But other matters, for some time, engaged the attention of the parliament. Sir Thomas Rowe having made a report concerning the treaty with the Scots, it appeared, that a contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day had, for a very considerable time, been levied on the inhabitants of the north, and that they had petitioned his majesty for relief in the most affecting terms. From these complaints, it was suspected, that they were unable to support this heavy contribution; and it was known that the Scots had declared, they should consider the cessation of payment as an infraction of the treaty; and that they should be then at liberty to pass the river Tees, and advance farther into the heart of England.

From this short state of the case, the lord-keeper, in a conference between the two houses, endeavoured to prove, that as the lords commissioners were the first that advised the cessation of arms, the miseries of the country, in consequence of that measure, could not be attributed to the king. This being premised, he admitted the necessity of providing for the Scottish army, but, at the same time, enlarged on the absurdity of suffering that of the king to starve, or be disbanded; disbanded; because Yorkshire, and several of the finest counties in England, would, by that means, be wholly exposed to the ravages of an inveterate and rapacious enemy. The commons, however, were of a very different opinion: they had already shewn some disgust at an expression in his majesty's speech at the opening of the session, in which he had called them traitors, and had called one of their own members to the bar of the house for making use of the same expression. They were even so far from censuring the lords commissioners at Rippon, that it was resolved upon the question, "That this house doth approve of the persons of those lords that were commissioners in the late treaty of Rippon, to be commissioners now, to treat with the Scotch commissioners; with this declaration, that no conclusion of their's shall bind the commons without their consent in parliament." The house could not, however, with any appearance of decency, refuse to provide for the royal, as well as for the rebel army. But it was sufficiently apparent, that the former was not an object of their favour. They appointed a committee to consider the state of the king's army, and what commanders, or other inferior officers, were papists; to consider of the state of the northern counties; and how the money, after being raised, may, with convenience and dispatch, be sent into the north.

The Scottish commissioners were by this time arrived in London, where they were received as the guardian angels of the rights and liberties of the people. They were attended by Henderfon, and other fanatical preachers; and the church of St. Atholin was appointed for the place of their devotions. It was amazing to see the propensity of the public for this new religion: multitudes of all ranks crowded into the church. They who were so happy as to find access early in the morning, kept their places the whole day: those who were excluded, elung to the doors and windows, in hopes of catching at least some broken murmurs of the holy rhetoric. All the eloquence of parliament, now well refined from pedantry, animated with the spirit of liberty, and employed in the most important interests of the nation, was attended to with much less avidity than these lectures, delivered with ridiculous cant, and a provincial accent, full of barbarism and ignorance.

The commons were now very assiduous in providing for the subsistence of the two armies; and because subsidies would be levied too slowly for so urgent an occasion, money was borrowed from the city on the security of some particular members. Two subsidies, a very small sum, not more than a hundred thousand pounds, were at first voted; the intention of this supply being only to indemnify the members, who by their private had supported public credit.

It soon appeared, that the business of the Scotch commissioners was rather to consult measures with their friends, than to finish the treaty. It was sufficiently evident, that the Scots had proceeded much farther than they originally intended, which was nothing more than that of forming and securing the constitution of their country; but this was rather owing to the arts of the malecontents in England than their own. The great aim of the popular leaders was to protract the treaty, though that could not be effected but at the enormous expence of maintaining at least forty thousand men, in a country already exhausted. The commons, indeed, made no secret of retaining these invaders of their country till all their enemies were suppressed, and all their purposes effected. "We cannot spare the Scots," said Strode plainly in the house "the sons of Zeruiah are still too strong for us." The earl of Rothes, a man of parts, and of great credit with his countrymen, though he had never joined their popular clamour, was very sensible of this design, and exerted all his interest to render it abortive. But he soon perceived that his labours were in vain; the Scottish commissioners being given to understand, that if they did not assist their English friends, their country would be abandoned to the mercy of the king.

Many of the leaders of the commons were, however, alarmed, and thought it highly improper that the spirit of opposition should lose any of its vigour, till the parliament had testified, in the strongest terms, its disapprobation of the late arbitrary measures, and inflicted some signal infamy or punishment upon their principal authors. A committee was accordingly appointed to consider of the state of the nation, and the members were to be directed in their proceedings, by the petitions against grievances, sent up by different counties. Religion was one of the principal ingredients in the composition of the remonstrance intended to be drawn up by this committee, and it was resolved to accuse Windebank of high-treason, for the many services and favours, which he, as secretary of state, had conferred on priests and papists. Windebank saw their intention; but affected such a firmness of resolution, that the commons imagined he would make a stand against all the power of their indignation; but being interrupted by a message from the lords, when they were on the point of declaring him a traitor to his country, he took the opportunity of leaving the house, and made his escape into France.

Several violent speeches were made against the usurpations of the clergy; and it was resolved to purge the army of papists, to present the names of recusants, to examine the high commission courts of Canterbury and York, and to enquire into the proceedings of the late convocation, or as the clergy themselves had termed it, the holy and sacred synod. These resolutions were hardly finished when alderman Pennington presented to the house, a petition subscribed by above fifteen hundred persons in the city of London, against the hierarchy and government of the church of England, by archbishops, bishops, deans, and arch-deacons, praying the house, "that the said government, with all its dependences, roots, and branches, might be abolished; and all laws in their behalf made null and void." A schedule was annexed to this petition, consisting of twenty-eight articles, in which were contained all the commonplace objections to the episcopal hierarchy, whether founded on the pretended unlawfulness of the order itself, or the abuses and vices of those who composed it.

Thus was launched the dreadful bolt which had been long preparing against the church, and which, at last, together with the church, destroyed the constitution of England. The length of the schedule annexed to this petition, required time for deliberation, and it was ordered that members only should have a copy of either. Four days after the petition was delivered, the house came to the following resolutions:

"That the clergy of England, convened in any convocation, or synod, or otherwise, have no power to make any constitutions, canons, or acts whatsoever, in matter of doctrine, discipline, or otherwise, to bind the clergy, or laity of this land, without the common consent of parliament.

"That the several constitutions and canons ecclesiastical, passed with the consent and approbation of his majesty, in the last synod, do not bind either the clergy or laity of this kingdom.

"That these canons and constitutions ecclesiastical established with the king's consent in the last synod, contain in them many matters, contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of this realm, to the rights of parliaments, and to the property and liberty of the subject; and also matters tending to sedition and dangerous consequence.

"That the several grants of the benevolence, or contribution, granted by his majesty by the last synod, are contrary to the laws, and ought not to bind the clergy."

These resolutions were followed by several bitter speeches against Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, particularly particularly one by Mr. Grimstone. He accused the primate of having introduced the earl of Strafford to his majesty, and of procuring the post of secretary for Windebank, whom he termed "the very broker and pander to the whore of Babylon." He upbraided him for having advanced Montague, Manwaring, and other prelates, suspected of popery; and lastly, he accused him of being the main spring and promoter of all the detestable projects and monopolies, that had proved so oppressive to the subject. Several others spoke nearly to the same purpose, and it was at last voted, that Mr. Hollis should go up to the lords with a message, "To accuse William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, of high-treason, in the name of the commons of England, and to desire he might be immediately sequestered from parliament, and committed; and that the house, in a convenient time, will offer particular accusations against him."

The demand of the commons was immediately complied with, and the primate was ordered to withdraw, but he requested to be heard a few words in his place. This being complied with, he began with protesting his innocence, and added, that he was persuaded, there was not a member in the house of commons, who believed, in his heart, that he was a traitor. He was called to order for that expression by the earl of Essex, who observed, that the primate had severely reflected on the house of commons, by affirming they had brought him in guilty of a charge, which they themselves did not believe. Laud was desirous of retracting this indiscretion, which had escaped him without mature deliberation; but the peers were so little favourable to his cause, that they refused to grant him even this small indulgence. He was immediately sequestered from parliament, and committed to custody.

The fall of Laud was accompanied with the release of bishop Williams from the Tower. The maxims and conduct of that able prelate were remembered to his honour by all parties. His sufferings had rendered him popular, and every wise and moderate Englishman, thought him the only person, whose counsels and prudence could give such weight to the episcopal character, as would enable it to stem the torrent by which it was now opposed. During all his sufferings he had behaved towards his country like a genuine patriot, and towards the church as a worthy prelate. Those who formed the opposition to the king were persuaded, that the many provocations he had received could not fail of having rendered him an implacable enemy to the court; but the friends of Charles knew too much of his private character to believe, that his resentments would ever influence him to join with those who aimed at the destruction both of church and state. He had made several dutiful applications to the king to be restored to his seat in parliament, but all his attempts were defeated by the violent opposition of Laud, notwithstanding the queen herself had interposed in his favour. This was now publicly known, and a motion was made and carried in the house of peers, for restoring Williams to his seat in parliament. The king readily gave his consent, and he was, with great pomp, introduced into the house of lords, where he omitted nothing consistent with his duty, as a churchman, to conciliate the friendship and good opinion of the house of commons.

The cause of ship-money now came to be heard before the commons, and several animated speeches were made on the occasion, and it was resolved, "that the charge imposed upon the subjects of this kingdom, for the providing and furnishing of ships, and the assessments for raising of money for that purpose, commonly called ship-money, are against the laws of the realm, the subjects right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in parliament, and to the petition of right."

upon ship-money, published in the star-chamber; all writs issued for levying it, and the judgment in the exchequer against Mr. Hambden. It should be remembered, that all these resolutions passed in the house without one dissenting voice, though many gentlemen, who afterwards ruined their families and lost their lives in defence of his majesty, were members. A convincing proof in favour of those measures that rendered the calling of a parliament necessary, and first kindled the flames of popular discord in the kingdom.

But the great question is, whether those measures were not carried too far, and whether they ought not to have left sufficient power in the crown after all the grievances were removed, and the constitution settled upon a solid foundation. That the nation had been provoked is past all doubt. But was there a necessity that the knife of justice, intended to prune away the luxuriances of government, should wound its essence and its root? Should the medicine, intended to cleanse and heal the wound, be converted into a poison that cankers and destroys? Perhaps from a fair and candid collection of facts, the reader will be best enabled to form a proper judgment, whether the house of commons, through the ignorance of many, the inadvertence of some, and the malice of a few, did not afterwards pass that ancient boundary, beyond which the constitution of England cannot subsist. Their first and greatest grievance was the earl of Strafford: he had deserted the country party, and consequently irritated the leaders in the opposition. His great abilities rendered him dangerous; his lofty carriage unpopular, and his severity, odious. But still those particulars admitted of degrees of alleviation. His abilities could not have injured a people, protected by a parliament always on its guard; and he had effected one of the greatest services that could possibly have been done to the crown and people of England, by rendering Ireland, instead of being dangerous, to be dependent upon England; from being a gulph of expence, to be a province of profit. It ought therefore to have been the care of parliament to have preserved those advantages which Strafford had procured; to have improved those revenues he had raised; and to have prevented those dangers he had introduced. His practices, as lord-president of the council of York, amounted, at most, to nothing more than misdemeanors; and with regard to Ireland, his government, however severe, transgressed not the bounds of justice; and that severity was perhaps absolutely necessary among a wild and ferocious people. The arbitrary maxims he had supported at the council-board, were justly odious in a free nation; but they had been crushed in the bud, and were never so sufficiently proved as to deserve a parliamentary condemnation. The people were now sufficiently convinced, that the greatest minister must be levelled with the meanest subject, when he became obnoxious to the kingdom. The impeachment and imprisonment of Strafford had more effectually plucked the sting from prerogative, than all the oppositions, the sufferings, the remonstrances, and resolutions of parliaments had ever been able to effect; and there seems to have been no necessity of having recourse to injustice to shed the blood of a person who could no longer direct the councils of his sovereign.

The next public grievance was archbishop Laud, a man great indeed by his station in the church and his favour with his sovereign, but, stripped of those accidents, despicable in his qualities, either to hurt or to serve the public. His actions against the commonwealth had proceeded from an enthusiastic zeal, bordering upon frenzy, and an insatiable desire of extending ecclesiastical dominion. His censure therefore could not be too severe for his demerits, yet in his person he was too inconsiderable to be the cause of straining justice, or even hazarding the consequences of shocking the minds of many well-meaning people, who highly revered his character, by bringing his grey hairs to the grave, in a manner till then unprecedented, and which it is to be hoped will never be revived.

The book of canons was a third national grievance; and certainly they well deserved the attention of parliament, because they served as a scourge to freemen. They were passed in the late convocation; and though some of them were excellent, and others indifferent, yet the whole was poisoned by the first canon, which established the indefeasibility of kingly authority, and the unlawfulness of resisting it on any pretence whatever. Several of the other canons tend to establish a detested and unnatural power in the church, and to exclude the lawful exercise of reason in religion. But the malignity of those canons ought to have been imputed to the whole body of the clergy assembled in convocation, many of whom were unimpeached in their lives and principles, and no power of the crown prevented the parliament from censuring them for their behaviour in convocation. Neither Charles nor his ministers ought therefore to have been charged with this crime, nor ought the sword of public justice to have fallen on the head of any single person on this account.

The breach of parliamentary privileges, and of personal liberty, is the next grievance loudly complained of by the commons. But these, however necessary to be supported, and however necessary to be redressed, ought impartially to be considered as the acts of those who had already suffered, or were now suffering for them. All that the commons could do, was to prosecute the authors of such pernicious measures, and to prevent their being repeated for the future. They had full liberty from the king to do this; and if they failed in the attempt, the fault could not be imputed to him. The same may be said of ship-money, the advisers of which, and the judges who had given their opinions for it, being now under prosecution by the house, were all the sacrifices Charles could make to atone for the abuses he had authorized.

With regard to the other grievances, they were nothing more than such as may happen under any well-regulated government. Parliaments had been intermitted, and to that intermission the unpunished abuses of power were chiefly, if not entirely, owing. But a bill was now preparing of a new and unusual, though salutary, nature, to remove that complaint for the future. The English constitution knew no other law than the will of the sovereign, with regard to the sittings of parliaments. Those who wished well to both the king and his people, thought that the spirit of the constitution ought, in this respect, to supply the letter. While the feudal system continued in vigour, the subject seldom complained of the intermission of parliaments, because by their assistance only the king could demand other aids and subsidies. Under the government of the Tudors, till towards the end of the reign of queen Elizabeth, parliaments were considered as the scourges of the people; both the wicked and the virtuous were alike sacrificed to their fear, their venality, or their bigotry. But when the people began to think for themselves; when they discussed the great points between the crown and the subject, they perceived many examples of parliaments forcing kings to give up ministers to justice, and to redress the grievances of the public, in consideration of the aids and subsidies they received from the people. The condition of the subject was desperate, if these aids could be commanded by the crown without the consent of parliament; because then there could be no necessity for calling one. This had, in fact, been the case under Charles; nor did he ever call a parliament, but when his revenue, however illegal, was insufficient to defray the expences of his government. The parliament now sitting had, by their vigorous proceedings, gone far towards stopping the sources of iniquitous exactions, which, in fact, must have put Charles under a tacit necessity of frequently calling parliaments.

But these precautions were not thought sufficient; it was feared that some rapacious minister might prevail upon the king to dissolve the parliament, crush their proceedings in the bud, and attempt to reduce England to a despotic government. To prevent so dreadful a calamity, no measure was thought so proper as some positive, constitutional act, which might render the calling of parliaments less precarious, and more frequent. Many specious arguments, besides those drawn from the circumstances of this important crisis, were urged, with great force and eloquence. Parliaments, in former times, regularly met once a year, and it could not be any unreasonable concession in the crown to bring the constitution so far back to its first principles, as to pass an act for triennial parliaments. This bill was strongly supported by lord Digby, son to the earl of Bristol. He appealed for the truth of what he urged to the violations of the petition of right, which had happened through the discontinuance of parliaments. "Let his majesty (said he) hear our complaints ever so compassionately; let him purge away our grievances ever so efficaciously; let him punish and expel ill ministers ever so exemplarily; let him make choice of good ones ever so exactly: if there be not a way settled to preserve and keep them good, the mischiefs will all grow again like Sampson's locks, and pull down the house upon our heads."

"The people of England (continued he) cannot open their ears, their hearts, their mouths, or their purses, to his majesty, but in parliament. We can neither hear him, acknowledge, nor give, but there."

"This bill, Mr. Speaker, is the sole key that can open the way to those reciprocal endearments, which must make and perpetuate the happiness of the king and kingdom."

"Let no man object any derogation from the king's prerogative by it: we only present the bill; it must be made a law by our sovereign; his honour and his power will be as conspicuous in commanding at once, that a parliament shall assemble every third year, as in commanding a parliament to assemble this or that year: there is more of majesty in ordaining primary and universal causes, than in the actuating of subordinate effects."

"I do not doubt but that the glorious king Edward III. when he made those laws for the yearly calling of parliaments, did it with a right sense of his dignity and honour: the truth is, the kings of England are never in their glory, their splendor, their majestic sovereignty, but in parliament. Where is the power of imposing taxes? Where is the power of restoring from incapacities? Where is the legislative authority? In the king, Mr. Speaker, but how? In the king encircled and environed by his parliament."

"Out of parliament the king has only a limited power, a circumscribed jurisdiction; but, waited on by his parliament, no monarch of the east is so absolute in dispelling grievances."

"In chasing away bad ministers, we do nothing more than dissipate clouds that may gather again; but in voting this bill, we shall contribute, as far as is in our power, to the perpetuating our sun, our sovereign, in his vertical, in his noon-day lustre."

Such were the sentiments of that great man, who afterwards lost his life and fortune in the royal cause. He thought the sentiments of liberty were not at all incompatible with those of loyalty; that a king of England could be great only by ruling over a free people; and that the people could be no longer free than the king was great. But he believed, and believed with reason, that Charles had imbibed false notions of royal greatness, and that he sought to make that personal which was only political. That a king of England can do no ill, was an allowed maxim in the constitution; but that his ministers may, and that they may be punished for it, was equally allowed. Charles, while he was able to keep the seat of power, supported the first of these maxims, but was willing to to evade the latter. He endeavoured to screen his ministers; and by this preposterous conduct, he at last received, in his own breast, those darts of popular resentment which were originally aimed only at his ministers.

The more the commons proceeded in their inquiry after grievances, the more they multiplied. The truth is, there was a party in the house of commons, who laboured assiduously to discover grievances, and fought rather to propagate than extinguish them. Every unthinking court divine, every busy officer, and every imprudent person who was honoured with a commission in the army or navy, who spoke with warmth for ceremonies in religion, or despotism in the state, were called before the commons, and their follies or offences were obliquely charged upon the court. The servants of the high commission court, the star-chamber, and other officers, where illegal or other arbitrary measures had been pursued, were condemned to make satisfaction to the injured parties, and sometimes corporally punished. By these, and other artful measures, the anger of the house against the late grievances was kept up perpetually, without allowing a calm hour for reflection, or the least allowance for natural infirmity, mistakes, or misrepresentations. Some alleviations ought surely to have been made for the weaknesses and infirmities of human nature: it would be the height of cruelty to demand perfection in a mortal being. But men's passions were now too much heated to be shocked by any instance of injustice, which served ends so popular as those pursued by the house of commons.

The king remained entirely passive during these violent operations. The few servants who continued faithful to him, were seized with astonishment at the rapid progress made by the commons in power and popularity, and were glad, by their inactive and inoffensive behaviour, to compound for impunity. The torrent rising to so dreadful and so unexpected a height, all those who, either from interest or habit, were most attached to monarchy, were seized with despair: and with regard to those who maintained their duty to the king, merely from their regard to the constitution, they seemed, by their concurrence, to swell that inundation which began already to deluge the kingdom. Charles ordered both houses of parliament to attend him at Whitehall, where he complained strongly of their slow proceedings, and recommended to them the better support of the two armies, the forts and the navy. He professed, in very earnest terms, his desire of their perfecting the reformation they had begun; but, at the same time, wished them not to make any alteration in the established government. "You have (said he) taken the whole machine of government in pieces; a practice frequent with skilful artists, when they desire to clear the wheels from any rust which may have grown upon them. The engine may again be restored to its former use and motions, provided it be put up entire, so that not a pin be wanting." But this was far from the intention of the commons; they were persuaded that the machine was incumbered with many wheels and springs which retarded and crossed its operations, and destroyed its utility. Happy would it have been for themselves, and happy for the kingdom, had they proceeded with moderation, and been contented with their present plenitude of power, to remove such parts only as might justly be deemed superfluous and incongruous.

The petition presented by alderman Pennington against the government of the church, had hitherto lain dormant; the attempt was thought too dangerous, and the leaders of the opposition determined to proceed with caution. They accordingly introduced a bill for prohibiting all clergymen from exercising any civil office. One of the consequences of this bill would have been a deprivation of the bishops of their seats in the house of peers; but it was soon discovered, that though this measure was very acceptable to the zealous commons, who observed, with regret, the firm attachment of that order to the crown, it was not generally approved; for when the bill was presented to the peers, it was rejected by a great majority. This was the first check the commons had met with in their popular career; and sufficiently informed them of the opposition they must expect to meet with from the upper house, whose inclinations and interest could never be totally separated from the throne.

The cry against popery was immediately revived; an engine which the commons well knew would effectually alarm the populace. One Goodman, a Romish priest, but of a very inoffensive and virtuous character, and guilty of no crime besides that of executing the duties of his function, had been tried and found guilty; and Charles, from motives of justice and compassion, had reprieved him from time to time. This mercy was considered as a crime by the commons, and a remonstrance was presented to the king on this subject. Though this violent proceeding could be considered only as a gross insult upon the common understanding of mankind, yet Charles thought proper to send an answer to the house, in which he observed, that there was no instance upon record of any priests being executed merely for their religion, either in the reign of queen Elizabeth, or that of her father; and that he feared any acts of severity exercised on persons guilty of no other crime than that of religion, would be fatally felt both by his own subjects in foreign countries, and the protestants abroad. He, however, added, that after informing the house of the real reasons that influenced his conduct, he should leave the affair entirely to their determination, and think himself sufficiently discharged from any ill consequences that might ensue upon the execution of Goodman.

But this moderation of the king was much less remarkable than the magnanimity of the priest, who presented to Charles the following petition, which deserves to be recorded, as it does honour to his memory.

"To the king's most excellent majesty,

"The humble petition of John Goodman humbly sheweth, "That whereas your majesty's petitioner hath been informed of a great discontent in many of your majesty's subjects, at the gracious mercy your majesty was freely pleased to shew your petitioner, by suspending the execution of the sentence of death pronounced against your petitioner for being a Roman priest: These are humbly to beseech your majesty, rather to remit your petitioner to their mercy that are discontented, than to let him live the subject of so great discontent in your people against your majesty; for it hath pleased God to give me the grace, to desire with the prophet, that if this storm be raised for my sake, I may be cast into the sea, that others may avoid the tempest. "This is, most sacred sovereign, the petition of him who should esteem his blood well shed to cement up the breach between your majesty and your subjects upon this occasion."

Charles immediately sent this remarkable petition to the house; but whether it produced any effect on the popular leaders, is uncertain. Goodman, however, escaped with life; but, probably, more from the multiplicity of business than any pity so uncommon an instance of magnanimity excited in the breasts of those who had given rise to so much disturbance.

For some years, Cañ, a Scotchman, and afterwards Rosetti, an Italian, had openly resided at London, and frequented the court, as persons vested with a commission from the pope. The queen's zeal and authority with her husband had been the cause of this imprudence, so offensive to the nation. But the spirit of bigotry now rose too high to permit any longer such indulgences. Informed that the commons were greatly exasperated at these proceedings, and desirous of removing every cause of complaint, the queen sent a message to the house of commons, in which she observed, "That she had been always ready to use her best endeavours for removing all misunderstandings between the king and his subjects: that, at the request of the lords, who petitioned the king for calling a parliament, she wrote expressly to his majesty, conjuring him to have recourse to so salutary a method: that she had since been most willing to do every good office in her power between the king and his people, a circumstance not unknown to several in the house of lords; and that she would continue to pursue the same intention, from a full persuasion of its being the only method of procuring happiness to the king, to herself, and to the kingdom: that it was her earnest desire, that all things might be justly settled between the king and his people, and all causes of misunderstanding taken away and removed: that her majesty being informed that the person sent to her from the pope is obnoxious to the kingdom, she is desirous of giving all the satisfaction in her power, and will, within a convenient time, remove him out of England: that understanding exception has also been taken at the great resort of people to her chapel at Denmark-house, her majesty will be careful not to exceed what is convenient and necessary for the exercise of her religion: that as the parliament is not satisfied with the method she pursued for raising money on the catholics, for assisting the king in his late journey to the north, she desires it may be observed, that she was moved to it merely by her dear and tender affection for the king, and the example of many others among his majesty's subjects. If, therefore, any thing in her proceedings be illegal, she hopes it will be remembered, that she was ignorant of any laws to the contrary, and carried away by her great desire of assisting the king on so pressing an occasion; but promises to be more cautious for the future, not to do any thing contrary to the established laws of the kingdom: that being desirous of employing her own power to unite the king and his people, she wishes the parliament would look forward, and pass over such errors and mistakes as her servants may formerly have committed; and promises to repay this instance of respect with all the good offices she can do the house; and that they shall experience the real good effects of her interposition, as often as there shall be occasion."

A bill was brought in for giving the king the duties of tonnage and poundage for a limited time; but the utmost care was taken by the commons, in the preamble, to assert their own right of bestowing this gift, and to divest the crown of all independent title of assuming it. And that they might increase, or rather finally fix, the entire dependence and subjection of the king, they voted these duties only for two months; and afterwards renewed their grant from time to time, by very short periods. Charles passed this important bill without any hesitation; probably with an intention to shew, that he entertained not the least intention of ever more attempting to govern without a parliament.

The triennial act did not so readily obtain the royal assent. By this bill it was enacted, that if the chancellor, who was first bound under severe penalties, failed to issue writs by the third of September, every third year, any twelve or more of the peers should be empowered to exert this authority: in default of the peers, the sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. should summon the voters; and, in their default, the voters themselves should meet, and proceed to the election of members, in the same manner as if writs had been regularly issued from the crown: nor could the parliament, after it was assembled, be dissolved in less than fifty days. As this act, however necessary to prevent the disuse of parliaments, retrenched some of the noblest and most valuable prerogatives of the crown, it is no wonder that the king was unwilling to pass it into a law, especially as these assemblies had lately established it as a maxim, to carry their scrutiny into every part of government. But finding nothing less would satisfy the commons, he came to the house of lords, and gave it the royal assent. Solemn thanks were returned to his majesty by both houses for this mark of condescension. Great rejoicings were made in every part of the kingdom, especially in the capital; and the highest professions were every where made of gratitude and mutual returns of supply and confidence.

The king had determined to bestow gratifications on individuals; as a much surer method of softening the malignancy of the popular leaders, than any concessions he could make to the public. Accordingly several new privy-counsellors were sworn; among whom were the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Essex, Bristol, and Warwick; the lords Say, Saville, and Kimbolton: all these were of the popular party; and afterwards, when the commons pushed affairs to extremity, proved the greatest support of the throne. Juxon, bishop of London, was very desirous of resigning the treasurer's staff, a post he had never solicited, and the king at last consented to his request. It is something very remarkable, that during all the severe inquiries carried on against the conduct of ministers and prelates, the mild and prudent virtues of this man, who filled both these invidious characters, continued unmolested. The staff was intended for the earl of Bedford, a popular nobleman of great authority, as well as prudence and moderation. But unfortunately both for the prince and people, he paid the debt of nature soon after his being sworn one of the privy council. The following promotions were also intended: St. John, solicitor-general; Hollis, secretary of state; Pym, chancellor of the exchequer; lord Say, master of the wards; the earl of Essex, governor; and Hamden, tutor to the young prince. But it was soon perceived that these promotions would not be sufficient to answer the end proposed, as these popular leaders seemed determined still to promote all the measures of the parliament; or, in other words, to oblige the king to resign himself passively to their direction and government. The projected promotions, therefore, never took place.

Ever since the imprisonment of the earl of Strafford, the king had laboured incessantly to save his life. He attempted to mollify, by every indulgence, the rage of his most inveterate prosecutors; and was willing to make almost any sacrifice to obtain his wishes. But he laboured in vain: the members of the opposition dreaded his experience and great capacity; and were fully persuaded, that if he escaped their vengeance, he would again assume his former power, and severely repay the miseries he had suffered. They therefore considered his death as their only security, and on which all their success in their future enterprises must ultimately depend. Every method was therefore taken that human prudence could suggest, to prevent his escaping the fate they were preparing for him. An oath of secrecy had been taken by the committee appointed to draw up the charge against him; and they were invested with the power of examining all witnesses, of calling for all papers, and of using every means of scrutiny with regard to any part of the earl's conduct and behaviour. A man must have been very cautious, or very innocent indeed, not to afford, during the whole course of his life, some matter of accusation against him; especially when so general and unbounded an inquiry was exercised by such powerful and implacable enemies.

The house of commons in Ireland, as soon as advice arrived of Strafford's imprisonment, entered into all the violent counsels against him, notwithstanding they had so very lately bestowed the most ample praises on his administration. They prepared a representation of the miserable state into which the kingdom was fallen, as they ungenerously pretended, by his misconduct. They sent over a committee to England, to assist in the prosecution of their unfortunate governor.

A. D. 1641. Some unfair methods had been used to intimidate the bishops, and they were privately given to understand, that no farther notice would be taken of the petition from the citizens, provided they did not insist upon their right of sitting on Strafford's impeachment. By an ancient canon they were forbid to assist in any trial for life, and being unwilling to exasperate the commons, who were already too much prejudiced against them, they thought proper to withdraw, nor did they assist at any of the transactions preparatory to this famous trial.

The earl of Arundel, was appointed lord high-steward, a nobleman not at all favourable to Strafford. He was, indeed, a person of too great honour to be guilty of any glaring injustice, but he seized not any opportunities of doing him service, though several offered during the course of this celebrated trial. The cause came on before the house of lords on the twenty-second of March, in Westminster-hall, where both houses were assembled, the one as accusers, the other as judges. Besides the chair of state, a close gallery was prepared for the king and queen, who attended during the whole trial.

Twenty-eight articles of impeachment were exhibited against Strafford, and regarded his conduct, as president of the council of York, as deputy of Ireland, and, as counsellor or commander in England. But though every method had been used; though the managers had spent four months in framing the accusation; and though the earl was obliged to give his answers extempore, it appears, from comparison, that he was not only free from the crime of treason, of which indeed there is not the least appearance, but that his conduct, though exposed to such severe scrutiny, if proper allowance be made for the infirmities inseparable from human nature, innocent and even laudable. His greatest enemies confessed, that his defence was something more than human.

With regard to his behaviour when president of the council of York, it appeared to have been unexceptionable. The power of the council had indeed been greatly extended, but there was not the least reason to conclude that Strafford had used any art to procure these extensive powers; because, after the court was invested with the authority so loudly complained of, he had never once sat as president, nor exercised one act of judicial authority.

The Irish committee had, if possible, still less reason to complain. Industry and the arts of peace had been introduced, during his administration, among that rude and savage people: the shipping of the kingdom had been augmented more than an hundred fold: the customs trippled upon the same rates: the exports double in value to the imports: manufactures, particularly that of linen, introduced and promoted: agriculture, by means of the English and Scots plantations, gradually advancing: and the protestant religion encouraged, without having recourse to persecution. These were known facts, and ought to have concealed any discretionary authority, so much practised during that age, especially as they were never exercised to the prejudice of the people. No illegal advice or action was proved against him; and the whole amount of his guilt during his administration in Ireland, consisted of some peevish, at most, imperious expressions, which, during such dreadful extremities, and during a bad state of health, had casually dropped from him.

Among all the species of guilt the laws of England had, with the most scrupulous exactness, defined that of treason; because on that side it was found most necessary to protect the subject against the violence of the king and his ministers. By the famous statute of Edward III. all kinds of treason are enumerated, and every other crime, besides such as are there expressly mentioned, is carefully excluded from that denomination. The commons endeavoured to prove that Strafford had been guilty of "An endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws of this kingdom;" and would willingly have inferred that the crime was treason. But surely to introduce a species of guilt of which the act is totally silent; and construe it treason, is, in itself, a subversion of all law; because, under the specious pretence of defending liberty, it reverses a statute the best calculated for defending liberty, that had ever been enacted by an English parliament.

On the thirteenth of April Strafford was brought to the bar, and commanded to make a general reply to all the crimes laid to his charge. This he very nobly performed in a speech that does honour to human abilities; nor perhaps can history produce any performance equal to it, in the perspicuity of language and strength of reasoning, in stating, clearing or evading controverted evidences and facts, in extenuating some charges, in confuting others, and in following a subtle adversary through all the mazes of a long and complicated impeachment. In all the argumentative part of this noble speech, the earl confined his language only to the facts themselves; but when he comes to repel the arguments of the commons, to make the guilt amount to treason, he gave himself a much greater latitude, and displayed such an amazing strength both of style and reasoning, as at once astonished and affected the audience.

"Where, (said he) has this species of guilt lain so long concealed? Where has this fire been buried, during so many centuries, that no smoke should appear, till it burst out at once to consume me and my children? Better it were to live under no law at all; and by the maxims of cautious prudence, to conform ourselves the best we can, to the arbitrary will of a master; then fancy we have a law on which we can rely, and find, at last, that this law should inflict a punishment precedent to the promulgation, and try us by maxims unheard of till the very moment of the prosecution. If I sail on the Thames, and split my vessel on an anchor; in case there be no buoy to give warning, the party shall pay me damages: but if the anchor be marked out, then is the striking on it at my own peril. Where is the mark set upon this crime? Where is the token by which I should discover it? It has lain concealed under water; and no human prudence, no human innocence, could save me from the destruction with which I am threatened.

"It is now full two hundred and forty years since treasons were defined; and so long has it been, since any man was touched to this extent, upon this crime, before myself. We have lived, my lords, happily to ourselves at home: we have lived glorious abroad, to the world: let us be content with what our fathers have left us: let not our ambition carry us to be more learned than they were, in those killing and destructive arts. Great wisdom it will be in your lordships, and just providence, for yourselves, for your posterities, for the whole kingdom, to cast from you into the fire, these bloody and mysterious volumes of arbitrary and constructive treasons, as the primitive christians did their books of curious arts, and betake ourselves to the plain letter of the statute, which tells you where the crime is, and points out to you the path by which you may avoid it.

"Let us not, to our own destruction, awake those sleeping lions, by rattling up a company of records, which have lain, during so many ages, by the wall, forgotten and neglected. To all my former afflictions, add not this, my lords, the most severe of any; that I, for my other sins, not for my treasons, be the means of introducing a precedent, so pernicious to the laws and liberties of my native country."

"However these gentlemen at the bar say, they speak for the commonwealth, and they believe so: yet, under favour, in this particular, it is I who speak for the commonwealth. Precedents, like those endeavoured to be established against me, must draw along such inconveniences and miseries, that, in a few years, the kingdom will be in the condition "condition expressed in a statute of Henry IV. and no man shall know by what rule to govern his words and actions.

"Impose not, my lords, difficulties unfurmountable upon ministers of state, nor disable them from serving with cheerfulness their king and country. If you examine them, under such severe penalties, by every grain, by every little weight, the scrutiny will be intolerable; the public affairs of the kingdom must be left waste; and no wise man, who has any honour or fortune to lose, will ever engage in such dreadful, such unknown perils.

"My lords, I have now troubled your lordships a great deal longer than I should have done. Were it not for the interest of these pledges, which a saint in heaven left me, I should be loth"—Here he pointed to his children, and his weeping stopped his voice—"What I forfeit for myself, it is nothing; but I confess, that my indiscretion should forfeit for them, it wounds me very deeply. You will be pleased to pardon my infirmity: something I should have said; but I see I shall not be able, and therefore I leave it.

"And now, my lords, I thank God, I have been, by his blessing, sufficiently instructed in the extreme vanity of all temporary enjoyments, compared to the importance of our eternal duration. And so, my lords, even so, with all humility, and with all tranquillity of mind, I submit clearly, and freely, to your judgments: and whether that righteous doom shall be to life or death, I shall repose myself, full of gratitude and confidence, in the arms of the great Author of my existence."

Whitlocke, who was himself chairman of the committee which conducted the impeachment against this unfortunate nobleman, candidly declares, "That never any man acted such a part, on such a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence; with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and actions, than did this great and excellent person; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors, some few excepted, to remorse and pity." In a word, this nobleman, without the least assistance, blending modesty and humility with firmness and vigour, made such a defence, that the commons themselves, tho' far from being strangers to his great abilities, were astonished: they perceived that it would be impossible, by any legal prosecution, to obtain a sentence against him, and therefore determined to bring in a bill of attainder immediately after the pleadings were finished; for many of the leaders in the opposition well knew, that either Strafford or themselves must perish. It was known that he intended to impeach Pym, Hambden, and several others, of high treason, for having invited the Scots to invade England. It was thought, that had he not been prevented by the accusation of the commons, he would that very day have presented the impeachment to the house of peers. The bill was therefore pushed, with the utmost violence, in the lower house. This gave great offence to the lords; because it, in a manner, altered the course of the proceedings, as the commons seemed desirous of exchanging the character of prosecutors for that of judges. The friends of Strafford, who had the courage to declare their sentiments, took great advantage of this particular; they declared rebellion to be equally odious with treason; and that it was plain the commons intended, with the assistance of their friends, the clamorous and insolent populace, to deprive the crown and house of lords of their most valuable privileges. The peers themselves seemed to entertain some apprehensions of this kind, and declared their intention of proceeding according to the method already begun by impeachment. The bill, however, passed the commons, with only fifty-nine dissenting voices. It was, however, apprehended the bill would miscarry in the upper house, and it became necessary for the popular leaders to make use of other methods to execute their purpose.

The puritanical ministers, who hated Strafford, entertained their congregations, the Sunday after the bill of attainder was passed by the commons, with the most enthusiastic declamations on the necessity of executing justice on great delinquents. These destructive orations were not uttered in vain. About six thousand men; armed with swords, staves, &c. issued from the city, and surrounded the two houses of parliament. They threatened with the severest punishments the fifty-nine members who had voted against the bill of attainder, and posted up their names in every part of the city, under the title of Straffordians, and betrayers of their country; by which means they were exposed to the continual insults of an ungovernable rabble: and all the peers suspected of being friends of the unfortunate minister, were sure to meet with menaces of the most desperate vengeance from the enraged populace. The lords sent complaints to the commons against these violences, which they justly represented as the most flagrant breach of privilege, and as tending to destroy the freedom of parliament. But they soon perceived, from the affected coolness and indifference of the lower house, that the popular tumults were far from being disagreeable. So greatly were their sentiments altered with regard to the privileges and freedom of parliament!

A discovery, which was made about this time, tended to increase these popular disorders. Some of the principal officers of the English army, partly from an attachment to the court, and partly from a disgust they had conceived against the parliament, at the preference they gave the Scottish army, entered into an association, took an oath of secrecy, and kept up a close correspondence with some of the king's servants. They drew up the form of a petition, and proposed to get it signed by the whole army. In this petition they represented, that the great and unexampled concessions made by the king for the security of public peace and liberty, produced not the desired effects; because of some insatiable, turbulent spirits, whom nothing less than a total subversion of the ancient constitution can appease. "Far be it from our thoughts (added they) to believe, that the violence and unreasonableness of such persons can have any influence upon the prudence and justice of the parliament. But what increases our present trouble and discontent is, that we are informed these ill-affected persons are supported in their violence by the multitude, and the power of raising tumults; that thousands flock at their call, and beset the houses of parliament, and even Whitehall itself; not only to the prejudice of that freedom so essentially necessary to great councils, and judicial proceedings, but may possibly be productive of some personal danger to your sacred majesty, and the peers.

"Desirous of preventing the malignant designs of those persons, and the licentiousness of the multitudes that follow them; and impressed with the deepest care and zealous affection for the safety of your sacred majesty and the parliament, our humble petition is, that in your wisdom, you would be pleased to remove such dangers, by punishing the ringleaders of these tumults, that your majesty, and the parliament, may be secured from such insolences for the future. For the suppression of which, we offer, in all humility, to wait upon you ourselves, hoping we shall appear a sufficient defence to our gracious sovereign, the parliament, our religion, and the established laws of the kingdom, and able to repel whatever numbers may audaciously presume to violate them: so shall we, by the wisdom of your majesty and the parliament, not only be vindicated from the precedent innovations, but be secured from the future which are threatened, and which are likely to produce more dangerous effects than the former."

The draught of this petition being conveyed to the king, he was prevailed upon to counter-sign it himself, as a mark of his approbation. The officers in general approved of this petition; but suspecting that unless they went farther, they should be abandoned by the court, and if they went so far they should become obnoxious to the parliament, the petition itself, with the whole project was laid aside.

About two months after, Goring, one of the principal actors, betrayed the secret to the popular leaders, who took advantage of it to alarm the people, tho' they well knew the danger was over. The attempt fully answered their purpose. Pym opened the matter in the house; and the terror was soon conveyed to every corner of the kingdom. A protestation was signed by the parliament, declaring that they would defend their religion and liberties against any force whatever. The panic of the people was artfully kept up by alarms continually spread of fresh conspiracies. It was given out, That great numbers of papists were gathering in Lancashire: that secret meetings were held by them in subterraneous passages in Surry: that they had entered into a plot to blow up the Thames with gunpowder, in order to drown the city: that provisions of arms were making in foreign parts: sometimes France, sometimes Denmark, was forming designs against the kingdom. All this tended to one point, namely, that of animating the people in their demands of justice against the earl of Strafford.

The king was now greatly alarmed for the fate of his favourite minister, whom his conscience told him, was innocent. He came to the house of peers, and offered the parliament any security that Strafford should never again be employed in any public business, provided his life might be saved. At the same time he declared, that he was totally dissatisfied with regard to the circumstances of the treason; and on that account mentioned his difficulty of giving his assent to the bill of attainder should it pass the house of peers. This mistaken mercy in the king, produced a fatal effect. Charles should have known, that his attachment to Strafford was the chief motive for passing the bill; and that the great proofs he gave of his anxious concern for the life of his minister, rendered his destruction the more inevitable. The commons took fire at this proceeding, and voted it a breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill depending before the house.

Numbers of the lords were so intimidated by the popular tumults, that they retired into the country, to avoid the brutal fury of the rebels; so that only forty-five were present when the bill of attainder was brought into the house. Yet even of this small number nineteen had the courage to vote against it. A certain proof, that if entire freedom had been allowed, it would have been rejected by a great majority. The popular leaders of the commons knew this, and were therefore very assiduous in raising the popular tumults which prevented the lords from attending their duty, and consequently destroyed the freedom so necessary in parliamentary debates: they supported the very grievance they had so long and so loudly complained of; for nothing is more evident than that all this storm of popular fury, was raised, directed, or allayed, by the breath of the fanatical preachers, and the violent enemies of Strafford.

The condition of Charles was now truly deplorable. Racked with the pangs of conscience, with regard to his consenting to the death of a minister whom he loved, esteemed, and believed to be innocent. He saw the commons whom he and his family had always hated and despised treating him as the mere phantom of a king; and that they revered his person only, that they might present him with a reed instead of a sceptre. The two armies continued in their former situation, but greatly altered in their sentiments and affections. The Scots perceived they had been made the tools of a party, who had reduced the power of the crown much lower than they had ever intended to level it in Scotland. But they had experienced the fruits of this despicable employment, by an immense profusion of money, as it were thrown at their feet, for their entertainment: at the same time they were highly caressed and complimented by the parliament. The English forces, on the other hand, tho' extremely well disposed to support the power and authority of the king, were no friends to the queen and her party; and perceived that they must entirely depend upon the parliament for subsistence. The popular leaders made the greatest advantages of this unhappy situation of the English troops, and endeavoured to fill the minds of the people with terror, by representing the army as little better than a company of wild beasts who could be kept tame and innocent only by feeding them with a sparing hand. At the same time the commons, by raising all the money necessary for the payment of the two armies in the city of London, made, in fact, that city the national creditor, and themselves her debtors. The money had been raised by a vote of parliament; the parliament was therefore to refund it; and the interest of the city depended upon supporting the credit of the parliament, which could only be done by prolonging the duration of that assembly. Such was the artful reasoning that induced many well meaning members to give their consent for the bringing in a bill "That the parliament should not be adjourned; prorogued; or dissolved, but by its own consent."

It must be granted that by this bill, the parliament dissolved the English constitution. Even the people themselves, however disgusted against the measures of Charles, would not have suffered the thoughts of such a bill, had they not seen it through a false medium; through the mist of terror; occasioned by seventy thousand men in arms, ready to sheath their swords in the bowels of their country. Charles beheld all the tumults excited by the arts of ambitious men, with amazement and dismay. He imagined that the sceptre trembled in his hand, even at the time when its touch would have dispelled every commotion; had not his hand been too weak to wield it.

The populace now flocked about Whitehall and accompanied their demand of justice upon Strafford, with the most shameful and open menaces. Rumours of conspiracies were again spread abroad: invasions and insurrections talked of: and the whole nation thrown into so violent a ferment, as seemed to foretell some great and alarming convulsion. Wherever the king turned his eyes he was presented with a gloomy and frightful prospect: he perceived no resource, no expedient, no security. All his servants preferred their own safety to that of their master, and even declined interposing with their advice between him and his parliament. The queen, terrified with the appearance of such alarming insurrections, pressed him with tears to satisfy his people with regard to his minister, as it was hoped that his death would restore that tranquillity which had for some time forsaken the kingdom. Juxon alone, whose courage was not inferior to his other virtues, despised the menaces of the populace, and boldly told the king; that if in his conscience he thought Strafford innocent of the treason laid to his charge, he ought not to pass the bill of attainder.

While the king continued in this dreadful situation of mind, Strafford took a step which demonstrated that his soul was a stranger to fear. He wrote a letter to the king, in which he treated his majesty to prefer the peace and safety of his kingdom to the life of an unfortunate, though innocent man; and quiet the tumultuous populace; by granting the request they made with so much vehemence. "In this, added he, "my request will more acquit you to God, than all "the world can do besides. To a willing man there "is no injury. And by God's grace, I forgive all the "world with a calmness and meekness, of infinite "contentment to my dislodging soul; so, Sir, to you "I can resign the life of this world with all imaginable cheerfulness, in the just acknowledgment of "your

"your exceeding favours." This letter astonished his majesty: he knew the soul of Strafford was not easily terrified, but he thought him not endowed with such amazing magnanimity. But it tended little to remove the doubts of Charles: he could not bear the thought of putting to death a man whom he loved, esteemed, and believed to be innocent.

At last, however, after the most violent anxiety and doubt, Charles granted a commission to four noblemen, empowering them to give the royal assent to the bill. Carleton, secretary of state, was sent to inform Strafford that the bill of attainder was signed. On receiving this fatal news, he rose from his chair, lifted up his eyes to heaven, laid his hand upon his heart, and said, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation." He, however, soon recollected his spirits, and prepared himself to suffer the fatal sentence. Three days only were allowed him; nor could the king, though he sent a letter by the prince of Wales to the parliament, obtain any longer respite.

He was attended, in his last moments, by archbishop Usher; and in passing from his apartment to Tower-hill, where the scaffold was erected, he stopped under the window of archbishop Laud, with whom he had long lived in the most intimate friendship. The aged primate appeared dissolved in tears; and on Strafford's begging the assistance of his prayers in those awful moments which were so nearly approaching, the prelate pronounced, in a broken voice, a tender blessing on his departing friend, and sunk into the arms of his attendants. This affecting scene of tender friendship drew tears from the eyes of the unfortunate Strafford, but could not shake the magnanimity of his soul. With a mind superior to his fate, he marched on with an air of greater dignity than that which usually attended him. His behaviour on the scaffold was noble and decent. "I fear (said he) it is an ill omen for the projected reformation in the state, to begin with shedding innocent blood." He complained not of the malice of his enemies, nor of the methods that had been taken to deprive him of life; but laid himself down with great tranquillity, and his head was severed from his body by one stroke of the executioner. He perished on the twelfth of May, in the forty-ninth year of his age.

Strafford was one of the greatest men that ever appeared in England; and though he was not irreproachable, yet he certainly merited a much better fate: and whatever advice he might give his majesty when dangers rendered desperate methods necessary, yet he often repeated to his master this memorable and noble maxim, "That if ever necessity obliged the sovereign to violate the laws, it ought to be done with great reserve; and that, as soon as it was possible, reparation ought to be made to the laws for what they had suffered by such violation."

The same commissioners who signed the bill against the minister, signed also another more fatal to the royal authority. By this act it was declared, that the parliament should not be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, without the consent of both houses. The king considered not the consequence of this statute. Absorbed in grief for the loss of his favourite, he gave his assent to an act that rendered him the slave of his oppressors.

It was in vain that Charles expected a proportional return for so many instances of unbounded compliance. The commons proceeded in their career, and resolved to annihilate all remains of arbitrary power. They attacked the court of high commission and the star-chamber, whose jurisdiction, almost without rule or bounds, put real shackles on civil liberty. A bill unanimously passed the house to abolish these courts; and, in them, to annihilate the principal and most dangerous articles of the king's prerogative. The breach made in the power of the crown by this abolition was the greater, as the star-chamber took cognizance of all the infractions of the royal proclamations. The right of issuing ordinances was, from that time, in a great measure abrogated, as the king no longer had it in his power to carry them into execution.

The marshal's court, which took cognizance of offensive words, and was thought not sufficiently limited by law, was also, for that reason, abolished. The stannary courts, which exercised jurisdiction over the miners, being liable to a similar objection, underwent a similar fate. The abolition of the council of York, and the council of Wales, followed from the same principles. The authority of the clerk of the market, to whom the care of a general inspection of the weights and measures throughout England was committed, was transferred to the mayors, sheriffs, and ordinary magistrates.

Thus did the commons abolish every remains of arbitrary power; and made the rigid maxims of law and equity the sole rule of conduct. No courts of judicature now existed but those of Westminster-hall; and though the means they made use of to procure these great advantages to posterity, often favoured of artifice, sometimes of violence, yet it should be remembered, that it is, perhaps, impossible to effect a revolution in government, merely by the force of reason and argument. Upon the whole, therefore, if we except that complication of cruel iniquity that effected Strafford's attainder, it must be owned, that the transactions during the first period of this memorable parliament, were productive of very great advantages to the nation, by fixing the liberty of the subject on a firm and solid foundation.

The parliament now adjourned to the twentieth of October; and the king set out on a journey to Scotland, in order to settle the government of that kingdom. As his path lay through the places where both the English and Scottish armies were cantoned, the commons entertained great jealousy on that account; and a committee of their house was appointed to attend him, under pretence of seeing the articles of the treaty with the Scottish commissioners fully executed, but in reality to be a spy upon his actions.

While Charles continued in Scotland, Argyle and Hamilton precipitately left the parliament, where every transaction was carried on with candour, under pretence that the earl of Crawford and others intended to assassinate them. This plot, if indeed any thing of that kind ever existed, seems to have been laid in England; where it made a much greater noise, and was much better understood than in Scotland. Charles on this occasion behaved nobly. He went, attended by about five hundred gentlemen, to the parliament, and desired the members not to be alarmed at pretended designs, which had, probably, no real existence, but search the affair to the bottom, and restore security to the kingdom, by withdrawing the veil of deception, or punishing, with the utmost severity, those who dared disturb the tranquillity of the kingdom. His advice was followed; and the circumstances of the plot being thoroughly examined, they were found to be wholly destitute of support; and even the noblemen themselves were so much ashamed of their conduct, that they returned in a few days to attend their duty in parliament. But though this incident had no effect in Scotland, it was attended with very alarming consequences in England. The parliament, which was now again assembled, represented it as a premeditated design in the papists to break off the treaty of pacification; and that there was not the least doubt of their having a large party to carry on the same designs in England. The two houses, therefore, came to the most alarming resolutions; and circular letters, full of apprehension and terror, were sent to all the civil and military officers in the kingdom.

The arrival of the Scottish commissioners at Edinburgh changed the face of affairs in that kingdom. Charles was obliged to consent to every proposal, however exorbitant, in order to save the lives of his friends who were still in prison. For notwithstanding the the articles signed at London, it was now made a matter of conscience with the violent covenanters, that according to their religious engagements, their deaths only ought to satisfy them. Strange and preposterous conduct, to make religion, intended to disseminate peace and happiness in every part of the world, the author of the most horrid crimes! Charles, who determined not to abandon those who suffered for their loyalty, was obliged to court the favour of the Scots: He made such a distribution of public posts and preferments among the rigid covenanters; that it may with justice be said, that his enemies were loaded with riches and honours, while his friends were abandoned to poverty and distress.

It was the fate of Charles to see his three kingdoms in flames at the same period of time. Ireland had been peaceable since the establishment of the laws, and a proper subordination, till the late transactions of the English parliament excited the flame of rebellion in that kingdom. The remains of the old Irish families had indeed never been thoroughly satisfied with their state of subjection under the kings of England, while the assistance they constantly received from the catholic princes, kept them firmly attached to the religion of Rome. There were among them, as well as among the English and Scotch, men of sense and penetration, who knew the dreadful effects of enthusiastic fury, among a wild and ferocious multitude. They had seen its consequences in their sister kingdom; and determined to follow the example. Popery in Ireland acted in the same manner, and pointed to the same ends, as fanaticism in England and Scotland. They began with wresting from the government many civil privileges; and at first attempted nothing more than the free exercise of their own religion. Charles had agreed that four catholic regiments should be sent over into Spain in order to serve in the armies of that kingdom. Had this been effected, the dreadful rebellion and massacre that ensued had, possibly, never been excited: the horrid design had slept in the bosom of its contrivers, and perished with them; but this measure was opposed by the puritans in England, and the papists in Ireland. The faction in England opposed it merely because the king was engaged in honour to assist the king of Spain: the well-meaning papists in Ireland opposed it in parliament, because they knew from fatal experience, how dangerous enemies to the civil government of their own country all Irish soldiers are, when bred in foreign service: and the malignant papists opposed it, because they were unwilling to lose so large a body of their friends, who could not fail of being of the utmost service in their projected rebellion. Charles therefore was obliged to break his promise with the Spanish monarch, and the Irish committee, who had assisted in the prosecution of Strafford, returned from England loaded with favours and privileges for their countrymen.

By the ancient constitution of Ireland, their successions passed by a kind of adoption. Thus every sept or family, out of which a king or leader happened to be elected, considered itself as the descendants of that man, and as having a right to the territories he had governed. Those prejudices were encouraged by the clergy, who considered themselves as so many martyrs and confessors, while aliens and heretics enjoyed their power and possessed their patrimonies. The old English families, who had, in fact, conquered Ireland for the kings of England, thought themselves ill treated, and most of them being catholics, they joined in sentiments, as they had done before in interests and alliances, with the old Irish.

The party being thus numerous both in country and parliament, they followed the example set them by the English, and their attempts were crowned with similar success. They impeached and persecuted all the ministers of Charles, till there was hardly a single person left, who had courage sufficient to oppose their destructive measures. Nor was there any thing a people could desire, with regard to indulgence in religion, or the security of their properties, which the Irish did not now enjoy. But these were not sufficient to satisfy the craving dispositions of the Irish. Zealous catholics, but sunk into the very abyss of brutal and superstitious ignorance, they beheld with horror a number of puritans scattered over their country, and the ancient revenues withheld from their clergy.

Roger More, a gentleman descended from a very ancient family in Ireland, and highly celebrated among his countrymen, for valour and capacity, first formed the project for expelling the English, and asserting the independency of his native country. He was indefatigable in the pursuit of his purpose; going, with the utmost secrecy, from one chieftain to another, and using all the arts in his power to awaken every latent principle of discontent. He maintained a close correspondence with lord Maguire, and Sir Phelim O Neale, the most powerful persons among the ancient Irish. He observed, that the rebellious factions in England and Scotland offered the most favourable opportunity for effecting their purpose; that the English planters who had expelled them from their possessions, suppressed their religion, and bereaved them of their liberties, were but a handful when compared with the natives; that though the catholics had hitherto enjoyed, in some tolerable degree, the exercise of their religion, from the moderation of their indulgent prince, they must henceforth expect the government would be conducted by other maxims and other principles; that the puritanical parliament having at last subdued their sovereign, would, doubtless, when their power was consolidated, extend their ambitious enterprizes to Ireland; and make the catholics in that kingdom feel the same furious persecution, to which their brethren in England were at present exposed; and that a revolt in the Irish, tending only to vindicate their native liberty against the violence of foreign invaders, could never, at any time, be deemed rebellion, much less, during the present confusions, when their prince was, in a manner, a prisoner, and obedience must be paid, not to him, but to those who had traiterously usurped his authority.

Considerations like these could not fail of awakening the native pride of the Irish, and induce them to form a conspiracy against their hated masters. Plunket, a soldier of fortune, readily engaged in the undertaking, and it was agreed that Sir Phelim O Neale, and the other conspirators, should begin the insurrection on the same day in the different provinces, while lord Maguire and Roger More made themselves masters of the castle of Dublin. The twenty-third of October was the day fixed upon for carrying their design into execution. The scheme was at first proposed with a great deal of moderation; it was resolved not to spill any blood but in cases of necessity, and not to molest the Scots, who were very numerous in the northern parts of the kingdom. The English ambassadors at foreign courts, received frequent hints of what was projecting in Ireland, and the lords justices were desired, by repeated advices, to be upon their guard; but all these intimations produced no effect, they continued in the same supine indolence and security. The castle of Dublin, by which the capital itself was commanded, contained arms for a hundred thousand men, thirty-five pieces of cannon, and a proportional quantity of ammunition: yet even this important fortress, was guarded by no greater force than fifty men. The truth is, there was at this time so great a similarity of interests between the English puritans, and the Irish catholics, that the lords justices, who were enemies to Strafford, did not chuse to be very active against the papists. Leicester, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, remained in London, and Sir William Parsons and Sir John Borlace, the two chief justices, were men of slender capacities, and owed the promotion merely to their zeal for the party that that now governed every thing. Tranquil from their ignorance and want of experience, they lumbered on the very brink of destruction.

But the evening before the horrid design was to be carried into execution, they were roused from their lethargy by the information of O'Connolly, an Irish protestant, who betrayed the whole secret to Parsons. On his information, Mahone, lord Maguire, and about thirty of the conspirators were seized during the night; but More, Plunket, and some others, made their escape. Mahone discovered the project that was formed for a general insurrection, but his information came too late to prevent the intended effect.

The consternation which the discovery of this conspiracy occasioned among the English in Dublin, was greatly increased, when it was known that the catholics in every part of the kingdom had been barbarously punctual at the appointed time. It is shocking to imagine, much more to describe, the massacre that followed. Death was the smallest penalty those religious ruffians exacted from the unhappy protestants. It would have exhausted the fancy of the most ingenious savages, practised in all the cruel arts of destruction, to have inflicted greater inhumanities than the Irish rebels perpetrated on men, women, and children, without distinction. These barbarities appeared as works of piety to those in whom superstition had extinguished every natural sentiment. And while they were inflicting the most brutal torments on the unhappy protestants, they told them, with a kind of infernal pleasure, that the miseries they suffered were only the beginning of an eternity of torments they were going to receive in the regions of perdition. Some authors make the number of protestants that perished in this rebellion amount to one hundred and fifty, or two hundred thousand; but according to the lowest computation, above forty thousand fell by the hands of these merciless enthusiasts.

Had Dublin fallen into the hands of the rebels, all the English had been exterminated; but the capital being preserved, a small remnant escaped thither, and were preserved from the swords of the catholics.

Charles was in Scotland when he received advice of this rebellion and massacre; and appeared so sensibly affected by it, that he recommended, in the most affecting language, the relief of the Irish protestants to the parliament of Scotland; and was extremely desirous that some part of the Scottish army, which had not either yet been disbanded, or might easily be re-assembled, might be sent immediately over to Ireland. The Scots were not at all averse to this proposition, and appointed a committee of their parliament to treat with the commons of England; but so much time was spent in negotiations, that the opportunity of chastising the rebels, and putting a stop to their inhuman ravages, was irretrievably lost; and the unfortunate protestants denied that assistance from their brethren in England, which even the laws of nature, and the sacred ties of friendship, gave them the highest reason to expect.

When the heat of slaughter was over, and cool reflection returned, the Irish rebels trembled for their situation, and endeavoured to conceal the blackness of their crimes by the most horrid imposture. They pretended they had received authority from the king and queen, especially from the latter, for the horrid murders they had committed; and by this specious assertion, though destitute of the least foundation in truth, they deceived many of their deluded countrymen. They added, that the sole reason for their taking up arms was to vindicate the royal prerogative, so unjustly invaded by the puritanical parliaments of England and Scotland. To give some colour of truth to this improbable declaration, recourse was had to artifice and fraud. Sir Phelim O'Neale having found a royal patent in the house of lord Cranfield, whom he had murdered, tore off the seal, and affixed it to a commission he had forged for himself.

Sensible of his utter inability to defend his Irish subjects, and chastise the rebels for their inhuman murders, Charles was obliged to have recourse to his English parliament for that assistance he was unable to supply. He flattered himself, that the terror they had always expressed against popery, a religion that now appeared in all its horrors, would sufficiently second his exhortations, and procure his protestant subjects immediate relief. But he was mistaken; a real zeal for religion was not the object of the parliament; it wanted the stimulation of faction or interest to produce the desired effect. Charles was not, however, wanting on his part, to rouse the parliament to revenge the blood of their countrymen. He laid before the commons all the intelligence he had received; and informed them, that the insurrection was not, in his opinion, the result of any rash and furious enterprize, but of a formed conspiracy against the crown of England. He added, that a cause so important to national and religious interests, required their utmost attention, must be entered upon immediately, and pursued with vigour.

But he soon perceived that the parliament were more desirous of exalting their own authority on the ruins of the prerogative, than of sending assistance to their brethren, though plunged in the very abyss of distress. As soon as the particulars of this infernal massacre arrived, all the privy-counsellors in the neighbourhood of London repaired to the house of commons, and laid before the assembly all the informations they had received. The dreadful narrative seemed to rouse in the breasts of the members the tender feelings of humanity; and it was immediately resolved to borrow fifty thousand pounds from the city, on parliamentary security. Several committees were appointed to take care of the Irish affairs; and the following resolutions were taken by the house:

"That a convenient number of ships be provided for guarding the sea-coasts of Ireland.

"That six thousand foot, and two thousand horse, be raised with all convenient speed, for a present expedition into that kingdom.

"That the lord-lieutenant be desired to present to both houses of parliament the names of such officers as he shall think proper to send into Ireland, for commanding the forces intended to be transported thither.

"That magazines of provisions be immediately provided at West Chester, in order to be sent over to Dublin, as the occasions of that kingdom may require.

"That the magazine of arms, ammunition and powder, now in Carlisle, be forthwith sent over to Knockfergus, in Ireland.

"That it be referred to his majesty's council to consider of some method of offering rewards to such as shall signalize themselves in the Irish expedition; of pardoning those rebels in that kingdom who shall make their submission in a limited time; and of offering sums of money as rewards to such as shall bring in the heads of the principal rebels.

"That letters be immediately sent to the justices in Ireland, informing them how sensible this house is of the affairs of that kingdom.

"That the committee of Irish affairs consider how and in what manner this kingdom may make use of the friendship and assistance of Scotland in the affairs of Ireland.

"That directions be given for drawing a bill for impressing men for this particular service.

But notwithstanding these resolutions, the preparations were carried on so slowly, that all the hopes of the Irish protestants with regard to a speedy assistance from their brethren in England, vanished. In the mean time, the commons took care to alarm every part of the kingdom with the most dreadful apprehensions of the horrid designs and numbers of the papists. This gave many of their own friends in the house of commons a dislike to their proceedings; they began to be alarmed at their conduct; and to mistrust their designs. Capel, member for Hertfordshire, and a person of great integrity, had been very warm in the opposition, and as forward as any gentleman in the house for removing the real grievances of his country. The same may be said of the lords Falkland and Digby, Sir John Culpepper, Mr. Hyde, and many others whose concurrence in the measures against the court had given great credit to the opposition. But they now thought the king had gone as far as in prudence, and, perhaps, farther in duty than they could require; and therefore, that all opposition ought now to cease. They made no secret of these sentiments; but none, except lord Digby, had as yet the courage to break with the popular leaders in the house of commons.

It was, however, sufficiently evident, that the two parties must soon divide; and the opposition took every method in their power to strengthen themselves against the approaching rupture, and to prevent the desertion of so many powerful friends from having any effect in turning against them the current of popular favour. Nothing contributed more to this than the continual alarms they artfully spread with regard to the designs of the papists, already so much the object of general abhorrence. Accustomed, in all their invectives, to join the prelatical party with the catholics, the people immediately supposed the insurrection in Ireland to be the result of their united counsels: and when they heard that the rebels in that kingdom pleaded the king's commission for all their violences, bigotry, ever credulous and malignant, assented, without scruple or examination, to that gross imposture, and loaded the unhappy prince with the whole enormity of a contrivance shocking to humanity. It is, however, at present, so universally allowed that the king had no hand in the Irish rebellion, that it would be nothing less than offering an affront to the judgment of the reader, to urge any arguments to prove a point that stands in need of no elucidation.

The commons, however, took care not to contradict a report that seemed so favourable to their designs. They did not, indeed, pretend to charge the king with this enormous cruelty, but insinuated that the Irish rebellion had been secretly planned, and was at that very time fomented by papists in great trust about the persons of the king and queen. Alarmed at these base imputations, Charles, to clear himself and his consort from all suspicions, unhappily recommended the suppression of the Irish rebellion to his parliament. Probably, the popular leaders had foreseen this, and took care to make use of the advantages they had acquired from an act of so much imprudence. Under pretence of this acquisition of trust, they assumed the power of disposing of the royal magazines, and of issuing orders for raising forces, which till that time had always been understood to be lodged in the crown. In short, Charles, by thus injudiciously devolving his authority to the parliament, in some measure put his own sword into the hands of his subjects. Care was taken to publish to the whole world, that his majesty had particularly recommended the preservation of Ireland to both houses of parliament; but, at the same time, effectual measures were pursued to defeat the king's prudent intention of sending over immediately a body of Scots to suppress the Irish rebels, and to restore peace to that miserable kingdom. They had, indeed, voted, that a considerable army should be immediately raised for the service of Ireland; but no effectual step was taken for carrying that vote into execution, though the rebellion was now arrived to such a height, as to call for the whole power of England. They, however, carried on the prosecution against the papists with the utmost vigour: five priests were executed at one time: the law of nations was violated with regard to foreign ambassadors, whom they suspected of harbouring priests: all the recusants of any figure or fortune in England were secured; and it was resolved that all the Irish in the inns of court, who refused to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, should be expelled those societies, and rendered incapable of being again admitted. These violent proceedings alarmed the lords, who expressed a visible reluctance to proceed to such extremities. This occasioned several strong resolutions of the commons, sufficiently indicating their intention of acting without the concurrence of the house of peers, if they continued to oppose them.

On the twenty-fifth of November, Charles arrived in London from Scotland; and was soon informed, that the commons were preparing a remonstrance on the state of the nation. It soon after appeared, and was followed by very important consequences. It was not addressed to the king, but was openly declared to be an appeal to the people. It was a recapitulation of all the wrong measures embraced by the king since the commencement of his reign: the unsuccessful expeditions to Cadiz and the isle of Rhé are mentioned; the sending ships to France for the suppression of the Hugonots; the forced loans; the illegal confinement of men for refusing to obey illegal commands; the violent dissolution of four parliaments; the arbitrary government that always succeeded; the questioning, fining, and imprisoning members, for their conduct in the house; the levying taxes without consent of parliament; the introducing superstitious innovations into the church, without the authority of law: in short, every thing which, either with or without reason, had given offence during the course of fifteen years, from the accession of the king to the calling of the present parliament.

Had Charles been still in the full exercise of his authority; had the necks of his people been subject to the chariot-wheels of his power; had the detestable rod of the star-chamber still hung over the heads of his subjects; had the court of high-commission still endeavoured to fetter their consciences with the cords of iniquity; had all these, and a thousand other oppressions, still continued, this famous remonstrance had been the bravest and wisest measure that any parliament ever pursued, and must have gained its authors immortal honours. But as the landmarks of the constitution had been now replaced, as Charles had been as liberal in granting as his people had been importunate in asking; as nothing that the will of heaven could warrant, or the art of man devise, was now wanting to the security of the people; and as no recent violations of the king's concessions, or the people's rights, had been so much as pretended; it is sufficiently plain, that this remonstrance could not be calculated to promote the happiness and tranquillity of the nation.

It was easily perceived, that some farther attacks on the prerogative were intended, and that the remonstrance was intended as a signal to the whole party to exert all their powers. It is, therefore, no wonder that it met with very strong opposition in the house of commons. For more than fourteen hours the debate was supported with remarkable warmth and acrimony; and the remonstrance would possibly have miscarried, had not the uncommon length of the debate wearied out many of the king's party, which principally consisted of persons advanced in years; for it was at last carried by a small majority of eleven.

When Charles returned from Scotland, he was received at London with shouts and acclamations of the people. This was not at all agreeable to the leaders of the commons; and one of the principal designs of the remonstrance undoubtedly was to efface those favourable sentiments which the citizens were inclined to entertain of the king, and to reconcile them to the commons. It was soon after presented to his majesty, together with a petition, requesting, that the bishops might be deprived of their votes in parliament, that several alterations might be made in the established worship, and that the king would would remove all evil counsellors from his presence. They did not, indeed, name particulars; that was impossible; because all places of power, profit, and confidence, about his person, and in his councils, were filled by men recommended by the commons, and in whom they placed an entire confidence. But the words Religion, Popery, Purity, Malignance, with the unmeaning sounds of Arminianism, and others of a similar kind, reconciled every doubt, and removed every difficulty.

During the king's absence, the commons affected such terror, that they procured a guard from the earl of Essex; but on his return, Essex surrendered his commission, as general on the south of Trent; and Charles had the resolution to order the guard to be discontinued; adding, that his royal presence ought to be a sufficient safety to his parliament.

Soon after the remonstrance of the commons appeared, Charles dispersed an answer to it, though he lay under very great disadvantages in the contest. The only reasons on which he could apologize for his former conduct, were of such a nature, that it would have been imprudent to have urged them at this dangerous crisis. To have blamed the past conduct of the parliament, would have been considered as an affront to the nation; and had he asserted the prerogative of supplying, by his own authority, the deficiencies in government, arising chiefly from the obstinacy of parliaments, he would have increased the clamours which already resounded in every part of the kingdom. He therefore contented himself with observing in general, that even during the period so much and so bitterly complained of, the people enjoyed a large share of happiness, even when compared with the most fortunate periods of English history. He made the warmest professions of sincerity in the reformed religion; promised indulgence to tender consciences, with regard to the ceremonies of the church; enumerated his great concessions to natural liberty; and blamed the infamous libels every where dispersed against his government and the national religion. "You have thrown out (said he) general reproaches with regard to pernicious councils; but ask your own consciences, have I protected any minister from parliamentary justice? Have I retained any unpopular servant, or conferred offices on any one who enjoyed not, in a high degree, the esteem of the public? But if, notwithstanding this, any malignant party shall take heart, and be willing to sacrifice the peace and happiness of their country to their own sinister ends and ambition, under whatever pretence of religion and conscience; if they shall endeavour to lessen my reputation and interest, and to weaken my lawful power and authority; if they shall attempt, by discountenancing the present laws, to loosen the bands of government, that all disorder and confusion may break in upon us; I doubt not but God, in his own good time, will discover them to me; and that the wisdom and courage of my high court of parliament will join with me in their suppression and punishment."

This answer, though the king was obliged to conceal the strongest reasons for his conduct so greatly complained of in the beginning of his reign, and to confine himself within the limits of civility towards subjects who had transgressed all the bounds of regard and good manners, had great effect on the more wise and prudent part of the nation. Even the leaders of the commons themselves were alarmed, and began to fear, that unless they could remove the bishops from the house of lords, they should never succeed in the plan they had projected. They had already attempted this without success, though thirteen of the bishops were impeached of high-treason. Nor could the committee, with all their art, draw up any charge against Laud that would affect either his life or fortune. They, however, renewed their attempts against the bishops with great violence, but without success; the peers thought it highly unreasonable to condemn them before they were proved to be guilty. Exasperated at this, and other instances of opposition they had lately met with from the upper house, particularly by their insisting on taking ten thousand Scots into their pay, the commons appointed a committee "to prepare heads for a conference with the lords, and to acquaint them what bills this house hath passed, and sent up to their lordships, which much concerned the safety of the kingdom, but have had no consent of their lordships to them; and that this house being the representative body of the whole kingdom, and their lordships being but particular persons, and coming to the parliament in a particular capacity; that if they shall not be pleased to consent to the passing of those acts, and others, necessary for the preservation and safety of the kingdom, that then this house, together with such of the lords as are more sensible of the safety of the kingdom, may join together, and represent the same to his majesty. They are likewise to take into consideration some methods for guarding the towns of Hull and Newcastle; and they are for this service to withdraw immediately into the inner court of wards."

It is very difficult, even in this enlightened age, to discover the real intention of this strange resolution. But tares, in this season, grew among the wheat, and a fanatical fury often obscured the reasoning faculty. The public had now acquired a great compass of knowledge with regard to the English constitution; nor were there wanting many great men, who were persuaded that several abuses had crept into the constitution, and could plead no better right to their continuance than prescription. This, in effect, was all the plea the bishops had to offer for their seats in parliament, and which stood on the same foundation with those of the temporal lords. The commons, perhaps, saw how difficult it would be to deprive the bishops of their votes, without affecting the privileges of all the peers; and knew no better expedient for succeeding, than by intimidating the lords into their measures, by asserting a new doctrine, which they afterwards carried into execution: that the original constitution knew no distinct house of parliament, because in these early times all the members sat together in one house, and enjoyed the same powers. If, therefore, the constitution should revert to its first principles, it would be found that the majority in both houses was conclusive upon the whole, by which the majority of the lords alone lost their negative upon the commons. Bold and absurd as this doctrine seemed, the lords knew the spirit of the commons too well to exasperate them: they passed no violent votes on that head, though the resolution carried with it a much stronger violation of the privileges of the peers, than Charles, during his whole reign, had ever committed on those of the commons.

But this violence of the lower house produced a different effect from what it was intended; it operated strongly in favour of the king. They soon perceived it; and in order to avert the consequences, encouraged the lower class of people, and persons incapable of judging for themselves, to present petitions to the house against the bishops' votes in parliament. One was brought up by the London apprentices. But the principal object of their attention was that of wresting from Charles all his power over the military. He had offered to raise ten thousand volunteers for the service of Ireland; but the proposal was rejected under pretence that they were unwilling to trust the king with so large a military force; though the most dreadful accounts and pathetic petitions were every day received from the protestants in Ireland. The Scots thought themselves trifled with, and presented a paper to the commons, insisting upon a categorical answer. It was in vain for Charles to endeavour to quicken the motions of the commons by repeated messages; the time was fruitlessly spent in voting money, that was never paid; in making resolutions, that were never executed; in conferences that had no conclusion, and in debates that had no meaning.

Though the tumultuous assemblies of the lower class of people still continued about Westminster-hall, and the two houses of parliament, yet the popularity of Charles daily increased among the better sort. The common-council of London not only disclaimed publicly their having any share in them, but also presented several dutiful addresses to the king, beseeching him to continue his residence at Whitehall, and assuring him of protection against any who should dare to offer him the least insult. The Scots also, affected to see their king ill used by others; however contumaciously they had treated him themselves, informed him of the correspondence carried on between the chief covenanters and the principal leaders of the house of commons, both before, and during the continuance of the late invasion.

Unfortunately Charles mistook this gleam of compassion for the return of lustre to his reign. He began therefore to act with more spirit and vigour. He discharged Belfour from his government of the Tower, and appointed Lansford in his place, notwithstanding the warm declarations made against it by the commons. But Charles wanted courage to support his nomination; he soon after dismissed Lansford, and gave the command to Sir John Biron. On the eleventh of December, while the house was engaged in warm debates with regard to bishops voting in parliament, the king issued a proclamation for paying obedience to the laws for establishing the true religion in England; and the next day he issued another, commanding all absent members to attend their duty in parliament. These two proclamations, published at such a juncture, gave the commons room to believe, that Charles was meditating some dreadful blow; and their apprehensions were increased when they saw Falkland, Culpepper, Hyde, and several others of the wisest and most popular members in the house, divide against them.

The commons had passed a bill for impressing men for the service of Ireland; in the preamble to which the king's power of impressing, though always practised by former princes, was declared illegal, as contrary to the liberty of the subject. While this bill was debating by the peers, Charles, unwilling to submit to so considerable a diminution of his power, came to the upper house, where he told the lords he was very willing to pass the bill without the preamble, by which means, he observed, that ill-timed question with regard to the prerogative would, for the present, be avoided, and the pretensions of each party remain entire. Both houses took fire at this precipitate measure; and immediately declared it to be a high breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill before it was presented to him for the royal assent. The king soon perceived his error, and made an apology to the parliament.

A. D. 1642. Weary at last of making concessions, which instead of acquiring returns of gratitude, tended only to increase the demands of the commons, Charles unfortunately determined to alter his conduct. He ascribed the insolence of the commons in a great measure to his own indolence and facility, and was unhappily confirmed in this opinion by the queen and ladies of the court; who represented to him, that if he exerted the vigour, and displayed the majesty of a monarch, the daring usurpations of his subjects would shrink before him. Had the king continued in tranquillity, and cautiously eluded, for a little longer, the violence of the tempest now raised against him, the leaders of the opposition would soon have lost their popularity, and also their majority in the house, and the king, in the end, would have certainly prevailed; at least so far as to have preserved entire the ancient laws and constitution of England. But Charles had taken his measures, and lost all the advantages he had gained over the opposition by a single stroke.

Persuaded that he was now capable of giving the final blow to the popularity of the discontented leaders, by producing undoubted evidences of their having invited the Scots to invade England, the king ordered the attorney-general to impeach them of high treason, at the bar of the house of lords. He obeyed his majesty's commands, and presented at the clerk's table in the house of peers, the following accusations:

"Articles of high treason, and other misdemeanors against the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hambden, and Mr. William Strode.

"1. That they have traiterously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of England, to deprive the king of his royal authority, and to place in subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and estates of his majesty's subjects.

"2. That they have traiterously endeavoured, by many foul aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious to them.

"3. That they have endeavoured to draw his majesty's late army to disobedience to his majesty's command, and to side with them in their traiterous designs.

"4. That they have traiterously invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majesty's kingdom of England.

"5. That they have traiterously endeavoured to subvert the rights and very being of parliaments.

"6. That in order to complete their traiterous designs, they have endeavoured, so far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traiterous designs; and to that end had actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament.

"7. And that they have traiterously conspired to levy, and actually have levied war against the king."

After delivering these articles of impeachment, the attorney demanded, in behalf of his master, that the house should appoint a committee of secrecy for examining the king's witnesses; that he should have liberty to add or alter as he pleased; and that the persons he had impeached should be secured.

These precipitate measures of the king astonished the nation. It was madness they said to suppose that the house of lords, however willing, would be permitted by the populace to pass a sentence which must totally subdue the lower house, and put an end to all their undertakings. But their astonishment was increased that a serjeant at arms had been sent to the house of commons, and in his majesty's name, demanded the persons of the five accused members; but was sent back without any positive answer. In the mean time messengers were employed to search for, and arrest them. Their trunks, chambers and studies were sealed up and locked. These proceedings being reported to the commons, they came to the following resolutions.

"That the serjeant at arms be ordered to apprehend and bring hither as delinquents the persons who have sealed up the trunks, or doors, or seized the keys of Mr. Pym, Mr. Hollis, or any other member of this house; and that the serjeant shall have power to break open the doors, and to break the seals off from the trunks.

"That if any person whatsoever shall come to the lodgings of any members of this house and there offer to seal the trunks, doors, or papers of any members, or to seize upon their persons, that such members shall require the aid of the constable, to keep such persons in safe custody, till this house give farther order; and this house doth declare, that if any person whatsoever shall offer to arrest or detain the person of any member without first acquainting this house therewith, and receiving farther order, that it is lawful for such member, or any person assisting him;

him to stand upon his or their guard of defence, and to make resistance according to the protestation taken to defend the privilege of parliament.

Irritated at these proceedings, the king resolved to go the next day in person to the house of commons, and demand the impeached members. But this design was not kept sufficiently secret to answer his majesty's intention. The countess of Carlisle, sister to the earl of Northumberland, discovered it, and sent intelligence to the five members, so that they had time to withdraw a few minutes before the king entered. Charles was attended with his ordinary retinue, amounting to about two hundred men, armed in their usual manner, some with halberts and some with walking swords. He left his attendants in the lobby, and the door being immediately thrown open, he entered the house and advanced to the speaker's chair, all the members standing up to receive him. Charles looked carefully round the house, but not seeing the accused members, he made the following speech to the commons.

"Gentlemen,

"I am sorry for this occasion of coming to you: Yesterday I sent a serjeant at arms to demand some, who, by my order, were accused of high-treason. Instead of obedience, I received a message. I must here declare to you, that though no king that ever was in England could be more careful of your privileges than I shall be, yet, in cases of treason, no person has privilege. Therefore am I come to tell you, that I must have these men wheresoever I can find them. Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect you will send them to me as soon as they return. But I assure you, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a fair and legal way; for I never want any other. And now, since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly, that whatever I have done in favour, and to the good of my subjects, I do intend to maintain it."

It is impossible to describe the disorder into which this imprudent action of Charles threw the house; and even before the king reached the door, some of the members called aloud, "Privilege, Privilege." Immediately after his departure, the house adjourned till the next day; and the five accused members retired into the city, where they were sure of protection. The guards at the gates were immediately doubled, and the greater part of the citizens continued the whole night under arms.

Early the next morning, Charles dispatched a message to the lord mayor, ordering him to call a common council immediately. His commands were obeyed; and about ten o'clock, the king, attended only by three or four lords, repaired to Guildhall, and made the following speech to the common-council.

"Gentlemen,

"I am come to demand such persons as I have already accused of high-treason, and do believe are concealed in the city. I hope no good man will keep them from me; their offences are treasons, and misdemeanors of a very high nature. I desire your loving assistance herein, that they may be brought to a legal trial.

"And whereas there are divers suspicions raised, that I am a favourer of the popish religion, I do profess, in the name of a king, that I did, and ever will, to the utmost of my power, be a prosecutor of all such as shall in any ways oppose the laws and statutes of this kingdom, either papists or separatists; and not only so, but I will maintain and defend that true protestant religion which my father professed, and will continue in it during life."

The lord-mayor and aldermen behaved with very great civility, and attended him to Temple-Bar; but he could not escape the contumelious language of the populace; the cry of "privilege of parliament" resounded from all quarters; and one of the rabble, more insolent and more daring than the rest, advanced almost to the coach door; and called aloud, "To your tents, O Israel;" words used by the rebellious Israelites, when they abandoned their king Rehoboam.

The king had hardly left the city, before a committee of the parliament met at Merchant-Taylor's Hall, doubtless to insinuate, that they did not think themselves safe without the walls of London. This committee was charged with the affairs of Ireland, which, notwithstanding the dreadful situation of the protestants in that kingdom, had been hitherto neglected. A declaration was, soon after their meeting, drawn up, with regard to the late attempt on the privilege of parliament, and afterwards confirmed by the house. It was conceived in the following terms:

"Whereas his majesty, in his royal person, came yesterday to the house of commons, with a great multitude of men, armed in a warlike manner; with halberts, swords, and pistols; who came up to the very door of this house, and placed themselves there, and in other places and passages near to the house, to the great terror and disturbance of the members thereof then sitting, and, according to their duty, in an agreeable and orderly manner, treating of the great affairs of both kingdoms of England and Ireland; and his majesty having placed himself in the speaker's chair, did demand the persons of divers members of that house to be delivered to him."

"It is this day declared by the house of commons, that the same is a high breach of the rights and liberties of parliament, and inconsistent with the liberty and freedom thereof; and therefore the house doth conceive, that they cannot, with safety of their own persons, or the indemnities of the rights and privileges of parliament, sit here any longer, without a full vindication of so high a breach of privilege, and a sufficient guard wherein they may confide, for which both houses jointly, and this house by itself, have been humble suitors to his majesty, and cannot as yet obtain."

This imprudent action of Charles set the nation in a flame. Nothing was now talked of but declarations, votes and remonstrances, against the late flagrant breach of privilege; and several addresses were presented to the king, requesting him to name the persons who had advised him to pursue such alarming measures. Petitions were also sent up from different parts of the kingdom; and, among others, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, represented to his majesty, "That trade is decayed, to the ruin of the protestant religion, and the lives and liberties of the subjects, by the designs of papists; more particularly, by their fomenting the Irish rebellion, by changing the constable of the Tower, by fortifying Whitehall, and his majesty's late invasion of the house of commons. They therefore pray, that by the parliament's advice, the protestants of Ireland may be relieved; the Tower put into the hands of persons of trust; a guard appointed for the safety of the parliament; and that the five members may not be restrained, nor proceeded against, but by the privilege of parliament."

Charles thought proper to return an answer to this petition; in which he observed, "that it was impossible for him to express a greater sense of Ireland than he had done; that, merely to satisfy the city, he had removed a very worthy person from his command in the Tower; and that the late tumults had rendered it absolutely necessary for him to fortify Whitehall for the security of his own person: that his going to the house of commons was to apprehend those five members for high-treason, to which the privilege of parliament could not extend; but that he never intended to proceed against them any otherwise than by legal methods only."

During the continuance of the tumults of the populace in the neighbourhood of Whitehall, several reduced officers and young gentlemen from the inns of court offered their service to his majesty, to protect his his person, in this time of danger and disorder, from the insolence of the multitude. Frequent skirmishes passed between them and the populace, which sometimes ended in blood. These gentlemen, by way of reproach, called the rabble "Roundheads," on account of their wearing their hair cropt short; and the others gave them the name of "Cavaliers." Thus the two factions, which had so long divided the nation, were now distinguished by party names, under which they might rendezvous, and signalize that mutual hatred they had conceived for each other.

This did not at all tend to quiet the people. Exasperated by opposition, and inflamed by the artful harangues of their leaders, the popular tumults every day increased; and the king thinking himself and family in danger, determined to remove from Whitehall, and take up his residence at Hampton-Court. His friends, who were best acquainted with the nature of popular insurrections, particularly those of the lower class in London, exerted all their influence to prevail upon the king to lay aside his design. They observed, that a little firmness would be sufficient to dissipate the storm raised by an artful faction: that if the king would remain in his palace, and his friends return to their seats in parliament, the giddy populace must soon spend their rage, and the affairs of government resume their natural order. But all their reasonings were in vain: Charles, after dismissing the guard that attended at Whitehall, removed, with his whole family, to Hampton-court, on the tenth of January.

Two days after, he sent a message to the commons, in which he proposed, that they should agree upon a legal method, by which he might carry on his prosecution against the members, lest farther misunderstandings happen with regard to privileges. In their answer, they desired the king to lay the grounds of his accusation before the house, pretending that they must first judge whether it would be proper to abandon their members to a legal trial. In a subsequent message, Charles informed them, that he was willing, for the present, to waive all prosecution; and, by another, he offered pardon to the members; offered to concur in any law that should acquit or secure them; offered any reparation for the breach of privileges, of which he acknowledged they had reason to complain. But the commons were determined to accept of no satisfaction, unless he would name the persons who advised him to pursue that illegal method; a condition which they well knew he must refuse.

But though the commons were deaf to all the offers made them by his majesty, the distress to which himself and his family were reduced, excited the compassion of the wiser part of the nation. They were alarmed at the furious proceedings of the commons: no person seemed to be safe, as it could not be known what they would, or what they would not vote to be treason. It soon appeared that they were determined to strike a terror into every person who should venture either to speak his mind, or to do his duty. They allowed the attorney-general but one night to prepare for justifying his conduct with regard to his accusing the five members; and after many captious questions, which he could not answer without breaking his oath of secrecy, they voted him guilty of a high crime, and addressed the lords to secure his person till they could bring him to an open trial. It appears, however, that the true design of these proceedings against the attorney-general was to discover the names of the witnesses whom the king could produce against the accused members; but in this they were disappointed by the attorney's firmness. Had they succeeded in their intention, it might, perhaps, have proved still more favourable to Charles; as it is more than probable, that he had both his information and proofs from the Scots, who would then have been obliged to declare in his favour; and they seem themselves to have been apprehensive of this, for the Scottish parliament ordered their commissioners to mediate a peace between the king and his parliament.

The accused members, who had hitherto affected to remain in the city, now returned in triumph to Westminster. The Thames was covered with boats and other vessels, mounted with small pieces of ordnance, and prepared for battle. Skippon, whom the commons, by their own authority, had appointed major-general of the city militia, conducted the members, at the head of a tumultuous army, to Westminster. When the populace, both by land and water, passed by Whitehall, they asked, in a very insulting manner, "What was become of the king and his cavaliers? and whether they were fled?"

It was now sufficiently evident, from the proceedings of both parties, that the sword alone could decide the contest. Charles, however, was still desirous of averting the horrors of a civil war; and accordingly sent a message to the parliament, desiring, "that they would digest into one body all the grievances of the kingdom, and to send them to him, promising his favourable assent to those means which should be thought most effectual for redress." But this request was refused: the commons pretended they were too much engaged in matters of far greater consequence, to allow them time sufficient for that purpose.

These concessions were surely sufficient to have quieted the apprehensions of men who were desirous of peace. But the leaders of the party had so invincible a distrust of Charles, that they put no confidence in his promises; and were persuaded that nothing less than wresting all power from his hand would be sufficient for their safety. He, however, stood at present fairer in the eye of the public than they. He had taken away, by his messages and concessions, all the points controverted between them. New ones were therefore started. They desired him to put the Tower of London, all the forts, and the whole militia of the kingdom, into such hands as they could trust. Charles agreed to give the command of the Tower to Sir John Coniers, instead of Sir John Biron, though the latter had done nothing to merit his discharge; but he absolutely refused their request with regard to the militia.

Charles had removed to Windsor, and began to make dispositions against providing for events which he now saw no prospect of avoiding. He perceived that the intention of the parliament was to secure the magazines in the Tower of London, Hull, and Portsmouth; and even their addresses to him had hinted something of that kind. He had given private orders to the duke of Newcastle to secure Hull; but the design being discovered by the treachery of some about his person, the house of commons insisted on his attending his duty in parliament; and ordered Sir John Horham, a gentleman of great estate in that neighbourhood, to take care of the place for the parliament. At the same time, they passed a vote, that the governor of Portsmouth should admit no person into that fortress, nor suffer any part of the ordnance or military stores to be disposed of, without an order from the king signified by both houses of parliament.

These proceedings were by many considered as a dissolution of the regal government; especially as the commons had taken upon themselves, not only to dispose of the militia and trained bands of the capital, but to name lord lieutenants of several counties; and even the captains that were appointed to command the ships of war. The duke of Richmond was highly exasperated at these proceedings; and made a motion in the house of peers to adjourn for six months; but his motion was over-ruled, he was slightly censured for his conduct, and a protest was entered by those lords who were friends to the commons, because, as they pretended, his punishment was not adequate to his crime. So dangerous was it to oppose the current of popular fury, whatever unconstitutional methods were made use of to effect it!

Richmond was a nobleman of great spirit, nearly related to the king, and in possession of a very large estate. The leaders of the commons therefore thought it necessary to point him out as an object of popular resentment. They procured an attested copy of the protest, and resolved, "that the house had sufficient cause to accuse him of being one of the malignant party, and an ill counsellor to his majesty." Sir Ralph Hopton also felt the weight of their resentment. He had been one of the most strenuous declaimers against the real grievances of his country; but was persuaded the concessions made by the king were more than sufficient for reforming the government, and placing the liberties of the subject on a basis not to be shaken: He therefore opposed the proceedings of the house with great force of reason, and sometimes with indecent expressions, similar to those that had been used by many of the leaders against their sovereign. But the very words that had been applauded when uttered against majesty, were censured when they were directed against the leaders of the commons. His speeches were declared malignant, and he himself committed to the Tower.

Charles saw the proceedings of the commons with astonishment, and began to be anxious for the personal safety of his wife and children, whom he loved with the most tender affection. It was therefore resolved to send them to Holland, where they would be beyond the reach of their inveterate enemies. His eldest daughter, the princess Mary, had been lately married to the prince of Orange, who now greatly interested himself in favour of a monarch reduced to the greatest distress. Charles accordingly repaired to Dover, where they embarked for the continent. While the king was employed in providing for the safety of his family, the commons presented to him a bill for disposing of the militia, or rather putting it entirely into the hands of the parliament. The lower house had been so accustomed to insult the personal character of the king, that the very preambles to their bills presented to him for the royal assent, were generally conceived in the most contumelious language. This with regard to the militia was remarkable; it was as follows: "Whereas there has been of late a most dangerous and desperate design upon the house of commons, which we have just cause to believe an effect of the bloody counsels of papists and other ill affected persons, who have already raised a rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland. And whereas by reason of many discoveries, we cannot but fear they will proceed, not only to stir up the like rebellions and insurrections in this kingdom of England; but also to back them with forces from abroad, &c."

Charles was weary of making concessions, and now determined to change his conduct. He did not, however, absolutely refuse the royal assent, but replied, that he was not sufficiently at leisure to consider a matter of such importance, and therefore they must wait till his return for a positive answer. Alarmed at this delay, the parliament instantly dispatched another message to the king, pressing him for an immediate answer. They represented that when dangers and distractions prevailed, a delay was of equal consequence with a denial; that it was their duty to see a measure so necessary to the safety of the public carried into execution; that the people in many parts of the kingdom had applied to them for that purpose, in the most earnest manner; and that in some places, the inhabitants were so alarmed at their present dangers, that they had exerted their own authority in preparing for their defence.

Charles had already passed a bill for depriving the bishops of their votes in parliament, and hoped his compliance in that particular would have prevented their making any farther demands. He was mistaken; and now perceived that the commons were not to be satisfied, while any power remained in the crown. The king did not, however, think proper to give the commons an absolute denial; but desired that if the military authority was in any part defective, it might be conferred on the crown; promising at the same time, that he would immediately give commissions to such persons only as the parliament should name. But this was far from satisfying the commons. They replied, that the dangers of the kingdom were so pressing as to admit of no longer delay; and that if his majesty refused to satisfy his people, they would do it by their own authority. But though they had recourse to menaces, where they found persuasions had no effect, they did not chuse as yet to pull off the mask, but pretended the greatest sorrow at his majesty's leaving the capital, and earnestly pressed him to return, and fix his residence at Whitehall. The king was astonished at this message, and made the following answer to the committee who delivered it.

"I am so much amazed at this message, that I know not what to answer. You speak of jealousies and fears! Lay your hands upon your hearts, and ask yourselves, whether I may not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies; and if so, I assure you, this message has nothing lessened them. As to the militia, I thought so much of it before I gave that answer, and am so much assured, that the answer is agreeable to what in justice or reason you can ask, or I in honour grant, that I shall not alter it in any point.

"For my residence near you, I wish it might be safe and honourable, and that I had no cause to absent myself from Whitehall: ask yourselves whether I have not.

"What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to pass any bill for the ease and security of my subjects? I do not ask what you have done for me.

"Have any of my people been transported with fears and apprehensions? I offer as free and general a pardon as you yourselves can devise. All this considered, there is a judgment of heaven upon this nation, if these distractions continue.

"God so deal with me and mine as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of of the protestant religion, and for the observance and preservation of the laws; and I hope God will bless and assist those laws for my preservation."

The commons declared that the king's answer was a refusal; that those whose counsels he followed were enemies to the state; that if he persisted in his resolution, he would expose the safety of the three kingdoms to the utmost danger, unless the parliament provided some remedy; and that they approved the conduct of those who had already put themselves in a posture of defence.

But notwithstanding this they were greatly alarmed, especially when it was known that his majesty intended to visit the northern parts of his kingdom, and to make the city of York the place of his residence. As soon as the king reached Huntingdon, he sent a message to the commons, upbraiding them for their conduct with regard to the affairs of Ireland, and informing them, "that he expected an equal tenderness in them with regard to his majesty's known unquestionable privileges, among which he is sure it is a fundamental one, that his subjects cannot be obliged to obey any act, order, or injunction to which his majesty hath not given his consent; and therefore he thinks it necessary to publish, that he expects, and hereby requires obedience from all his loving subjects to the laws established, and that they presume not, on any pretence of order or ordinance, to which his majesty is no party, concerning the militia, or any other things to do or execute what is not warranted by those laws; his majesty being resolved to keep the laws himself, and to require obedience to them from all his subjects.

"And his majesty recommends to his parliament, what he had before required, that they should compose and digest as soon as possible, such acts as they shall shall think fit, for the present and future establishment of their privileges, and the free and quiet enjoyment of their estates and fortunes, the liberties of their persons, the security of the true religion now professed in the church of England; the maintaining of his majesty's regal and just authority, and the settling of his revenue; his majesty being very desirous to take all fitting and just ways, which may beget a happy understanding between him and his parliament, in which he conceives his greatest power and riches consist."

This message threw the house into a new ferment. They resolved to insist upon their former resolutions concerning the militia; they voted severe penalties against all who had advised the king to give that answer; and resolved upon the question, "that when the lords and commons in parliament, which is the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom, shall declare what the law of the land is; to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament."

Charles was now less afraid of their insolence. He had reached York; and finding the people faithful to him, he determined firmly to oppose the attempts of the parliament with regard to the militia. On the contrary, the commons, resolved to support the power they had usurped, in contempt of all laws, appointed lord lieutenants to the different counties, gave them the command of the militia, the garrisons, and all the forts in the kingdom; obliging them to obey his majesty's orders signified to them by both houses; that is, the orders of parliament, signified in the king's name, with an intent to dethrone him. Manifestos, the forerunners of civil wars, were published on both sides. Those of the king carried with them a force of evidence; which was only opposed by invectives. A detail of the sacrifices and concessions he had made, and of the violences and insults which had been their only reward, gave an appearance of justice to his cause. Confiding in the strength of his arguments, the king was desirous that the declarations of the parliament might be distributed with his own; while the parliament was very industrious to suppress the king's papers. Lord Falkland, secretary of state, and Mr. Hyde, afterwards lord Clarendon, were the authors of the papers in behalf of the king. In these the English constitution was defined with great precision; the three species of government, the monarchical, the aristocratical, and the democratical, were distinguished; and the government of England shewn to be a compound of the whole, each tempering the other.

The parliament could not answer the facts brought by the king, to convince the world that he had done all that could be required of him to give them satisfaction. But they pretended, that the king, even while he was making his concessions, was contriving the means to destroy them. Had they been able to prove this assertion; had they been able to have brought any other evidences for it than a few frivolous facts, many improbable suspicions, and more groundless fears; could they have shewn any recent instances of the king's violating his concessions, or even of appearing backward to grant any thing farther, if they should be found consistent with the safety and constitution of the kingdom; they might have been justified in some part of their harsh treatment of majesty. But nothing of that kind appears, even after the strained constructions which the two houses put upon the least indiscreet action or word of every imprudent friend of the king; and the journals of the house at this time are filled with inquiries, proceedings, and severities, which would disgrace not only the barbarous, but the irrational part of mankind. Charles had denied them nothing but the militia, which the constitution had confessedly lodged in his hands; and which they endeavoured to wrest from him, under pretence of extraordinary dangers. It may here be observed, that the very question returned against themselves, which, but a few months before, they had so solemnly determined against Charles. He had attempted to levy ship-money, and other illegal taxes, under pretence of danger, of which he was the sole judge. The parliament denied that this danger was sufficiently imminent to warrant an arbitrary exercise of power; and therefore they voted his proceedings to be illegal. In the same manner, the parliament now demanded the militia, under pretence of extraordinary and imminent dangers. The king refused to gratify them, because he did not apprehend these dangers to be sufficiently alarming, as to warrant them to require from him a surrender of the real part of regal authority, which had been vested in him by the constitution.

The arms of all the forces levied against the Scots had been deposited in the magazine of Hull; and Sir John Hotham, the governor, had accepted a commission from the parliament, but was thought to be no enemy either to the church or monarchy. These circumstances induced Charles to believe, that if he proceeded in person to the gates of that town, before the commencement of hostilities, the governor, overawed by his presence, would admit him with his ordinary retinue, by which means he might easily become master of so important a place. He was, however, mistaken. Hotham had received strict orders from the parliament to be upon his guard; so that when Charles appeared before the place, the governor sent him a very respectful message, desiring his majesty not to approach nearer to the town, but the king continuing to advance, he ordered the bridge to be drawn up, and the garrison to appear on the walls in a posture of resistance. When Charles was near enough for his voice to be heard by the garrison, he called for Hotham, and demanded entrance; which the governor refused, declaring, that he had received his trust from the parliament. Charles was in no condition to attack the place; and therefore repeated his demand, offering to reduce his train to twenty persons. This was also denied; and the king perceiving that the governor was determined to defend the place, he retired, after proclaiming Sir John Hotham a traitor by two heralds at arms. He afterwards complained to the parliament of the disobedience of the governor; but was so far from obtaining redress, that they justified the action.

The increasing inclinations of the inhabitants of Yorkshire for the royal cause, greatly alarmed the parliament. They had raised a guard of six hundred men for his person, and seemed determined to assist him to the utmost of their power. The parliament, though they had already levied a guard for themselves; had attempted to seize the whole military power, the navy, and all the forts of the kingdom; yet they immediately voted, "that the king, seduced by wicked counsels, intended to make war against his parliament, who, in all their consultations and actions, had proposed no other end but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person: that this attempt was a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to a dissolution of the government; and that whoever should assist him in such a war, were traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom."

Every thing now hastened towards a crisis. The parliament appointed the earl of Essex general of their forces; and the ardour was so great among the people in the capital, that no less than four thousand men enlisted in one day. At the same time, the parliament voted a declaration, which they required every member to subscribe, that they would live and die with their general. Orders were issued for bringing in loans of money, in order to maintain the forces levied to defend the parliament: and the zeal of the people was, in this particular, more remarkable than in their enlisting under Essex; for during ten days, the throng was so great, that the persons appointed to receive the offerings of the populace had neither time nor room sufficient for the purpose.

many of them were therefore obliged to carry back their treasures, till a more convenient opportunity, when the commissioners would be at leisure to receive them.

But though the parliament was thus supported by the voluntary offerings of the people, they were totally eclipsed by the splendid appearance of the nobility, who flocked to the king at York. Above forty peers of the highest rank in the kingdom attended upon Charles, among whom was the lord-keeper Littleton; while the house of lords at Westminster seldom consisted of more than sixteen members, and even some of these were of the royal party, and constantly opposed the measures of the commons. The king issued commissions of array all over the kingdom, but the execution of them was voted treasonable by the parliament. They were, however, greatly astonished and alarmed, when they perceived so large and respectable a part of the kingdom had declared for the king. This produced a new set of propositions, on which they were willing to come to an agreement. Their demands were as follows:

1. That the officers of the crown, the ministers of state, and the governors of all the ports and forts of the kingdom, should be chosen and approved of by the two houses, or by the council in the intervals of parliament.
2. That no places shall be given for life; but that those on whom they should be bestowed, may hold them no longer than they discharge their duty well.
3. That the two houses, and the council, shall name the person unto whom the government and education of the king's children shall be committed.
4. That no marriage shall be concluded, or treated, for any of the king's children, without the consent of parliament.
5. That the laws against Jesuits, and other secular priests, and in general against all papists, shall be strictly put in execution, without any toleration or dispensation whatsoever.
6. That the popish lords be expelled from the house of peers, and their children taken from them, in order to their being brought up in the protestant religion.
7. That such a reformation be made of the liturgy and church government, as both houses of parliament, with the advice of divines, shall advise.
8. That the king shall rest satisfied with the method taken by the parliament for settling the militia.
9. That a strict alliance be entered into with the states of the United Provinces, and other neighbouring princes and states of the protestant religion, against the pope and his adherents.
10. That the five impeached members be cleared by act of parliament, and restored to their rights, that future parliaments may be secured from the consequence of that bad example.
11. That peers made hereafter be restrained from sitting and voting in parliament, without the consent of both houses.
12. That the military forces now attending the king be discharged.
13. That the lords and others of the privy-council, and others in offices and employments, be removed, except such only as shall be approved by both houses of parliament; and that the persons made choice of to fill their places and employments, may be approved of by both houses of parliament; and that the privy counsellors shall take an oath for the due execution of their places, in such form as shall be approved of by the parliament.
14. That the great affairs of the kingdom shall not be concluded nor transacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unsworn counsellors; but that such matters as concern the public, and are proper for the high court of parliament, shall be debated, resolved, and transacted only in parliament; and such as shall presume to do any thing to the contrary, shall be reserved to the censure and judgment of parliament; and such other matters of state as are proper for the privy-council, shall be debated and concluded by such of the nobility and others as shall, from time to time, be chosen to fill that board, by approbation of both houses of parliament; and that no public act, concerning the affairs of the kingdom, which is proper for the privy-council, shall be esteemed of any validity, as proceeding from the royal authority, unless it be done with the advice and consent of the major part of the council, attested under their hands; that the council shall be limited to a certain number, not exceeding twenty-five, nor under fifteen; and if any counsellor's place happen to be vacant, it shall not be supplied without the assent of the major part of the council, which choice shall be confirmed at the next sitting of parliament, or else be void.

15. That the lord high-steward of England, the lord high constable, the lord chancellor, or keeper of the great seal, the lord treasurer, the lord privy-seal, the earl marshal, the lord admiral, the warden of the cinque ports, the chief governor of Ireland, the chancellor of the exchequer, the master of the wards, the several secretaries of state, the two chief justices and chief baron, shall always be chosen with the approbation of both houses of parliament; and in the intervals of parliament, by the assent of the major part of the council, in the same manner as is before expressed in the choice of counsellors.

16. That such members of either house of parliament, as, during this present parliament, have been put out of any place or office, shall either be restored, or otherwise have satisfaction upon the petition of such house of which they are members.

17. That all privy-counsellors and judges shall take an oath, the form whereof shall be agreed upon and settled by act of parliament, for maintaining the petition of right, and of certain statutes made by this parliament, which shall be mentioned by both houses; and that an inquiry of all breaches and violations of those laws shall be given in charge by the justices of the king's bench every term, and by the judges of assize in their circuits, and justices of the peace at the sessions, to be presented and punished according to law.

18. That the justice of parliament shall pass upon all delinquents, whether they be within the kingdom or in foreign parts; and that all persons cited by either house of parliament shall appear, and abide the censure of parliament.

19. That a general pardon shall be granted, with such exceptions as shall be advised by both houses of parliament.

It could not be expected that these demands would ever be complied with. No subjects had ever talked in so high a strain since Henry III. was in the power of the Mountforts. They had, indeed, so changed every part of the constitution, that it scarce retained any vestige of its former state, except the name of a king at the head of a republic. "Should I grant these demands," said the king in his reply, "I may be waited on bareheaded, I may have my hand kissed, the title of majesty may be continued to me, and The king's authority, signified by both houses, may be still the style of your commands; I may have swords and maces carried before me, and please myself with the sight of a crown and sceptre, (though even these twigs would not long flourish, when the stock upon which they grew was dead): but as to true and real power, I should remain but the outside, but the picture, but the sign of a king."

Nor did Charles content himself with refusing the demands of the parliament. He retorted their accusations with great force; and, in a very spirited answer, exhibited his charge against the commons. "If the parliament (said he) had unseasonably vented such propositions, as the wisdom and modesty of their predecessors never thought fit to offer to any of our progenitors; nor we in honour, or regard to our legal authority, which God hath intrusted us with for the good of our people, could receive without just indignation, and such many of their propositions are, their hopes would soon have been “ blasted; and those persons to whom offices, honours, power, and commands were designed, by such ill-timing their business, would have failed of their expectation; not without a brand upon the attempt. Therefore, before any thing of this nature should appear, they have (certainly with great wisdom in the conduct of it) thought fit to remove a troublesome rub in their way, I mean, the law; and, in order to undermine the very foundations of it, a new power hath been assumed, to interpret and declare laws, without us, by extemporary votes, without any cause judicially before either house, (which is, in effect, the same thing as to make laws without us) orders and ordinances made only by both houses, were pressed upon the people as laws, and their obedience required to them.

“ Their next step was to erect an upstart power without us, in whom, and only in whom, the laws of this realm have placed that power, to command the militia. And to promote this design, they have wrested from us our magazine and town of Hull, and abetted Sir John Hotham in his barefaced treason. They have prepared and directed to the people unprecedented invectives against our government, to weaken, as much as lay in their power, our just authority, and due esteem among them: they have, as injuriously as presumptively, (though we conceive by this time impudence itself is ashamed of it) attempted to cast upon us aspersions of an unheard of nature, as if we had favoured a rebellion in our own bowels. They have likewise broached a new doctrine, that we are obliged to pass all laws that shall be offered to us by both houses, however our judgment and conscience shall be unsatisfied with them; a point of policy as proper for their present business, as destructive to all our rights of parliament; and so, with strange shamelessness, will forget a clause in law, still in force, made in the second year of Henry V. wherein both houses of parliament acknowledge, that it is of the king's regality to grant or deny such of their petitions as pleaseth himself. They have interpreted our necessary guard, legally assembled, for the defence of us, and of our children's persons, against a traitor in open rebellion, to be with intent to levy war against our parliament, the thought whereof our very soul abhors, thereby to render us odious to our people.

“ They have to awe our good subjects with pursuivants, long chargeable attendance, heavy censures, and illegal imprisonments, that few of them durst offer to present their tenderness of our sufferings, their own just grievances, and their sense of those violations of the law, the birthright of every subject of this kingdom, though in an humble petition directed to both houses; and if any did, it was stifled in the birth, called sedition, and burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

“ They have restrained the attendance of our ordinary household servants, and seized upon those small sums of money which our credit had provided to buy us bread, with injunctions that none should be suffered to be returned or conveyed to us at York, or to any of our peers or servants with us; so that, in effect, they have blocked us up in that county.

“ They have filled the ears of the people with the noise of fears and jealousies, though taken up upon trust, tales of skippers, salt fleets, and such like; in order by which alarms to prepare them to receive such impressions as might best advance this design when it should be brought to maturity; and now it seems they think we are sufficiently prepared for these bitter pills. We are in a handsome posture to receive these humble desires, which probably are intended to make way for a superfection of a yet higher nature, if we had not made this discovery, for they do not tell us this is all. In them we must observe, that these contrivers, the better to advance their true ends, disguised, as much as “ possible, their intentions, with a mixture of some things really to be approved by every honest man; and some which were already granted by us; all which are artfully blended with those other things of their main design of ambition and private interest; in hopes that, at the first view, every eye may not so clearly discern them in their proper colours.”

The sword of civil discord was now drawn, and both parties made preparations for deciding by it the dreadful contest. Hambden, Whitlocke, Mainyard, Grimstone, St. John, and Selden, accepted of the parliament's commissions; under the ordinance of militia, but the great weight of landed interest declared for the king. Charles was furnished by his queen with money, which she had borrowed upon her jewels; but the parliament had a much surer resource in public credit, upon which great sums were raised by way of loan; and small skirmishes passed between the royal and parliamentary parties in different parts of England.

The house of peers had hitherto shewn a spirit becoming so august a body. But the greater number of the lords were now with the king; some of them were reduced by the authority of Essex, and the leading members of the commons; some were intimidated by the danger to which their persons were exposed by the insolence of the populace; some by the threats of the commons to annihilate their order; some were influenced by resentment; and some by principle; so that upon the whole there was not a party sufficient, in their house, to stem the dreadful torrent that was now ready to rush upon the constitution. The venerable earl of Bristol, disdaining the ignoble motives of resentment for the usage he had met with from the king, in a very pathetic, but ineffectual speech, exposed the impending calamities of England, and exhorted them to conclude a peace with the king on honourable terms. But his advice, however prudent and salutary, produced not the desired effect; the parliament were determined to push the advantage they enjoyed over the king to the utmost extremity. Hollis, by order of the house of commons, demanded at the bar of the lords, the names of those peers who had refused to comply with the ordinance for the militia, and made an ungenerous use of the discovery. The names of those as were known to be well affected to the king were published; by which means they were insulted by the populace, and could not attend their duty in parliament without being exposed to the utmost danger; while those who had the courage to join his majesty were branded with the opprobrious title of “ betrayers of the liberties of their country.” The commons likewise voted, that all horses sent to the north, without an order from the parliament, should be seized and secured. At the same time they voted nine of the lords incapable of ever again sitting in parliament.

The last resolution produced a surprizing alacrity among the nobility now with the king. They signed a paper, “ that they would obey no orders or commands whatever, but such as were warranted by the known laws of the land; that they would defend the king's person, crown, and dignity, together with his majesty's just and legal prerogative, against all persons and power whatsoever; that they would defend the true protestant religion, established by the law of the land, the lawful liberties of the subject of England, and the just privileges of his majesty, and both houses of parliament; and that they would obey no rule, order, or ordinance whatsoever, that had not the royal assent.” Animated by these assurances of support, Charles having collected a few forces, advanced to the southward; and, on his arrival at Nottingham, he erected his royal standard, the open signal of discord and civil war throughout the nation.

Never perhaps was quarrel more unequal than that between the two contending parties; when Charles erected his standard, almost every advantage lay against the royal cause. The parliament were masters of the royal revenues, the fleet, the sea-ports, and all the magazines of arms and ammunition. The king was destitute of almost every advantage: He had neither arms nor ammunition except what belonged to the trained bands in the counties favourable to his interest, and a small supply sent him by his queen from Holland. It is therefore no wonder that the parliament entertained the most sovereign contempt for all the efforts they imagined the king was capable of making in support of his prerogative; many imagined that he would not even attempt to make any resistance, but must at last yield to the pretensions, however enormous, of the two houses. To this persuasion Charles owed his safety. Even after his standard was erected, the danger of a civil war was not, in general, apprehended; nor was it imagined he would have the imprudence to engage his implacable enemies, and render his own condition still more desperate, by opposing a force so greatly superior to his own. These hopes were confirmed by the low condition of his army, if indeed his few forces deserved that name, when he appeared at Nottingham. His train of artillery, though far from being large, he had been obliged to leave behind him at York, for want of horses to draw it. The troops of the parliament, consisting of above six thousand men, well armed and well appointed, lay at Northampton, under the command of the earl of Essex, within a few days march of him, and seemed to threaten him with inevitable destruction.

Charles himself was alarmed at his melancholy situation, and determined to make one more effort for concluding a peace with his parliament. He accordingly sent a message to the two houses, by the earls of Southampton and Dorset, Sir John Culpepper, and Sir William Uvedale. He proposed to open a negotiation immediately, in order to conclude a treaty of peace. He assured them, that nothing on his part should be wanting to advance the true protestant religion, oppose popery and superstition, secure the laws of the kingdom, confirm all the just power and privileges of parliament, and render both king and people happy. "Bring with you (added he) as firm resolutions to do your duty, and let all our people join with us in our prayers to Almighty God, for his blessing upon this work."

Charles then, in a very pathetic manner, disclaimed all intention of injuring the liberties of his people; and laid the guilt at the door of the parliament, if they refused his offers. But the commons, instead of joining with the king in his proposals for restoring the public tranquillity, reproached him with having erected his royal standard; and refused to open any negotiation, unless he would recall all his proclamations published against them. Even this answer did not exasperate Charles to make use of any indecent expressions; he offered to take down his standard, and recall his proclamations, provided they would recall the papers they had published against him and his friends. This was absolutely refused; they would agree to no terms, unless he would immediately take down his standard, and recall his proclamations, without their acting a reciprocal part. But this negotiation, unsuccessful as it was, did Charles the greatest service. The parliament had treated the king's messengers with the utmost indignity; they had not even paid the common civility to their persons. At the same time, they ordered all their officers to repair to their respective posts immediately, and published the following declaration to vindicate their conduct.

"Whereas his majesty, in his message, requires, that the parliament should revoke their declarations against such persons as had assisted his majesty in this unnatural war against his kingdom; it is this day ordered and declared by the lords and commons, that the arms which they have been forced to take up, for the preservation of the parliament, the religion, the laws, and the liberties of the kingdom, shall not be laid down till his majesty shall withdraw his protection from such persons as

"have been voted by both houses to be delinquents, and shall leave them to the justice of the parliament, to be proceeded with according to their demerits; to the end, that both this and succeeding generations may take warning, how they incur the like heinous crimes; and also to the end that those great charges and damages, wherewith all the commonwealth have been burthened since his majesty's departure from the parliament, may be borne by the delinquents and other malignant and disaffected persons; and that all his majesty's good and well-affected subjects, who by loan of monies, or otherwise at their charge, have assisted the commonwealth, or shall in like manner hereafter assist the commonwealth in time of extreme danger, may be repaid all sums of money lent by them for those purposes, out of the estates of the said delinquents, and of the malignant and disaffected party in the kingdom."

This declaration, together with several other papers that passed between the king and his parliament, turned the tide of popular affection strongly in favour of the king. This was perceived by the parliament, and rendered them cautious of offering violence to their sovereign; and, perhaps, to this single consideration the king owed his present safety, which was now considered as so precarious, that Sir Jacob Astley, whom the king had appointed major-general of his army, told him, that he could not give him assurance but he might be taken out of his bed, should the rebels make a brisk attempt for that purpose. It was therefore determined to leave Nottingham; and the king accordingly began his march for Shrewsbury, the most convenient town in England for the rendezvous of his army. Every hour during his march added considerable accessions to his strength, the people flocking from all parts to join the royal standard. On his arrival at Wellington, Charles ordered his army to be drawn up, ranged in several divisions under proper officers, and his military orders to be published at the head of each regiment. This being finished, Charles addressed his army in the following terms:

"Gentlemen,
"You have heard those orders read: it is your part, in your several places, to observe them exactly. The time cannot be long before we come to action, therefore you have the more reason to be careful; and I must tell you, I shall be very severe in the punishing of those, of what condition soever, who shall transgress these instructions. I cannot suspect your courage and resolution; your conscience and your loyalty have brought you hither, to fight for your religion, your king, and the laws of the land. You shall meet with no enemies but traitors, most of them brownists, anabaptists, and atheists; such who desire to destroy both church and state, and who have already condemned you to ruin for being loyal to us. That you may see what use I mean to make of your valour, if it please God to bless us with success, I have thought fit to publish my resolution to you, in a protestation, which, when you have heard me make, you will believe you cannot fight in a better quarrel; in which I promise to live and die with you."

"I do promise, in the presence of Almighty God, and as I hope for his blessing and protection, that I will, to the utmost of my power, defend and maintain the true reformed protestant religion; established in the church of England; and by the grace of God, in the same will live and die."

"I desire to govern by all the known laws of the land; and that the liberty and property of the subject may be preserved by them with the same care as my own just rights. And if it please God, by his blessing upon this army, raised for my necessary defence, to preserve me from the present rebellion; I do solemnly and faithfully promise, in the sight of God, to maintain the just privileges

"and

“ and freedom of parliament, and to govern to the utmost of my power by the known laws of the kingdom; and particularly to observe inviolably the laws to which I have given my consent in this parliament. In the mean while, if this time of war, and the great necessity to which I am now driven to, beget any violation of law, I hope it will be imputed, by God and man, to the authors of this war, and not to me, who have so earnestly laboured for the preservation of the peace of the kingdom.

“ When I willingly fail in these particulars, I shall expect no aid or relief from man; nor protection from above. But in this resolution, I hope for the cheerful assistance of all good men, and am confident of the blessing of heaven.”

This speech and protestation produced amazing effects. The whole army was animated with fresh spirits; they promised to live and die with their sovereign; they now considered him not only as the father, but the guardian of his country. His cause became so popular, that the town of Shrewsbury declared in his favour, by which he acquired a communication with all North Wales, and other places beyond the Severn. The king had now learned in the school of adversity, the useful lessons of complaisance, affability, and other popular arts, which he practised with infinite success. He erected a mint at Shrewsbury, and the nobility and gentry of his party poured in money and plate with as much zeal, tho' not in such large quantities, as the Londoners had done to the parliament. He had stooped to many other measures, which nothing but his necessities could justify, for raising money, and his troops were as regularly paid, as those of the parliament, and as little burthen some to the country. The people were charmed to see the alteration made in the king, with regard to his address and behaviour. In all his excursions and marches, he repeated to his people his tenderness for their laws and liberties, and his resolution rather to die than infringe them. This behaviour gained the hearts of the populace; they flocked to his standard, and his army now amounted to ten thousand men.

At the first appearance of the commotions in England, the two princes Rupert and Maurice, sons to the unfortunate Palatine, offered their service to the king, and the former now commanded a body of horse, which had been detached to Worcester, in order to watch the motions of Essex, who was then on his march towards that city. Rupert had hardly reached Worcester, before he saw a body of the enemy's cavalry approaching the gates. He immediately attacked them with the utmost fury. The dispute was very obstinate, till colonel Sandys, who commanded the parliament's detachment, being mortally wounded, they gave way, and were totally routed by the royal party. This action, though inconsiderable in itself, tended greatly to raise the spirits of the king's forces, and acquired prince Rupert a considerable share of reputation.

It was now determined to march to meet the parliament's army, and if possible decide the quarrel by a general battle. The royal forces were commanded by the earl of Lindesey, who had served many years in the Low Countries with great applause: prince Rupert commanded the horse: Sir Jacob Astley the foot: Sir Arthur Aston the dragoons: Sir John Heydon the artillery: and lord Bernard Stuart a troop of guards. Lord Clarendon tells that the estate and revenues of this single troop, was at least equal to that of all the lords and commons, who remained in the parliament at Westminster. Nor will this appear improbable when it is considered, that both houses were now remarkably thin; the commons often voting matters of the greatest moment, when not more than forty-five or fifty members sat in the house.

The king left Shrewsbury on the twelfth of October, and in order to bring on a battle with the army of Essex, pursued his march towards the capital with great expedition. This alarmed the parliament so much, that they sent repeated expresses to their general, to stop the progress of the royal army. Essex obeyed with reluctance. He was very unwilling to begin a war, which threatened the destruction of his country; but at last determined to obey the orders of his masters. Though the two armies were not above twenty miles distant when the king left Shrewsbury, yet neither had intelligence of their approach, till they were within six miles of one another.

The king's army lay in the neighbourhood of Banbury, and that of the parliament at Keinton, in Warwickshire. In the night of the twenty-second of October, Charles received intelligence from prince Rupert, that the enemy was approaching; and early the next morning the king repaired to the top of Edge-hill, fully resolved to give them battle, and shewed himself as ready to expose his person as any private officer in the whole army. As both parties seemed equally forward for an engagement, the forenoon was spent in drawing up both armies, in which the king was the less expeditious, as some of his foot were not yet come up, and his situation was such, that he could not be attacked without great disadvantage.

The right wing of the parliament's army was composed of a considerable body of troops, which lined some hedges; and two bodies of horse, drawn up near the town of Keinton. The left wing was composed of a strong body of foot and a thousand horse, commanded by Ramfay, a Scotch officer; and the center, which was designed as a body of reserve, by Sir William Balfour, under the earl of Bedford, general of the horse. Essex himself resolved to charge in person at the head of a regiment of foot.

The right wing of the royal army was commanded by prince Rupert, the left by general Wilmot, and the center by Sir John Biron. The king intended to have scattered some proclamations among the parliament army, offering his pardon to such officers and soldiers as should join his forces; but this prudent measure was neglected; and the old earl of Lindsey was so affected at the heat and animosity of the young officers, that he declared, “ he did not look upon himself as a general, but would die as a private colonel, with a pike in his hand, at the head of his own regiment.”

Sir Faithful Fortescue, who had levied a body of horse to serve against the rebels in Ireland, had been obliged to serve in the parliamentary army, and was now posted in the left wing; but he no sooner perceived prince Rupert advancing, than ordering his troop to discharge their pistols in the ground, he joined the royal detachment. This incident, together with the furious charge of the prince, struck the whole left wing with consternation; they gave a very disorderly fire, and were broken, routed, and driven off the field by prince Rupert, who pursued them above two miles, forgetting that he carried with him the flower of the royal army, and thereby exposed the king and the remaining part of his forces to the most imminent danger. The right wing of the parliament's army had no better success. Chafed from their ground by lord Wilmot and Sir Robert Aston, they also took to flight. The action had hitherto been chiefly among the horse, the foot on both sides were pretty entire, and fought with great courage. The forces of Essex made their chief efforts against the king's standard, which was carried by Sir Edward Verney, and bravely defended by the royalists; but their principal attack was against the division commanded by Sir William Stapleton. It was here the error committed in drawing up the king's forces was perceived. For though the body of reserve under Sir John Biron had now advanced and joined in the attack against the artillery of Essex, and were on the point of taking it; yet Balfour's reserve was still entire, and advanced to the relief of the artillery just at the time when Stapleton was going to abandon it.

Had prince Rupert, or general Wilmot, returned at this critical moment, the victory had been complete, and perhaps a final period put to the civil war; but both these commanders were at a great distance, and the dispute was now very unfavourable to the king. For Balfour's division charged him in flank and rear with so much fury, that the earl of Lindsey, fighting on foot at the head of his regiment, was mortally wounded, the royal standard was taken, and some of the king's cannon nailed up.

Charles, attended by his two sons, was, during this furious engagement, in the center of his own foot, but a little removed from the hottest part of the service; but upon Balfour's breaking in, his person was in the most imminent danger, and he sent the two princes back to the hill, which they reached with some difficulty. The duke of Richmond, the earl of Dorset, and several other noblemen, kept by his person; and it was here that Charles had the first opportunity of shewing his personal courage. For drawing his sword, and advancing to attack the enemy, his soldiers were so animated by the example of their king, that they returned to the charge with more fury than ever; the royal standard was retaken, and the enemy in their turn obliged to give ground. Rupert at the head of his horse, now returned from the unseasonable pursuit, and the battle assumed all the appearances of beginning afresh. The prince saw with astonishment, that every thing bore the appearance of a defeat instead of a victory; but his troops were satisfied with carnage, and could not be prevailed upon to renew the attack. The two armies faced each other for some time, but neither of them shewed courage sufficient for a new battle. All night they lay upon their arms; and the next morning perceived themselves in sight of each other; but neither general nor soldier shewed any disposition to renew the fight. Essex first drew off his forces, and retired to Warwick. The king returned to his former quarters. The loss was greatest on the side of the parliament; and near five thousand men were found dead on the field of battle. On the king's side the earl of Lindsey, lord Aubigny, and Sir Edmund Verney, the king's standard-bearer, were slain in the action; and the lord Willoughby, Sir Thomas Lunsford, Sir William Vavafor, and Sir Edward Stradling taken prisoners. Among the parliamentarians, the lord St. John, and colonel Essex, one of their best officers, were killed, and Sir William Essex, father to the colonel of the same name, was taken prisoner. The coach of the earl of Essex, with some of his papers and his waggons, fell into the hands of the royalists.

Such was the issue of the battle of Keinton or Edge-hill, the first action of consequence that happened between the contending parties; and though neither could boast of any remarkable advantage, it occasioned a general consternation in the kingdom. A civil war was known in England only by reading or tradition; the inhabitants were not yet habituated to consider one another as enemies in the field, nor to think it their duty to plunge their swords in the breasts of their friends, their neighbours, their relations, their brothers, and their parents; for such are the horrors entailed upon civil war. Both parties therefore shuddered at dipping their hands in the blood of their countrymen; but when the first dreadful effay was over, all ties of nature and duty were forgotten; all relations, however tender, disappeared; they wanted in floods of cruelty, and sported upon the wrecks of their country. The dispositions of both parties were so violent, that it was almost impossible for any man to remain neuter, without exposing himself and his family to inevitable ruin. Many had joined the parliament merely from a received opinion, that the king was utterly incapable of making even a shew of resistance, and must be obliged, without effusion of blood, to comply with their demands. But when they saw him joined by those, who had lately appeared at the head of the most forward opposers of whatever was usurped, or even doubtful in the prerogative; when they saw him surrounded by a splendid court, and retain all the forms of laws and justice; when they saw the noblest blood in England offered to be shed in his defence, and his own person exposed at the head of the army with as much appearance of resolution, as that of a common soldier of fortune; they began to imagine they had been too hasty in their choice, and to repent of their precipitate engagements; but they had gone too far to retract, and were obliged to stand or fall by the party they had embraced; thinking that the king, whatever professions he might make, never could pardon the provocations he had received.

When prince Rupert first attacked the left wing of the parliamentary army, and put the whole division to flight, some of fugitives flying to a great distance from the field of battle, carried the news of a total defeat, and struck the whole city and parliament with terror and dismay. Even Lenthall, the speaker of the house of commons, advised the members to be early in their application to the king for a general peace. A few days after this panic was dissipated by the arrival of a more just account: and then the parliament pretended to have gained a complete victory. But this was flying from one extreme to the other; for though the principal advantage the king could boast was that of the surrender of Banbury, yet he was undoubtedly the victor, because the earl of Essex first drew off his army, and left him master of the field of battle.

Charles, after refreshing his troops, and placing a garrison in Banbury, continued his march to Oxford, the only place in his dominions at his devotion. But as the weather still continued favourable, the royal army was not suffered to remain idle. One Martin had been appointed governor of Reading by the parliament, who had considerably augmented the fortifications of the town. A party of horse was therefore detached to make an attempt upon the place, which was thought of great importance. At their approach both the governor and garrison were seized with a panic, and fled with the utmost precipitation to London, so that the royal detachment entered the town without opposition. This remarkable success induced Charles to march his whole army to Reading; and to form the design of approaching the capital itself.

Alarmed at the king's progress, and the consequences that might ensue if his army should reach the city, the commons sent an express to the earl of Essex, ordering him to march with the utmost expedition to London. He obeyed the order, and was received by both houses as a conqueror; presented by the parliament with five thousand pounds, the house declaring, "that they were infinitely obliged to the said earl, for the great and acceptable service he had done the commonwealth, and that they should be ready on all occasions to express the due sense they have of his merit, by assisting and protecting him, and all others under his command, with their lives and fortunes, to the utmost of their power; that this should remain upon record in both houses of parliament for a mark of honour to his person, name and family, and for a monument of his singular virtue to all posterity."

But notwithstanding this compliment to Essex, several of the most powerful persons in the parliament were dissatisfied with the great powers with which he was invested; and were very desirous of preventing any farther effusion of human blood, if an equitable accommodation could be obtained. They were persuaded that the king would have no objection to enter into a treaty with the parliament, if he could procure the safety of his friends, who had in a manner been proscribed by both houses. But in this perhaps they were mistaken. All the prisons, several of the halls, and other large houses in London, were filled with those the parliament termed delinquents, among whom were some of the aldermen.

aldermen both above and below the chair, and many of the richest citizens. These commitments had been made with all the insolence of power; and the goods, money, and houses of the delinquents, had been seized, in as arbitrary a manner as any act of authority ever committed by the king. The delinquents were not only punished before conviction, but upon the slightest suspicions. These arbitrary proceedings could not fail of alarming every person of sense and reflection; and peace now appeared to be a very desirable object. The parliament had discharged many suspected officers and foldiers, who not having an opportunity of joining the royal army, continued in the neighbourhood of London, and were perpetually forming cabals against the parliament. As it was impossible to prevent their correspondence with the king's friends, Charles conceived great hopes of their assistance; and this motive induced him to continue his march towards the capital. Previous to his leaving Reading, he sent a proclamation of pardon to the cities of London and Westminster; but this the parliament ordered the sheriffs to repress; the most effectual method they could have taken to render it universally known. At the same time, Sir Peter Killigrew was sent with a petition to his majesty, for fixing some place near London, where he might reside, while the negotiations for a peace were carrying on. Charles shewed great readiness to embrace the offer, named Windsor as the place for carrying on the conferences, and desired that the parliament's garrison might be removed, and his own troops admitted into that castle.

In the mean time, Essex ordered six thousand of his army to march to Kingston, that they might be in readiness to advance to Hounslow, to stop the progress of the royal army, provided they continued their march towards London; and sent several of his best regiments to Brentford, where they threw up some works, while another strong detachment filed off towards Acton.

Killigrew having received his majesty's answer, immediately set out for London; but on their reaching Brentford, and finding it full of soldiers, he strongly represented to Essex, that he feared his advancing so far from the city might prove an obstacle to the peace; but Essex took no notice of it. He, however, on his arrival at Westminster, prevailed with the parliament to write a letter to the king, intimating their desire that a cessation of arms should take place between the two armies. The active prince Rupert was perpetually scouring the country at the head of his cavaliers. He well knew that the secret intention of Charles was, if possible, to march to London; and foresaw it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to effect it, if Essex had time sufficient to complete his dispositions. It is sufficiently evident, that the commons themselves never meant, that their petition for peace should imply a cessation of arms; because they thought it necessary to make the cessation a separate act, which they had dispatched to Charles by Sir Peter Killigrew. While that gentleman was posting with it to the king's head quarters, then at Colebrook, prince Rupert attacked the parliament's regiments and works at Brentford with the utmost fury; and notwithstanding they made a noble resistance, they were all cut off, wounded, or taken prisoners, and the prince remained master of the town. In the heat of this action, Killigrew arrived, with the letter for a cessation of arms in his pocket, and immediately informed Essex of the purport of his message. Essex would not suffer him to proceed any farther, and made the necessary dispositions for acting on the defensive, till he could receive reinforcements from London.

Charles now moved with his whole army to Brentford; while the city marched its trained bands in excellent order, to join the earl of Essex, who now determined to fight the royal army. The parliamentary forces amounted to twenty-four thousand fighting men, besides detachments consisting of eight thousand more; which might have been recalled in a few hours. Essex was likewise possessed of a complete train of artillery, which he drew up in a lane between Turnham Green and Hammer-smith. His van consisted of Stapleton's and Goodwyn's regiments of horse. His main body and reserve were composed of his infantry, intermixed with the city trained bands. His cavalry formed the wings, the left extending towards the Thames, and the right towards Acton. A council of war being held, it was proposed by some of the officers, that the party lying at Kingston should advance towards Hounslow; that two of the best regiments of horse should disembark off towards Acton; and that, upon a signal given, Essex, at the head of the main body, should advance in front; by which means the king's army would be attacked at one and the same time in front, flank, and rear. But none of the principal officers were for putting the success of the war upon the issue of a single battle; because if they gained the victory, the constitution must be destroyed; if they were defeated, both themselves, their friends, the city of London; and the cause of liberty itself, must be left to the mercy of an incensed sovereign, and a furious army. Essex, however, thought that some art was necessary in order to support his design of not coming to a general engagement. It was urged, that the intended detachments would so greatly weaken the center of the army, that the king might easily force his passage, and get between them and London, before either the flank or rear of his army could be attacked, especially as it was known with what irresistible fury prince Rupert charged at the head of his cavaliers. It was therefore resolved not to venture a battle; that the three thousand men lying at Kingston should immediately march to London, where their appearance was highly necessary to allay a strong ferment that now appeared in favour of his majesty; and that the detachment at Acton should rejoin the main body. Both armies continued to face each other for some time, and several small skirmishes happened between the advanced parties, but nothing material occurred. At last they both retired, the king to Colebrook, and Essex to London.

Soon after, the parliament sent the following message to the king; for the principal men in the city, weary of supporting the enormous expence of the army, were very desirous of an accommodation.

"May it please your majesty,

"It is humbly desired, by both houses of parliament, that your majesty will be pleased to return to your parliament, with your royal, not your martial attendants; to the end that religion, laws, and liberties, may be settled and secured by their advice; finding, by a late and sad accident, that your majesty is environed by some such counselors, as rather persuade a desperate division, than a joining and good agreement with your parliament and people: and we shall be ready to give your majesty assurances of such security as may be for your honour, and the safety of your royal person."

Besides this message, petitions were now drawing up by the cities of London and Westminster for a peace, which so greatly alarmed the violent party in the house of commons, that they were ordered to be discontinued. These disorders, and the difficulties to which the commons were now reduced for raising the necessary supplies, encouraged Charles, in answer to their late address, to tell them, "That he hoped all his good subjects would look upon that message with indignation, as intended; by the contrivers of it, to treat him with contempt; and designed, by that malignant party, of whom he had so often complained, as a wall of separation between his majesty and his people: that he had often told them the reasons that induced him to leave his capital, from which indeed he was driven; and had often complained, that the greater part of his peers, and of the members of the house of commons, could not, with safety to their persons, fit and vote freely among them; but were debarred, by violent and artful practices, of those privileges which their birthrights, and the trust reposed in them by their constituents, justly gave them: that the whole kingdom knew an army was raised, under pretence of orders of both houses, (an usurpation never before heard of in any age) which army had pursued his majesty in his own kingdom; given him battle at Kienton; and now these rebels being recruited, and possessed of London, he was courteously invited to return to his parliament, that is, into the power of that army.

“That since the traitorous endeavours of these desperate men could not snatch the crown from his head, it being defended by the providence of God, and the affections and loyalty of his good subjects, they had requested him to deliver it up, and put his own life, together with the lives, liberties, and fortunes of all his good subjects, into their merciless hands: that he thought proper to give no other answer to that part of their petition; but as he imputed not that affront to both his houses of parliament, nor to the major part of those who were then present there, but to that dangerous party which his majesty and the kingdom must detest, so he would not take advantage of it: that if they would really pursue the course their petition delivered at Colebrook pointed out, he would perform all he then promised; whereby the hearts of his distressed subjects might be raised by the hopes of peace, without which neither religion, the laws, nor the liberties of the kingdom, could be settled and secured.”

A negotiation was, however, opened at Oxford; and the earl of Northumberland, with four members of the lower house, repaired thither as commissioners. In this treaty the king strenuously insisted on the re-establishment of the crown in its legal powers, and on the restoration of his constitutional prerogative. The parliament still required new concessions, and a farther abridgment of legal authority, as a more effectual remedy to their fears and jealousies. Finding the king supported by more forces, and a greater party than they had ever imagined, they seemingly abated somewhat of the exorbitant conditions they had formerly claimed; but their demands were still too great for an equal treaty. Besides other articles, to which a complete victory alone could entitle them, they required the king, in express terms, to abolish episcopacy; a demand which they had only insinuated before; and desired that all other ecclesiastical controversies should be determined by their assembly of divines. They also desired the king to acquiesce in their settlement of the militia, and to confer on their adherents the entire authority of the sword. And in answer to the king's proposal, that his magazines, towns, forts, and ships, should be restored to him; the parliament required, that they should be put into such hands as they could confide in. And having now, in the eye of the law, been guilty of treason in levying war against their sovereign, their fears and jealousies must, on that account, have multiplied extremely, and have rendered their personal safety still more incompatible with the authority of the monarch. The conferences therefore proceeded no farther than the first demand, and the parliament's commissioners returned suddenly to London.

Besides the military operations between the principal armies, which lay in the heart of England, each county, each town, and almost each family, was divided within itself; and the most violent convulsions shook the whole kingdom. The two noblemen in the north, on whom Charles principally relied, were the earls of Newcastle and Cumberland. The latter soon resigned his command, but the former associated with the northern counties, where the inhabitants were well disposed to join the royal party; and on account of their being situated near the borders of Scotland, were much better provided with arms than the other parts of the kingdom. Newcastle therefore soon raised an army of eight thousand men, but so pompously divided, and subdivided into regiments, squadrons, and companies, that it appeared to consist of thrice the number. The chief adherents to the parliament, among whom were the lord Fairfax, and his son Sir Thomas Fairfax, were proclaimed traitors. Lord Fairfax had received a commission to command the parliament's forces in Yorkshire; but perceiving the people in general were prepossessed in favour of the king, he was obliged to act only on the defensive. He attempted to prevent the earl of Newcastle from passing the river Tees, but his detachment was overpowered, and Newcastle marched directly to York; where he was received in triumph by Sir Thomas Glemham, the deputy governor. During these transactions, the queen and Goring landed at Burlington-bay, with a considerable quantity of arms, ammunition, and some money. The king's affairs in the north were now in a prosperous condition. He had a strong garrison in Newcastle. The regiments that were raised against him in Richmondshire and Cleveland had disbanded of themselves. The earl of Newcastle had garrisoned Newark, in Nottinghamshire. A detachment from his army, under the command of Mr. Cavendish, had made themselves masters of Grantham, in Lincolnshire, and taken three hundred prisoners, with all their arms and ammunition.

A family difference had, for some time, subsisted between the houses of Huntingdon and Stamford; and colonel Hastings, a younger brother of the former, had opposed with success, in Leicestershire, the lord Grey, son to the earl of Stamford. The city of Litchfield itself was without fortifications; but the close, built by one of its bishops, was capable of making a good defence, and had been seized for the king by a party of loyalists. Lord Broke, one of the most zealous parliamentarians in England, was ordered to attack this strong retreat. He accordingly advanced to Litchfield, at the head of a considerable detachment, and entered the city without opposition, the king's party retiring into the close. While Broke was concerting the proper dispositions for besieging the place, he was killed by a musket-ball, and by his death the parliament lost one of the most inveterate enemies Charles had in the nation. This event inspired his soldiers with a desire to revenge the death of their leader. They soon made themselves masters of the place, and took the whole party prisoners. The earl of Northampton, who commanded the garrison of Banbury, was advancing to the relief of Litchfield; but in his march threw himself into Stafford, in order to prevent the town from being fortified by Sir John Gell, one of the parliament's generals. Gell abandoned the place at his approach; but being joined by Sir William Breton, he advanced against Stafford. Northampton, who knew nothing of the junction, marched immediately out of the town, in order to fight Gell. The contest was very sharp; and though the royalists were far inferior in number, Gell's cavalry were totally routed, but the brave earl of Northampton lost his life in the action. This misfortune too greatly intimidated his forces, though they had greatly the advantage, that they retreated to Stafford. The parliamentarians lost a considerable number of men, and eight pieces of cannon.

But the most memorable actions of valour, during the winter season, were performed in the west. Sir Ralph Hopton, at the head of a small troop, being obliged to retire into Cornwall, before the earl of Bedford, who commanded a superior army in Devonshire, he was joined by the militia, and the whole country reduced to peace and obedience under the king. But the loyalists were not contented with the advantages they had gained in Cornwall; they were desirous of carrying the war into Devonshire, and reducing that county also to subjection. Pursuant to this resolution, Sir Bevil Granville, the most popular man in that county, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir Nicholas Stanning, Arundel and Trevannion, undertook, at their own expence, to raise an army for the king;

king; and their great interest in Cornwall soon enabled them to effect their purpose. Hopton had been as forward as any man in the parliament for opposing the king's measures; but being persuaded of his majesty's good intentions; and seeing no end of opposition but in rebellion, he joined the royal party, and received a commission from the marquis of Hertford, to act for Charles in the western counties. Hopton had served many years abroad with great applause; and was therefore complimented with the principal command of the army. Their success was so rapid, that the parliament was alarmed, and sent orders to Ruthven, governor of Plymouth, to march with all the forces of Dorset, Somerset, and Devon, and reduce the whole county of Cornwall to obedience. He obeyed the order; and was soon after followed by the earl of Stamford, with a considerable reinforcement. Ruthven having entered Cornwall by means of some bridges thrown over the Tamar, he marched with the utmost expedition, in order to bring on an action with the royalists before he was joined by Stamford's forces, and obtain alone the honour of that victory which he looked for with assurance. The royalists were equally impatient to bring the affair to a decision, before Ruthven's army received so considerable a reinforcement. The battle was fought on Braddock down, and victory declared for the royalists, though greatly inferior in numbers. Hopton had made a very artful disposition for the engagement. He concealed two field-pieces behind his ranks, which opened at every discharge. These pieces did great execution among the enemy, and soon put them into disorder. The advantage was immediately perceived by Hopton, who led his forces to the charge, and obtained a complete victory. The rebels lost above two thousand five hundred men, together with all their artillery and baggage. Ruthven, with a few broken troops, the poor remains of his army, fled to Saltash; but that town being taken by Hopton, he escaped with some difficulty, and almost alone, into Plymouth. The earl of Stamford, informed of Ruthven's defeat, retired to Tavistock with great precipitation. But he was soon after obliged to abandon that town by Sir John Berkeley, who took possession of Tavistock for the king.

A.D. 1643. But notwithstanding these advantages, the royalists were greatly distressed for want both of money and ammunition; and this obliged them to conclude a neutrality with the parliamentary party in Devonshire. But as soon as the spring advanced, the commons disapproved of the treaty, and the war recommenced, with the appearance of every disadvantage to the royal party. Stamford, who commanded the parliament's army, was at the head of a body of near seven thousand men, well supplied with money, provisions and ammunition. Desirous of retrieving the honour he had lost when driven from Tavistock, he advanced against the royalists, who were not half his number, and oppressed by every kind of necessity. Despair, blended with their natural valour, now determined them to make one noble effort against the enemy. Stamford was encamped on the top of a hill near Stratton; and it was determined to attack him, in four divisions, by five in the morning, on the sixteenth of May. One of the divisions was commanded by lord Mohun and Sir Ralph Hopton; another by Sir Bevil Granville and Sir John Berkeley; a third by Stanning and Trevannion; a fourth by Basset and Godolphin. The royal forces pressed, with the utmost valour, four ways up the hill, and were as obstinately opposed by their enemies. For some time the battle continued doubtful, till word was brought to the chief officers of the royal forces, that all their ammunition was spent, except four barrels of powder. This defect they determined to supply with valour, but at the same time to conceal it from the soldiers. Orders were therefore given to advance, without firing, to the top of the hill, where they would be on equal ground with the enemy. The courage of the officers was so well seconded by the soldiers, that the royalists continually gained ground. Major-general Chidley, who commanded the parliament's forces, for Stamford kept at a distance, did every thing becoming a good officer; and when he saw his men recoil before the royalists, he advanced in person at the head of a strong detachment of pikes, and piercing into the thickest of the enemy, was overpowered; and taken prisoner. This incident determined the fate of the battle. His men began to give ground apace; so that the four parties of royalists approaching nearer and nearer, as they ascended the hill, they at last met together on the plain at the top, where they signalized their victory with mutual shouts and congratulations.

The parliament were now sufficiently alarmed by this series of success in the west; and the king ordered the marquis of Hertford, who had raised about three thousand forces in Wales, to join the Cornish loyalists, and push their conquests still farther in the western counties. In his march he attempted to surprize Cirencester, but failed in the attempt, through some unavoidable accidents of the roads and weather. But as that town was of the utmost advantage to the king, prince Rupert undertook that service; and marching with the utmost expedition, took the place by storm, cutting to pieces a whole regiment of the parliament's forces, taking eleven hundred prisoners; about four thousand stands of arms; the enemy's whole magazine, and a very valuable booty.

But the advantages gained by the royal party in the west were in some measure balanced by the success of the parliamentary army commanded by the earl of Essex, who had now taken the field, and laid siege to Reading. His army consisted of twenty thousand men. The town was but indifferently fortified, and defended by a garrison of three thousand foot and three hundred horse, commanded by Sir Richard Aston and colonel Fielding. The largeness of the place, the weakness of the fortifications, and particularly the great consumption of powder necessary for making a vigorous defence, and with which Charles was very ill provided, had occasioned a motion in the royal council for abandoning the place; and removing the magazines to Oxford: but before this could be effected, the town was invested by the enemy. The approaches, however, were carried on with so little judgment, that it was plain the place would not have been taken, had the fortifications been properly constructed. The enemy, however, enjoyed great advantages from the situation of the place, their cannon playing directly into the town, by which means several of the garrison were killed; and Sir Richard Aston dangerously wounded. The disabling of this able commander was of the utmost importance, as the king was now advancing, at the head of his army, to relieve the town. For while he was on his march, the garrison, under Fielding, who had now succeeded to the command, after killing a great number of the enemy in their sallies, thought proper to capitulate, by which the town was delivered up to the parliament's army. By the articles of the capitulation, the whole garrison were to march out with the honours of war, and be at full liberty to join the royal army; but all deserters were to be given up to the enemy. The last condition was thought so ignominious and prejudicial to the king's affairs, that Fielding was tried by a court-martial, and condemned to lose his head for granting it. Charles, however, afterwards remitted his sentence.

But though Essex had succeeded in his enterprize, and though his army, during the siege, had been fully supplied with every necessary from London; yet the hardships which the soldiers suffered from the inclemency of the weather, had weakened them to such a degree, that they were no longer capable of undertaking any new enterprize: so that no action happened, for some time, between the two armies, though encamped in the neighbourhood of each other. Essex at last made a motion towards Oxford, and fixed his head-quarters at Thame, on the borders of Buckinghamshire, hamshire, in order to over-awe that county, which now began to arm in favour of the king. Colonel Urrey, a Scots officer, had been preferred to the command he held under Essex, on the pressing instances of the commons; but not thinking the post he enjoyed adequate to his merit, he threw up his commission; and presenting himself in his regimentals before prince Rupert, offered to conduct a detachment of the royal army to a place where they might, with great ease, beat up the enemy's quarters. Rupert readily embraced the proposal, and Urrey performed the service with great courage and success, killing and taking prisoners a whole regiment of the parliament's horse, besides dispersing other detached parties, and returned to Oxford with a large body, and a considerable number of prisoners. Animated by this success, he proposed a still more daring attempt to prince Rupert, that of surprising the enemy's head-quarters; offering, at the same time, that the prince should enjoy all the honour of the enterprise, while he himself served as a volunteer. Nothing could be more agreeable to the daring spirit of prince Rupert than expeditions of this kind. He embraced the offer with great avidity; and putting himself at the head of a small detachment of horse, marched with so much expedition, that he surprised and cut in pieces two of the enemy's regiments, one of horse and the other of foot, quartered at Wickham, together with another very considerable party lying at some distance. The strength of the prince's detachment rendered it highly imprudent to make any farther attempt, as the enemy was, by this time, sufficiently alarmed; and he accordingly began his march back to the royal army. But Essex, who was now informed of the success that had attended Rupert, and exasperated at so daring an insult, sent a party of his horse to intercept his retreat, at a bridge which the royalists were obliged to pass. The troops designed for this expedition were seen by Rupert, as he was marching over a plain called Chalgravefield, towards a lane which led to the bridge. He immediately perceived the disadvantage of being attacked in the defile, gave immediate orders for his forces to halt, and drew up his party on the plain. Ashamed of having been discovered, the parliament's forces advanced against the prince with great intrepidity; but being unable to support the furious charge of Rupert, they were all cut off, or taken prisoners, before the earl of Essex could bring up the infantry to their assistance, and Rupert returned with his prisoners to Oxford. The famous Hambden, who commanded a regiment of foot in the neighbourhood, had joined the party sent to intercept Rupert, as a volunteer, and rushed into the thickest of the battle. One of the prisoners, after the action was over, informed Rupert, that he was confident Mr. Hambden was wounded; for he saw him, contrary to his usual custom, ride off the field before the battle was over; his head hanging down, and his hands leaning on his horse's neck. The soldier was not mistaken: news arrived the next day, that he had received a brace of pistol bullets in his shoulder, and that the bone was shattered. He languished eight days, and then paid the debt of nature, sincerely lamented even by his enemies. He was, doubtless, one of the greatest men that age produced. His prodigious abilities, his unfulfilled virtues, his unshaken integrity, have been justly celebrated by writers of all parties. But he had unhappily imbibed the most violent prejudices against Charles, and esteemed him as a prince wholly unworthy of any trust or confidence from his people. But surely an attempt to annihilate monarchy, to subvert the ancient constitution of his country, and to spread the horrors of a civil war over every part of the kingdom, was carrying opposition to a very blameable extreme; especially when there was the greatest reason to believe, that his antipathy to the king was not founded upon truth; and that the arbitrary proceedings of that prince proceeded rather from necessity, and a natural desire of supporting the prerogative which had been transmitted to him from his ancestors, than from any ambitious designs of eradicating the liberties of the people. Perhaps Hambden himself never intended to carry opposition to this dreadful height. It is more than probable, that he, as well as many others in the opposition, never imagined that the king could have found so many resources; and that he must have been obliged, even before the sword of civil discord had made any progress in depopulating the kingdom, to submit to the conditions offered by the parliament. Perceiving himself deceived in the resistance he imagined Charles could make, he endeavoured to repair the dreadful consequences of his mistake, by pushing on the war with more vigour and spirit than ever. He well knew that a decisive victory only could now protect his party from the indignation of an enraged sovereign; and was therefore desirous of pursuing, with the utmost intrepidity, the only measures that could restore peace to his country. When the king was informed of Hambden's misfortune, he was so sensibly affected with the fate of that great man, though one of his capital enemies, that he made an offer of his own surgeons to attend him; but it was too late. Before the messenger arrived, Hambden had been seized with a violent fever, and was past all hopes of recovery.

While the two principal armies continued in their quarters near the city of Oxford, Sir William Waller was sent, at the head of a large body of forces, into the west, with orders to incorporate among his troops the poor remains of the parliament's army that had escaped from the battle of Stratton. Waller was a man of great spirit and fortune: he had already displayed his great abilities as a commander, by reducing Portsmouth, and defeating lord Herbert. His great reputation brought in vast numbers of volunteers, and he advanced into the west with the utmost celerity. But before he reached the place of action, prince Maurice, and the marquis of Hertford, had joined Hopton with a considerable reinforcement, so that the army of the royalists now amounted to near seven thousand men. They were well provided with artillery, and other necessities, and greatly elated with their late success. But the disposition of the western forces, which had chiefly been disciplined by Hopton, were very different from the troops under prince Maurice and the marquis of Hertford. They were very regular and tractable in their quarters; they paid punctually for every thing, as far as their money would extend, and treated those who did not join them with great humanity and tenderness. They never levied money upon the inhabitants but with apparent reluctance, and with promises to repay it as soon as the circumstances of the times would permit. This abstinence was blended with the utmost courage, and a consciousness of their being the chief supports of the royal cause in that part of the kingdom. Maurice ridiculed this behaviour; and his troops having been accustomed to live at free-quarters, looked upon the sobriety and regular conduct of the others as a reproach to themselves. It was fortunate for Charles, that notwithstanding this difference in the disposition of his soldiers, all of them were united in the common principle of supporting the crown; and their reputation was very great, even with the parliamentary party.

It is therefore no wonder that they made a very rapid progress, Taunton, Bridgewater, and Dunstons castle made no resistance, and gentlemen of known fidelity to the king were appointed governors. Sir William Waller had now reached Bath, where he continued some time, recruiting his army; and frequent skirmishes happened between the two parties, which generally terminated in favour of the royalists. At last the two armies met at Lansdown near Bath, and fought a pitched battle, with great loss on both sides, but without any decisive event. The gallant Sir Bevil Granville fell in the action, and Hopton was greatly hurt by the blowing up of some powder. After this engagement the royalists marched to the eastward, in order to join the king at Oxford: but Waller hung on their rear, and greatly infested their march till they reached the Devizes. Reinforced with additional troops which flocked to him from all quarters, he soon so greatly surpassed the royalists in number, that they durst no longer continue their march, or expose themselves to the hazard of an action. It was therefore resolved, that prince Maurice, and the marquis of Hertford, should proceed with the cavalry, and, after procuring a reinforcement from the king, hasten back to the relief of their friends in the Devizes. Waller was confident of taking this whole body of infantry, now abandoned by their principal support, that in a letter he wrote to the parliament, he informed them that the work was done, and that he would inform them, by the next post, of the number and quality of the prisoners. But the king, even before Hertford's arrival, hearing of the great difficulties to which the western army was reduced, had prepared a strong body of horse, and immediately dispatched them under the command of lord Wilmot. Waller, instead of endeavouring to prevent the junction of this reinforcement with the foot in the Devizes, which he might easily have done by continuing the blockade of the place, drew off his troops, thinking himself sure of the victory, and that a decisive action would totally ruin the king's affairs. He was mistaken. The infantry, relieved from despair, advanced with the greatest alacrity to join Wilmot, and a general action succeeded on Roundway-down, about two miles from the Devizes. After a short but sharp conflict, Waller's army was totally defeated, few of them escaping either death or captivity. Waller himself, with the poor remains of his numerous army, fled to Bristol, and carried thither the first news of his own defeat. The royalists became masters of the whole train of artillery, ammunition, and baggage of the parliament's army, with so inconsiderable a loss on their side, that it hardly deserves to be mentioned.

This event together with the late success of prince Rupert, and the death of Hambden, so discouraged Essex, that quitting Thame and Aylesbury, where he had hitherto lain, he retreated to London, at the head of a broken and disheartened army, which, but a few months before, he had led into the field in so flourishing a condition. In the mean time the forces that had defeated Waller, reduced Bath, and then marched to form the siege of Bristol, in conjunction with the troops under prince Rupert. Bristol was considered as one of the principal places possessed by the parliament: it was very rich, and garrisoned by two thousand five hundred foot, a regiment of horse, and another of dragoons. Nathaniel Fiennes, son to lord Say, commanded the forces, and many of the citizens took up arms, and joined the garrison. The fortifications were, however, incomplete and irregular, which induced prince Rupert to resolve to storm the city. Accordingly the assault was begun in four different places, and after a desperate engagement, the suburbs were taken. But still the garrison were masters of the town, and the entrance was rendered more difficult by the ruins of the houses that were demolished in the late attempt; as well as by the loss sustained by the royalists. It was even proposed not to make any farther attempt, when, to the great joy of the whole army, the besieged beat a parley. The articles of the capitulation were soon settled, by which the garrison were allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, leaving their cannon, ammunition, and colours. The most wealthy inhabitants of Bristol, fearing the city would fall into the hands of the loyalists, embarked the greatest part of their wealth on board their ships, in order to send it to London; but prince Rupert, informed of their design, seized the ships, and by that means became master of a very rich booty.

The taking of Bristol was of great importance to

Charles, though his loss was very considerable. Near five hundred excellent foldiers perished in the assault, among whom were several officers of note. The king, however, to shew that he was not intoxicated with good fortune, published a manifesto, in which he renewed his protestation lately made with such solemnity at the head of his army, and declared his earnest desire of concluding a peace; upon the re-establishment of the constitution, offering to grant a general pardon, and bury all that was past in eternal oblivion. But the factious inhabitants of London were so far from thinking, that the king's late successes gave him a title to talk of peace; that they ran into greater violences than ever. Sir William Waller was now returned to the capital; and by his spirited harangues kept alive that enthusiasm, which a turn of fortune seemed to have depressed. The leaders of the house of commons secretly promoted these furious dispositions of the people, though they pretended they were very desirous of peace. The lords made no secret that they were determined to send propositions to the king, and his majesty's late manifesto, occasioned by his successes in the west, was represented even by some considerable members among the commons, as a mark of royal clemency, and a proper basis for a treaty. On the fifth of August the lords sent down to the commons the following propositions to be transmitted to the king:

1. "That both armies be immediately disbanded, and his majesty be intreated to return to his parliament, upon such security as should be thought satisfactory."

2. "That religion might be settled by the advice of a general synod of divines, in such a manner as his majesty, with the consent of both houses of parliament, should appoint."

3. "That the militia both by sea and land, should be settled by a bill, and the militia, forts, and ships of the kingdom, put into such hands as the king should appoint with the approbation of both houses of parliament; his majesty's revenue be absolutely and totally restored to him: only deducting such part as had been expended for the maintenance of his children."

4. "That all the members of both houses, who had been expelled only for absenting themselves, should be restored to their seats."

5. "That all delinquents before the year 1641, should be delivered up to the justice of parliament, and a general pardon for all others, on both sides, granted."

6. "That an act of oblivion should be past for all former acts of hostility."

The commons took immediately these propositions into consideration, and the article relative to the king's revenue, was agreed to; but it being late on Saturday night when this resolution passed, the house was adjourned till Monday morning, when all the members in and about London attended, and, there is the greatest reason to believe, that had the parliament been left to themselves, they would have laid a sure foundation for the salutary work of peace. But this was prevented by the leaders of the faction, who had hitherto rendered abortive every attempt for putting a period to the miseries of civil discord. The two houses were surrounded by the populace, who in a very clamorous and threatening manner, demanded that no terms of accommodation should be accepted. In the midst of this confusion, Mr. Hollis produced a letter from Essex, informing the house, that the king's forces had taken Doncaster and Weymouth. But this was far from discouraging the faction; the tumults continued to increase, till the lords, in a conference with the commons, plainly told them, that unless care was taken to suppress the violent proceedings of the populace, they must and will adjourn their house, till they could meet and deliberate with freedom, and without danger to their persons. An order was accordingly sent to Pennington, the factious lord-mayor, ordering him to suppress these tumults, mults. But many of the members, thinking their lives in danger, had retired from the house, and the propositions for a peace were rejected by a majority of seven. They now listened to no proposal from the lords that tended to put a period to the horrors of a civil war, and appointed committees to sit in every hall of the city, to receive subscriptions for raising men and horses for the defence of their religion, their laws, and their liberties. The lords were highly exasperated at these proceedings, especially as they saw, that notwithstanding the late order, no care was taken to suppress the tumults; and that a party of the trained bands were suffered to attack and murder several women who had loudly clamoured for peace. The earls of Northumberland, Bedford, Clare, Holland and Portland, with the lords Conway and Lovelace, left the house and retired to the king, who received them with favour.

During these transactions in the parliament, it was proposed in council, that the royal army should march directly to London, where every thing was in confusion, and where it was hoped, either by an insurrection, by victory, or by treaty, a speedy end might be put to the civil disorders, which now threatened the kingdom with destruction. Had this motion been carried, in all probability, the consternation of the party at the approach of the royal army would have been fatal to their cause; but it was thought by the majority of the council, that the great number and force of the London militia would render the attempt too dangerous. Gloucester, lying within twenty miles of the army, offered an easier, and at the same time, a very important conquest. It was the only garrison now possessed by the parliament in those parts. Should the undertaking be successful, the advantages would be very great; the whole course of the Severn would be under his majesty's command; the rich malecontent counties in the west, being deprived of all assistance, might be obliged to pay high contributions; as an atonement for their disaffection; an open communication would be preserved between Wales and these new conquests; and one half of the kingdom being entirely free from the influence of the parliament, might be united into a compact body, give the king a great superiority, and be employed with success in reducing the rest of England to obedience. These reasons induced the king to embrace a resolution that proved fatal to the royal party.

The garrison of Gloucester, consisting of about fifteen hundred regular troops, besides the citizens who took up arms on this occasion, was commanded by one Massey, an intrepid soldier of fortune; but his not being infected with the enthusiasm of the age, induced Charles to think that he would soon listen to terms of accommodation. He was deceived; Massey was resolute to preserve an entire fidelity to his masters, and though no enthusiast himself, he well knew how to employ, to great advantage, that fanatical spirit, with which his whole garrison, and the greater part of the inhabitants, were infected. The king sent a summons to the governor to surrender, giving him two hours to return an answer; but before half the time was expired, two citizens appeared at the head quarters, dressed in the most uncouth manner, while their countenances displayed all the marks of that enthusiastic ardour which had been so fatal to the peace of the three kingdoms. Without being asked the purport of their message, without exhibiting the least appearance of duty or good manners, they said, in a pert, shrill, undimmed accent, that they brought an answer from the godly city of Gloucester; and, after making several insolent and seditious replies to some questions that were asked them, they delivered the following answer in writing: "We the inhabitants, magistrates, officers, and soldiers, within the garrison of Gloucester, unto his majesty's gracious message, return this humble answer: That we do keep this city, according to our oaths and "allegiance; to and for the use of his majesty and his royal posterity: and do accordingly conceive ourselves wholly bound to obey the commands of his majesty signified by both houses of parliament; and are resolved, by God's help, to keep this city accordingly." All negotiations were now at an end, and the siege was pushed with great intrepidity. Sir William Vavasour lay, with his Welsh forces, on the west and north-west sides of the town; Ruthven, earl of Brentford, was posted on the south; and Sir Jacob Ashley on the east, where the king himself had his head quarters.

It is impossible to express the consternation that seized the inhabitants of London, when the news arrived that Gloucester was invested. The whole city was in confusion, and the people thought they saw the royal army already thundering at their gates. Had even a party of the king's forces appeared in this moment of distraction, the consequences might have been fatal to the whole party. But the siege of Gloucester demanded the king's whole attention, and in a few days the citizens recovered from their consternation. But the arbitrary proceedings of the parliament exasperated many who had before joined them; and a combination was formed in London, which required all the abilities of the leaders to suppress.

Edmond Waller, so well known for his poetical writings, was a person of very considerable fortune, and equally remarkable for his talents and elegance of manners. He was a member of the lower house, and had heartily joined in the measures that had been pursued for reducing the prerogative of the crown within proper bounds; but seeing no end of the encroachments of the commons, he exerted all his powers to stop the career of faction, and used the utmost boldness in his speeches in blaming the violent counsels by which the members were governed. But finding all his eloquence in the house was exerted in vain, he determined, if possible, to form a party in the city, that might oblige the parliament to accept of reasonable conditions, and restore peace to the nation. All the eminent persons in and about London had formed the same design, and highly approved the sentiments of Waller, the charms of whose conversation, joined to his character of courage and integrity, had procured him many friends. These all joined in wishing that some expedient could be found for stopping the impetuous career of the parliament, and bringing about a peace on equal terms. Tomkins, his brother-in-law, and Chaloner, the intimate friend of Tomkins, had for some time entertained the same sentiments; and informed Waller, that the same desire of peace among all men of sense and moderation prevailed in the city. It was therefore thought very easy to form a strong combination, for refusing, by mutual concert, the illegal taxes imposed upon the people by the parliament, without the royal assent. Pleased with the idea of restoring peace to their country, by obliging the parliament to accept of reasonable terms of accommodation, they applied themselves assiduously to form lists of persons whom they conceived would join them in their design; and soon had the pleasure of seeing them contain a very considerable and very respectable number. But, unfortunately for them, a servant belonging to Tomkins, who had imbibed the fanatical spirit of the times, overheard their conversation; and informed Pym of their design. Waller, Tomkins, and Chaloner, were immediately seized, and tried by a court-martial. They were all found guilty, and Tomkins and Chaloner suffered death on gibbets erected before their own doors; but the sentence of Waller was respited, and he afterwards obtained a pardon on paying a fine of ten thousand pounds. The following vow and covenant were also taken as a test by the lords and commons, and likewise imposed on their army, and upon all persons who lived within their quarters.

"I, A. B. in humility and reverence of the divine Majesty, declare my hearty sorrow for my own sins, and the sins of this nation, which have deserved the calamities and judgments which now lie upon it; and my true intention is, by God's grace, to endeavour the amendment of my own ways; and I do farther, in the presence of Almighty God, declare, vow, and covenant, that, in order to the security and preservation of the true reformed protestant religion, and liberty of the subject, I will not consent to the laying down of arms, so long as the papists, now in open war against the parliament, shall, by force of arms, be protected from the justice thereof; and that I do abhor and detest the said wicked and traitorous design lately discovered; and that I never gave, or will give, my assent to the execution thereof; but will, according to my power and vocation, oppose and resist the same, and all other of the like nature: and in case any other similar design shall come to my knowledge, I will make such timely discovery, as I shall conceive will be most conducive to the prevention thereof: and whereas I do, in my conscience, believe, that the forces raised by the two houses of parliament, are raised and continued for their just defence, and for the defence of the true protestant religion, and liberty of the subject, against the forces raised by the king; I will, according to my power and vocation, assist the forces raised and continued by both houses of parliament, against the forces raised by the king without their consent; and will likewise assist all other persons, that shall take this oath, in what they shall do in pursuance thereof; and will not, directly or indirectly, adhere to, or willingly assist, the forces raised by the king, without the consent of both houses of parliament: and this vow and covenant I make, in the presence of Almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, with a true intention to perform the same, as I shall answer at the great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed."

The framing of this solemn vow and covenant was one of the last services which Pym did for his party. He died soon after, and lived not to see the dreadful scenes that soon succeeded, together with the destruction of that very faction he had so long and so strenuously supported. Those oaths and covenants were the last, and indeed the most successful efforts of the commons. Nor were they contented with taking the oath themselves; they sent the following instructions for administering it to the people in every part of the kingdom.

1. "That a sufficient number of copies of the vow and covenant be sent down to the deputy-lieutenants and committees of parliament in the different counties, and that a certificate be required from them of the day on which they were received.

2. "That the said deputy lieutenants do, in six days at farthest, disperse the said copies to every parish church and chapel in their respective counties, to the ministers, church-wardens, or other persons, as the deputy-lieutenants shall appoint to receive the same.

3. "That the ministers of the several churches or chapels shall give public notice upon the first Lord's day after their receipt of such copies, what day the said vow and covenant shall be taken, in their several parishes; the time not to exceed the seventh day after such notice.

4. "That before the day so appointed, the constables of every place, within the said parishes, shall deliver to the ministers the names, fairly written, of all men, above the age of fifteen, residing in their several towns or villages; and the church-wardens of every parish shall, before the day so appointed, provide a register-book, in the beginning of which the vow and covenant shall be fairly written; wherein every man, after he hath taken that vow and covenant, shall write his name, or set his mark to his name written by some other person.

5. "That this vow and covenant shall be taken by all men in the church, within the several parishes where they reside, in presence of the ministers, church-wardens, fidesmen, and constables of the said parish, or two of them at least, jointly with the minister: the parties standing up, and either audibly pronouncing all the words of the same; or else after some person hath solemnly read over the whole, and taken it in their sight and hearing, they shall declare their assent to the same.

6. "That if any residing in the parish do not come and take the said vow and covenant on the day first appointed, then the ministers shall appoint another day, at no great distance: and the church-wardens are to go to the houses where they reside, and give them personal notice; and if they be not at home, to leave notice with some person in the house of the day appointed for their taking it: if they refuse it, they may be returned as obstinate.

7. "The ministers of the several parishes shall, within twenty days after their receipt of the vow and covenant, make a true certificate of the names of all such as, in their parishes, do not take it, to such person as shall be appointed for that purpose; who shall speedily return them to the deputy-lieutenants, or committees of parliament in that county, or any three of them; together with the names of all such ministers as do not send in their certificates within the twenty days; and of these the deputy-lieutenants, or committees, are to make duplicates, keeping one part with them, and sending the other sealed to the clerk of the house of commons.

8. "That the deputy-lieutenants and committees of parliament do immediately disarm, or cause to be disarmed, all such as shall refuse to take the said vow and covenant; and if it can be proved, that they had them in their custody any arms which they did not deliver up, they shall be immediately committed to prison.

9. "That no soldiers enlisted shall receive any part from the state, till they have, in the presence of their commander, and some minister, taken the vow and covenant."

During these transactions in parliament, the siege of Gloucester was carried on with great fury; and Massie, ambitious of saving the place, and having under his command a garrison ready to sacrifice their lives in support of their religion; had hitherto maintained his post with such courage and capacity, that he had greatly retarded all the advances of the royalists. By sudden and frequent sallies, he infected them in their trenches, and often gained considerable advantages. He disputed every inch of ground; and elated with former successes, refreshed the vigour and alacrity of their courage. But notwithstanding all his intrepidity, he saw his garrison reduced to the last extremity, and failed not, from time to time, to inform the parliament, that unless he was speedily relieved, he must, from extreme want of provisions and ammunition, be obliged to surrender.

It was now necessary for the commons to exert their whole power and authority, in order to repair their losses, and put themselves in a posture of defence. They well knew, that if Gloucester fell into the king's hands, it would be very difficult to support themselves against a victorious army; especially as they had very lately found, that very great dissensions prevailed among the people, even in the capital itself. They applied themselves particularly to recruit the army of Essex, and render it capable of facing the royalists. They excited their preachers to renew their declamations against the cause supported by his majesty; and even had recourse to the expedient of impressing men into their service, though they had so loudly exclaimed against that practice when exercised by the king, and even very lately abolished it by a bill for which they had so strenuously contended. They also prevailed upon the city to send four regiments of its militia to the relief of Gloucester, an event expected with the utmost anxiety.

An army of fourteen thousand men being at last raised and properly equipped, Essex put himself at their head, and marched with the utmost expedition through Bedford and Leicester. He was greatly inferior to the royalists in cavalry; and prince Rupert had been detached, at the head of a flying party to harass him in his march; but Essex, by the mere force of conduct and discipline eluded all the efforts of Rupert, and passed over those open champaign counties, without any material loss. On his approaching the city, the king was obliged to raise the siege, so that Essex entered Gloucester without opposition. He found on his arrival, that the garrison was reduced to the utmost extremity, and that had his march been deferred one day longer, and the royalists made another attack, the garrison must have submitted, for they had only one barrel of powder remaining, and their provisions were wholly consumed. The country people supplied both the army and garrison with plenty of necessaries, which they had carefully concealed from the royalists, pretending that their stock was entirely exhausted.

There is great reason to believe that Charles intended to give Essex battle if he returned by the same rout, and for that purpose continued for some time at Sudley-castle, and thence removed to Evesham. But Essex wisely declined an engagement in an open country where the king's cavalry under so intrepid a leader must have a decisive advantage. He lay five days at Tewkesbury, which was his first stage after leaving Gloucester; and seemed, by some preparations, to continue his rout to Worcester. But by a forced march during the night he reached Cirencester, and obtained the double advantage of passing unmolested through an open country, and of surprizing a convoy of provisions, escorted by three hundred royalists. Essex now directed his march towards London, through the northern parts of Wiltshire, where he thought the king's horse could act only with the least advantage. But by the indefatigable activity of prince Rupert, his rear was attacked at Awborn-chase, with so much success, that great numbers of his soldiers fell in the action. At last he reached Newbury; but was surprized to find, that the king, by forced marches had arrived before him, and was already in possession of the place. An action was now unavoidable, and the necessary preparations were made for the approaching conflict by the leaders of both armies.

The battle was fought with desperate valour and a steady bravery on both sides. Essex's horse were several times broke by the king's, but his infantry stood firm; and besides keeping up a continued fire, presented an invincible barrier of pikes against the furious attacks of prince Rupert, and those gallant troops of gentry who chiefly composed the royal cavalry. The London militia on this occasion behaved with remarkable valour; and tho' taken so lately from their ordinary occupations, equalled the most veteran soldiers. They had been trained by Skippon, and the enthusiasm with which they were inspired, rendered them strangers to fear. The engagement continued in all its fury till night put an end to the slaughter, and left the event undecided. Essex, who had done more than he intended, renewed not the action, but pursued his march towards London, which he reached in safety. His rear indeed was once put into confusion by the king's cavalry, but no material consequences ensued; Rupert with all his intrepidity could not stop the army of Essex, so as to bring on a second engagement. The king followed the parliamentary army, and took possession of Reading, where he established a garrison.

The loss sustained on both sides in the battle of Newbury was not so great as might have been expected from the length of the action, which began at six in the morning and continued till night: not more than two thousand men being slain in the field of battle. Among those who fell on the part of the royalists were the earls of Sunderland and Carnarvon, two noblemen of great worth and abilities. But what rendered the loss irreparable, was the death of Lucius Cary, lord viscount Falkland, secretary of state. He was one of the most learned persons of his age, and stood foremost in the list of patriots; while he was persuaded that the prerogatives of the crown incroached on the liberties of the subject. But when the royal power was confined within bounds; when the liberty of a subject had nothing to fear from the hand of authority, he embraced the defence of those limited powers which were still left to monarchy, and without which he was persuaded the English constitution could not subsist. He was, however, penetrated with the miseries of his country, and dreaded the success of his own party almost as much as that of the parliament. Persuaded that an advantageous peace could only be attained when the forces of both parties were nearly balanced, he was very desirous of opening a negotiation and settling the articles of a lasting peace on the solid basis of the English constitution. On the morning of the battle in which he fell, he had taken some care in dressing himself, and told his acquaintance that his motives for doing it were, his being unwilling the enemy should find his body in a slovenly indecent situation. "I am weary of the times," added he, "and foresee much misery to my country; but believe I shall be out of it ere night." He fell in the thirty-fifth year of his age.

Tho' the royal forces in the north were greatly superior to those of the parliament, yet they did not make that progress which might have been expected. The popularity of the earl, now erected marquis of Newcastle, was very great in the north; but he was opposed by two men, who about this time began to render themselves remarkable for their valour and military conduct. These were Sir Thomas Fairfax, son to the lord of that name, and Oliver Cromwell. The former had obtained some advantages over the royalists, especially at Wakefield; and the latter obtained a victory at Gainborough, over a party commanded by the gallant Cavendish, who perished in the action. Cromwell by a painful observance of the duties of the field, and a remarkable zeal for the cause, was daily rising in preferment. He had never seen any foreign service, and if we believe his contemporaries, his courage was not natural, but acquired by experience and reason. As he was a consummate judge of human nature, he began now to put in practice his favourite scheme, that of inspiring all whom he commanded, with an enthusiasm, that might more than balance all the sentiments of honour, loyalty and duty in the other party. He succeeded, and the regiment he commanded became famous for a ferocious courage, founded on fanaticism, that nothing could withstand. But notwithstanding the great abilities of Sir Thomas Fairfax and Cromwell, the advantages were on the side of the royal party in the north. They gained a complete victory over Fairfax at Atherton Moor, and dispersed his whole army. But the fortress of Hull greatly prevented the progress of the royalists, and it was determined to besiege the town. Newcastle accordingly set down before it with an army of fifteen thousand men. Hotham was no longer governor; both he and his son had entered into a correspondence with the royalists, and had fallen victims to the severity of the parliament. Sir Thomas Fairfax now commanded in that town, and by his military conduct and valour rendered all the attempts of Newcastle abortive, and he was obliged to raise the siege.

The successes of both armies being thus nearly equal, no prospect of peace appeared unless the Scots could be engaged to join in the war, it being concluded that their weight must turn the scale of the party they favoured. The commons had been early in their applications to the Scottish leaders; they had sent Pickering as their agent in Scotland, to carry on the negotiations. He represented the great danger that must attend the form of religion established in their country, if the royal party prevailed; and conjured them to succour their distressed brethren in England. The marquis, now duke of Hamilton, and the earl of Montrose had waited upon the queen at York, and laid before her the danger that threatened the kingdom from the negotiation of Pickering. Hamilton was for temporizing, but Montrose was of very different sentiments, and urged the necessity of having recourse to more violent methods, in order effectually to prevent the Scottish parliament from joining with the commons of England. But prepossessed in favour of Hamilton, Charles intrusted him and his friends with the affairs of Scotland; and at the same time earnestly requested that they would use their utmost endeavours to prevent the Scottish court from engaging in any negotiation with the committees which he understood the English parliament intended to send into that kingdom. If the duke of Hamilton and his brother the earl of Lanerk were sincere in their attachment they undertook more than they were able to perform. A parliament or convention of the states was called, tho' expressly against the king's consent. This measure was indeed chiefly effected by the Scots commissioners, who after concluding the late treaty in England, had entered into a close correspondence with the leaders of the parliament at London. The negotiation had indeed been carried on with so much secrecy, that when it was first mentioned in the house of commons, it created a general consternation. There is something extremely shocking in the idea of calling in a foreign enemy, but the desperate state of their affairs rendered it necessary. The earl of Rutland and the lord Grey of Warke, were named as commissioners for the house of lords; but the former had interest sufficient to get himself excused, and the latter, tho' considered as an unshaken friend to the cause of the parliament, so resolutely declined the service; that he was sent to the tower for his disobedience. Sir William Armin, and Sir Henry Vane the Younger, at last undertook the service, and were assisted by the same fanatical divines, who promised to bring over to their interest the Scottish clergy, on whose assistance the success of the negotiation in a great measure depended. Montrose sent timely information to the king, of the intrigues of the English parliament; and offered, on receiving a commission for that purpose, to declare the convention of the states, traitors to their country. Had this been done immediately, the attempts of the commons would, in all probability, have been rendered abortive; but the king listened so much to the counsels of Hamilton, that Montrose and his friends were neglected till affairs became desperate, and it was then too late. Hamilton indeed pretended, that he had done every thing in his power to prevent the Scots from agreeing with the English commissioners; but that all his endeavours were in vain. The truth is, a large arrear was still owing by the English parliament to the Scottish covenanters, and this must have been lost if the former had been ruined. The Scotch forces in Ireland had done nothing to answer the great expectations conceived of them; and tho' their general, the earl of Leven, had engaged they should never join the king, yet as the parliament was unable to supply Leven with money, it is hard to say what courses the soldiers might follow when pinched by necessity. Leven and his forces were therefore recalled from Ireland in order to prevent their inslitting in that kingdom, and passing over into England. Add to this, that the great spirit of Montrose, his virtuous popularity, his numerous dependents, and the inflexibility of his principles, rendered him now so formidable, not only to the covenanters, who were directed by Argyle, but also to the moderate party headed by the duke of Hamilton, that a coalition took place between these two parties against Montrose and the royalists. It hapened to the Scots, as to a people wanton with liberty, who having nothing to wish for, had a thousand things to fear. Hamilton, with all his moderation, made no secret of his disliking the revival of what he called hierarchical tyranhy in Scotland, and consequently he was united with the covenanters in the main principle of opposition to Charles. For tho' the true motives of it were ambition, and an inordinate desire of possessing the revenues of the church, yet religion was the avowed pretence. The English commissioners improved all the jealousies the Scots entertained with regard to the king's intentions. They laid before the convention the steps they had already taken for an entire uniformity of ecclesiastical government between the two kingdoms; they invited him to send members to the assembly of divines, then sitting at Westminster, for introducing a farther reformation of religion, and offered to proceed as far as the low condition of their affairs would admit, in discharging the arrears due to the Scottish army. But at the same time, they mentioned the necessity of securing all those invaluable blessings by the Scots preventing the ruin of the English parliament, which could only be effected by immediately raising an army for their assistance.

The prosperous condition of the royal affairs in England, added to the inviolable fidelity used by Charles in his concessions to the Scots, must have rendered abortive this rebellious proposition, had not some of the king's best friends been intimidated by a charge sent down against them by the English parliament, for holding a correspondence with the queen. Their letters had been intercepted by Fairfax, who forwarded them to London, whence they were sent to Scotland by the parliament. At the same time the king's friends were disunited among themselves. The duke of Hamilton and his brother, the earl of Lanerk finding they had been deceived by the covenanters, would willingly have joined Montrose and the declared royalists; but that nobleman now considered them as the worst of traitors. He imputed all the ascendancy the king's enemies had obtained in Scotland, to their counsels, and rejected, with indignation, all advances towards an accommodation. It is certain the Scots in general were at this time well affected to his majesty's person; nor did Montrose over-rate his own abilities, when he made an offer to the queen of taking the field against those noblemen who had voted for calling a convention of the states without the king's permission. His enemies were so sensible of this, that they offered to give him the second command in their armies, a proposal which he artfully eluded; and notwithstanding all the provocations he had received preserved an unshaken loyalty. Recourse was had to the same principles which had been before successful, that of undermining the civil authority by means of religion. They perceived unsurmountable difficulties should they make their first attack upon the state; but they knew that treason would find a ready admission thro' the doors of the church.

The assembly of divines in Scotland was sitting when the English commissioners arrived; and perhaps never were there seen together such a number of men so grossly ignorant, and so impiously arrogant, tho' dignified with a sacred function, and concealed under the disguise of public zeal. The episcopal clergy, who had a principal share in the government when the alteration in religion took place, had either been sequestered, or enjoyed very little credit with the covenanters, and every vacancy that happened had been filled with the weakest and most violent men their country produced. Henderson, their moderator, in any other company of clergymen would have made but a contemptible figure, while Rutherford, Gillespie, and the other leading members of the assembly, by their writings and deportment, rendered it justly a question whether they were more fit for the discipline of a school, or that of a mad-house. Tho' Argyle, Loudon and other great men, who had done so much for public liberty, had industriously encouraged this ignorance and frenzy in their teachers, they now began to feel the inconveniences of both. The weakest minds are susceptible of ambition; the lust of power is common to the wise and the foolish. The enthusiastic teachers were soon sensible of their own importance; and the torrent of zeal they poured out against popery, prelacy, and the like unmeaning words, grew more ungovernable, and swept before it all considerations of duty, loyalty, national independence, and public safety. When the English commissioners presented their letters and credentials from the Westminster divines, they were received as angels speaking from heaven; and without consulting any thing but their own frantic zeal, they proposed that a new league and covenant should be taken by the subjects of both kingdoms. Not contented with the establishment of presbyterian discipline in their own country, they indulged an ardent passion for propagating, by every method, that mode of religion in the neighbouring kingdoms. Persuaded, in the fervency of their zeal, that, by supernatural assistance, they should be enabled to carry their triumphant covenant to the gates of Rome itself, their joy was unbounded when a prospect opened of rendering it prevalent in England.

Vane, who in eloquence, address, capacity, as well as in art and dissimulation, was not surpassed by any person, even of that age so famous in active talents, framed this solemn league and covenant, which effaced all the former protestations and vows taken in both kingdoms, and long maintained its credit and authority. By this instrument they solemnly engaged themselves to pursue the universal extirpation of popery and prelacy in England, "as well as in Scotland, lest they should be partakers of other men's sins;" and undertook to pursue to extremity all incendiaries and malignants; terms which they extended as far, and to whom they pleased: and vowed an eternal adherence to a firm peace and union between the two kingdoms. They also vowed to preserve the reformed religion established in the church of Scotland; but, by the artifice of Vane, no declaration more explicit was made with regard to England and Ireland, than that these kingdoms should be reformed, according to the word of God, and the examples of the purest churches. The Scots zealots, indeed, deemed this expression entirely free from ambiguity; they regarded their own model as the only one which corresponded, in any degree, to such a description. Guthrie, afterwards bishop of Dunkeld, was the only member in the assembly of divines that perceived the ambiguity, or, at least, that had the courage to hint at what afterwards happened, namely, the danger that an independent party might afterwards root out presbytery, as well as prelacy; unless the assembly declared, in express terms, what plan of church-government they intended both nations should follow. His speech, however reasonable in itself, served only to draw upon him an enormous load of public reproach; and the work of the zealots was hurried on so fast, that the new solemn league and covenant was voted unanimously.

The convention of the states applauded the piety of the assembly; and, in the height of their zeal, ordered every one to swear to this covenant, under the penalties of being punished as enemies to religion, his majesty's honour, and the peace of his kingdoms; of having their goods and estates confiscated; of being rendered incapable of enjoying any benefit or office within the kingdom; of being cited before the next parliament, as enemies to religion, the king, and the state; and of receiving what farther punishment his majesty and the parliament should inflict upon them.

The natural result of this covenant was a treaty with the English parliament; by which the Scots engaged to raise an army of sixteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse. Desirous that the sword should carry conviction to all refractory minds, they prepared themselves, with great alacrity, to their military enterprises. Their levies were soon completed. The hopes of good pay and warm quarters, added to a favourable disposition for the cause, induced numbers to enlist; so that their army was ready, by the end of the year, to enter England, under their old general the earl of Leven.

Perceiving the tempest that was gathering in the north, Charles endeavoured to secure himself by every expedient in his power. Ireland seemed to promise assistance. He accordingly concluded a cessation of arms with the papists; and the duke of Ormond sent over considerable bodies of his forces to England, by which means the royal army was greatly augmented. The success of prince Maurice in the west also tended to raise the spirits of the king's party. He had formed the siege of Exeter, which was defended by the earl of Stamford, who was soon obliged to surrender the city. This was an important acquisition; but Maurice was so pleased with his new conquest, and the daily additions he received of men and money from the neighbouring counties, that he stayed too long at Exeter, without sending any assistance to colonel Digby, who had besieged Plymouth, a place of great importance. The royalists were, indeed, for some time, persuaded, that the town would be delivered up to him, by Sir Alexander Carew, the governor; but the design was discovered, and Carew sent prisoner to London. Digby, however, made himself master of mount Stamford, and had certainly taken Plymouth, had prince Maurice come in time to his assistance. But the prince, deceived by the negotiation with Carew, instead of marching to Plymouth, led his forces to Dartmouth, and, after a tedious siege, reduced the town. He then marched to Plymouth, and joined Digby; but it was now too late. The garrison, before his arrival, had received a reinforcement of six hundred men from Portsmouth, under the command of an intrepid and experienced officer, who made so noble a defence, that prince Maurice, after sustaining a considerable loss, was obliged to raise the siege.

It is impossible, in a general history, to enumerate all the warlike operations of this busy year. A war extended over the whole kingdom, left hardly room for any man to continue neuter, however agreeable to his wishes. Every county became a scene of horror and of blood. Not only forts and castles, but also the seats of the nobility and gentry, sustained long sieges. Each action, each siege, and almost each skirmish, did honour to some particular family; though, in such a multitude, many particulars that well deserved to be transmitted to posterity, are forgotten, and swept away among the refuse of things. But upon the whole, notwithstanding the exploits of Essex, Cromwell and Fairfax, the affairs of the king were in a much better situation than they were at the close of the preceding campaign. Lord Clarendon tells us, that he had now five armies in the field. The principality of Wales, an inconsiderable part of it excepted, was at his devotion. Plymouth, Poole, and Lyme, were the only places of strength in the western counties possessed by the parliament. Hull was the only considerable place they held in Yorkshire; and Nantwich, in Cheshire. But, on the other hand, the parliament had received infinite encouragement. The earl of Essex had distinguished himself, by his military talents, above either his rivals or his enemies. He was entirely possessed of the affections of his own soldiers, and therefore capable of executing the most dangerous service. The earl of Manchester was the idol of the associated counties, and even many of the royalists held him in great esteem. Though almost a stranger himself to the military science, yet Cromwell, perhaps the best soldier of the age, served under him with so much success, that the scale of war where he fought was greatly turned in favour of the parliament. The conduct, courage, and reputation of the elder and the younger Fairfax, did honour to the cause they had embraced. They lost no credit when vanquished, nor committed any acts of cruelty when victorious. This moderation prevented many in the north, who favoured the royal cause, from exerting themselves with with that vigour they would otherwise have done. Sir William Waller continued still the idol of the London populace, though his actions, since the battle of Lanedown, deserved very little applause. Many other officers distinguished themselves in supporting the same cause, and the parliament prudently rewarded even their miscarriages, when they were assured of their good intentions; and that they had done every thing in their power to deserve success.

But the eyes of all parties were now principally turned towards Scotland, it being chiefly from that kingdom they expected deliverance or feared destruction. It is almost incredible with what severity the divines in that kingdom proceeded against all who refused their covenant. Those preachers and professors of the gospel of peace, issued the most pre-emptory orders for seizing the goods, collecting the rents, and apprehending the persons of the royalists. Nor were they contented even with this unjust severity, dictated by their fanatical strain of devotion, they gave a commission to the soldiers in general, to put to death all who refused to take the covenant, and made any resistance to their being sent to prison. So shamefully were the precepts of the most benevolent religion wrested to serve the purposes of fanaticism and ambition!

There still remained in the English parliament some members, who, though they had been induced either by private ambition or by their zeal for civil liberty, to concur with the majority, still retained an attachment to the hierarchy, and to the ancient modes of worship. But in the present danger, which threatened their cause, all scruples were laid aside; and the covenant, by whose means alone they could expect to obtain so considerable a reinforcement as an accession of the whole Scottish nation, was received without opposition. The parliament therefore having first subscribed it themselves, ordered it to be received by all who acknowledged their authority. This caused great rejoicings among the Scots. They highly applauded themselves in being the happy instruments of extending their mode of worship, and dissipating that profound darkness in which they fancied, all the neighbouring nations were involved. Happy people, said the zealots, you will no longer suffer those badges of popery, the surplice, the tippet, and the corner-cap, to defile your characters.

The French ambassador had offered the mediation of his master to put an end to the horrors of civil discord, by concluding a lasting peace. Before the parliament had acquired the assistance of the Scots, they appeared to listen to his proposals; but he was now given to understand that his offers were rejected. They were, however, still distressed for money: they had sent a large sum to Scotland to put that army in motion, and the city seemed not forward to supply their wants. Essex relapsed into his former indifference, and seemed very desirous of putting an end to the war. He was far from being pleased with the steps taken by the parliament for introducing a foreign army, which must greatly increase the distresses of his country, already much too great; especially as his own troops were in great want of necessities. He therefore sent a message to both houses, acquainting them, that if his army, which lay at St. Alban's, was not speedily supplied, he must throw up his commission. Fairfax and lord Gray made similar complaints; and displayed, in pathetic language, the distresses of their troops. Answers were immediately dispatched, promising them relief, as soon as the necessary supplies could be raised: but they rejected every offer for putting an end to the war; and as a finishing blow to all terms of accommodation, formal preparations were made for the trial of Laud, archbishop of Canterbury.

A.D. 1644. The unfortunate primate still continued in prison, and had been for some time deprived of his estate and goods by the violence of the commons. Though it is certain that no subject had more largely contributed to the errors of government, yet his enemies, however keen and artful in their resentments, found insurmountable difficulties in forming a charge which could amount to high treason. His firmness had not forsaken him in his confinement; he still continued his opposition to the parliament, and obstinately refused to collate a person to a living, when recommended to him by the faction. But still his case was very different from that of the judges, because it was next to impossible to convict him legally of what he had said and recommended at the council-board, in which his chief crimes consisted. This did not, however, prevent the faction from treating him with the utmost severity. His books and papers were seized by an order from both houses, and his famous diary printed and published. But notwithstanding all the violence of his prosecutors, the articles against Laud were very defective, and they were obliged to have recourse to the same method used before in the case of Strafford, that of accumulated treason; though it was confessed, that no article, singly considered, amounted to treason. The charge against him, when properly reduced, consisted of three general heads: 1. "A traitorous endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and to introduce arbitrary and tyrannical government." 2. "A traitorous endeavour to subvert God's true religion as by law established, and to set up popish superstition and idolatry in its stead." 3. "An attempt to subvert the rights of parliament, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings." The most trifling allegations were brought to support this general charge. The most bitter speeches were made against him, and some of them delivered in the coarsest expressions. But notwithstanding all the spirit exerted against the primate, the lords proceeded very slowly in his trial; while he defended himself with so much vigour, reason and eloquence, that the prosecution was for some time at a stand. His ruin was, however, determined, and every expedient was to be tried to complete it. The populace were no sooner informed, that it was doubtful whether the lords would find him guilty, than petitions were signed by a great number of citizens, for bringing him and the bishop of Ely to justice. This produced so great a ferment, that the earl of Pembroke, a violent enemy to Laud, intimated to them, that if they delayed any longer to give the satisfaction expected by the commons, the citizens would assemble and demand justice, as they did in the case of Strafford. Mr. Strode, one of the managers of the prosecution against the archbishop, threw out a menace of the same kind, at the bar of the house of lords; but upon their resenting it, he declared he had not done it in consequence of any commission from the commons, and that he meant not any affront to the peers. The lords were satisfied with this apology, and he was dismissed without censure. The lords were, however, greatly intimidated, and the greater number attended not the service of the house. The primate's enemies took advantage of this session, and when no more than fourteen peers were in the house, Laud was voted guilty of endeavouring to subvert the laws, overthrow the protestant religion, and lay aside the use of parliaments. But none of these articles, nor even all of them conjoined, were found by the judges to amount to high treason by any known established law of the land; and the lords declared themselves of the same opinion in a conference with the commons. Disappointed in their expectations of capitally convicting Laud, his enemies appointed a fast to be held, in order to rouse the spirit of the populace. A petition against delinquents was presented to the lower house, and every symptom of a dangerous convulsion appeared. The commons were, however, obliged to have recourse to their legislative authority, and pass an ordinance for taking away the life of this aged prelate. But notwithstanding the low condition into which the house of peers had fallen, there appeared some some intention of rejecting this ordinance, and the popular leaders were again obliged to apply to the multitude, and to extinguish, by threats of new tumults, the small remains of liberty possessed by the upper house. Apprehensive of the dangerous consequences that might follow their attending their duty, and determined not to vote against the dictates of their consciences, only seven peers were in the house when the important question was decided.

The primate, who had long expected the fatal sentence, sunk not under its terrors. His fears dissipated in proportion as the fatal hour, that was to put a period to his mortal existence, approached. "No man (said he) can be more willing to send me out of life, than I am desirous to go." He behaved upon the scaffold with great firmness and decency, laid his head on the block with calmness and resignation, and it was severed from his body by one blow of the executioner.

Laud had enjoyed many sad hours of leisure during his imprisonment, to reflect, that the measure he had dealt to others was meted out to himself. He was an eminent instance that a great scholar may be a weak man, and a favourite minister a poor politician; that mistaken zeal is sometimes as fatal to the cause it would support, as premeditated treachery; and that nothing can more irritate the people of England, than to see religion affecting to hold the reins of government, and government actuated by the caprices of ecclesiastical authority. However mistaken, he was doubtless sincere, and actuated by religious motives in all his pursuits. It was this that supported him in the dreadful hour of trial, and rendered his last moments remarkably tranquil and composed. He suffered in the seventy-second year of his age.

While preparations were making for opening the campaign, the king summoned the members of both houses who adhered to his interest to meet at Oxford. He hoped, by this measure, to avail himself of the name of a parliament, so passionately cherished by the English nation. The house of peers was so full, that though many lords were employed in different parts of the kingdom, it contained more than double the number of members that voted at Westminster. But the house of commons did not amount to above one hundred and fifty, not more than half the other house of commons. The session was opened by a speech from the king, and the assembly, in order to enable him to recruit his army with more success, granted him the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, to be levied by way of loan upon the subject. The king accordingly circulated privy-seals, countersigned by the speakers of both houses, requiring the loan of particular sums from such persons as lived within the places subject to his authority.

As the king, in all his offers for peace, required nothing more than the re-establishment of the laws and constitution, and the same rights which had even been enjoyed by his predecessors, every discourse of peace, and every discussion of the terms on which that blessing could be obtained, tended greatly to promote his interest; especially as he offered, in order to facilitate so valuable an end, to pass an universal act of oblivion, and to grant a toleration or indulgence to tender consciences. On the other hand, the parliament studiously avoided, as much as possible, all advances towards negotiation; because the terms on which they were willing to conclude a peace, were of too exorbitant a nature for a general discussion. They were unwilling to expose to the eyes of the public their pretensions, though they well knew their partizans were blinded with the thickest veil of religious prejudices. Sensible of their advantages, the parliament at Oxford wrote the following letter to the earl of Essex, the only channel by which it could be conveyed to the commons at Westminster; Charles having declared that they were no longer a free parliament, and consequently entitled to no authority.

"My lord,

"His majesty having, by his proclamation, summoned all the members of both houses of parliament to attend him at Oxford; we whose names are underwritten, are here met and assembled, in obedience to his majesty's commands. His majesty was pleased to invite us, in the same proclamation, by these gracious expressions, that his subjects should see how willing he was to receive advice, for the preservation of the religion, laws, and safety of the kingdom, and, as far as in him lay, to restore it to its former peace and security (his chief and only end) from those whom they had trusted, though he could not receive it in the place where he appointed. This most gracious invitation hath not only been made unto us, but seconded and heightened by such unquestionable demonstrations of the deep and princely sense which possesses his royal heart of the miseries and calamities of his poor subjects, in this unnatural war, and of his most entire and passionate affections to redeem them from that sad and deplorable condition, by all ways possible, consistent either with his honour, or with the future safety of the kingdom, that as it were impiety to question the sincerity of them, so were it great want of duty and faithfulness in us (his majesty having declared, that he called us to be witnesses of his actions, and privy to his intentions) should we not testify, and witness to all the world the assurance we have of the piety and sincerity of both. We being entirely satisfied of this truth, cannot but confess, that, amidst our highest affections, in the deep and piercing sense of the present miseries and desolations of our country, and those further dangers threatened from Scotland, we are at length erected into some chearful and comfortable thoughts, that possibly we may yet (by God's mercy, if his justice have not determined this nation, for its sins, to total ruin and desolation) hope to be the happy instruments of our country's redemption from the miseries of war, and restitution to the blessings of peace.

"And we being desirous to believe your lordship, however engaged, a person likely to be sensibly touched with these considerations, have thought fit to invite you to that part in this blessed work, which is only capable to repair all our misfortunes, and to buoy up the kingdom from ruin; that is, by conjuring you, by all the obligations that have power upon honour, conscience, or public piety; that laying to heart, as we do, the inward bleeding condition of your country, and the outward more menacing destruction by a foreign nation, upon the very point of invading it, you will co-operate with us to its preservation, by truly representing to, and faithfully and industriously promoting with those by whom you are trusted, this following most sincere, and most earnest desire of ours; that, they joining with us in a right sense of the past, present, and more threatening calamities of this deplorable kingdom, some persons be appointed on either part, and a place agreed upon, to treat of such a peace, as may yet redeem it from the brink of desolation.

"This address we should not have made, but that his majesty's summons, by which we are met, most graciously proclaiming pardon to all without exception, is evidence enough, that his mercy and clemency can transcend all former provocations; and that he had not only made us witnesses of his princely intentions, but honoured us also with the name of being security for them. God Almighty direct your lordship, and those to whom you shall present these our most real desires, in such a course as may produce that happy peace, and settlement of the present distractions, which is so heartily desired and prayed for by us, and which may make us, Yours, &c."

This letter was subscribed by the prince of Wales, the duke of York, and forty-three noblemen, and sent by a trumpeter to the earl of Essex. But that nobleman,

nobleman, however disgusted with the furious measures of the parliament, and however desirous of a reasonable peace, was still more resolute to preserve an honourable fidelity to the trust reposed in him. He therefore, in his answer to the earl of Forth, the king's general, observed, that as the paper sent him neither contained any address to the two houses of parliament, nor any acknowledgment of their authority, he could not communicate it to them.

Desirous, however, of making another attempt for bringing about a peace, Charles determined to have recourse to the parliament at Westminster. A safe conduct was accordingly demanded from Essex for two persons to treat upon an accommodation. Essex readily complied, and the king accordingly sent the following message for concluding a treaty of peace.

“ Out of our most tender and pious sense of the sad and bleeding condition of this our kingdom, and our unwearied desires to apply remedies, which, by the blessing of God, may recover it from utter ruin; by the advice of the lords and commons of parliament, assembled at Oxford, we do propose and desire, that a convenient number of fit persons may be appointed and authorised by you, to meet, with all convenient speed, at such place as you shall nominate, with an equal number of fit persons, whom we shall appoint and authorise, to treat of the ways and means to settle the present distractions of this our kingdom, and to procure a happy peace; and particularly how all the members of both houses may securely meet in a free and full convention of parliament, there to treat, consult, and agree upon such things as may conduce to the maintenance and defence of the true reformed protestant religion, with due consideration to all just and reasonable ease of tender consciences; to the settling and maintaining our just rights and prerogatives; of the rights and privileges of parliament; the laws of the land; the liberty and property of the subject; and all other expedients that may conduce to the blessed end of a firm and lasting peace, both in church and state, and a perfect understanding between us and our people; wherein no endeavours of ours shall be wanting. And God direct your hearts in the ways of peace.

The commons were very unwilling to open any negotiation for a peace; and, at the same time, thought it would be imprudent to lay aside the proposal, lest the people should imagine they were determined to reject every offer for an accommodation. After long debates in the upper house, the peers sent the following paper to the commons: “ That the lords have observed in this letter from his majesty, among other things, that what is proposed in it is by the advice of the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Oxford, the very same title given to this parliament; which puts them at Oxford on an equality with us, though they are persons who have, contrary to their duty, deserted the parliament, and have contributed to the maintenance of the war against it, and therefore are, and may be justly excluded.

“ Their lordships further observe, that though there are in the letter some general words, for religion, ease of tender consciences, his majesty's just prerogatives, rights and privileges of parliament, laws of the land, and liberty and property of the subjects; yet the only expedient offered for these ends is to treat, how the members of both houses may securely meet in a full and free convocation of parliament; whereof no other conclusion can be made, than that this is not a full and free convention of parliament; and that to make a full and free convention, the presence of those at Oxford is necessary.

“ Their lordships therefore offer it to the house of commons, to desire their concurrence herein, that a letter may be written, in very plain and humble language, to his majesty; representing to him, among other things, that the continuance of this parliament here is established by a law passed by himself; in which (as in all other laws of the kingdom) he is sworn to maintain, as we are sworn to our allegiance; that we must in duty, and are bound and resolved, with our lives and fortunes, to defend and preserve the just rights and full powers of this parliament; that as we have used all means for a just and safe peace, so we will never be wanting to do our utmost for the procuring of it; and as the only means by which we can hope to effect so desirable an end, we do humbly and earnestly desire his majesty to come to his parliament by such a day as shall be named; and that if he will not, we must use such means, and make such provision for the present and future preservation of religion and of the kingdom, as, in the wisdom of the two houses, shall be thought fit and necessary.

“ Their lordships desire, that this letter may be speedily dispatched; and also, that a declaration to the kingdom upon this, and the former letter from Oxford, be drawn up and published, to undeceive the people of the artifices they contain, under the pretence of peace, to set up another parliament; and that if the house of commons approve thereof, it may be referred to the committee of the two kingdoms, to prepare both for the two houses.”

The commons were of the same opinion with the lords; and a letter was accordingly dispatched to the king at Oxford, refusing to open any negotiation, unless he would acknowledge them to be the only parliament: and the king, who knew what small hopes there appeared of any accommodation, refused to abandon the pretensions he had assumed, nor acknowledge the two houses at Westminster more openly for a free parliament.

The great sums of money that had been sent from England to Scotland, and the flattering assurances the Scots had received, that they should now be entitled to all the privileges of Englishmen, had the desired effect; and the Scottish army marched for England with great alacrity. But notwithstanding all these advantages, the rebellion in that country was far from being general. Some of the greatest men were so thoroughly convinced of the good intentions of Charles, that they refused to accept of any command raised against the royal party in England. But the clergy and populace were of a very different opinion; they made no scruple of rushing into the field without provocation, and in a quarrel in which they had no concern. Had they known their true interests, they ought rather to have joined the opposite party, as the surest means of establishing the liberties and privileges they enjoyed on a solid foundation. The Scottish army was in excellent order, and consisted of eighteen thousand foot, three thousand horse, and six hundred dragoons, all of them commanded by their own countrymen. A committee of the English, as well as their own parliament, attended them as field deputies, and they entered England on the nineteenth of January. They passed the Tyne on a bridge of boats, and summoned the town of Newcastle, which had been fortified by the care and vigilance of Sir Thomas Glenham, to surrender. They did not, however, make any attempt upon the place, because the marquis of Newcastle lay at Durham with an army of fourteen thousand men. Nor did they continue idle; they made themselves masters of the castles of Wark and Morpeth; and fortified a small sea-port town called Blyth, for the conveniency of receiving provisions. They were, however, soon reduced, by a great want of forage and other necessities; and the expedition would probably have been rendered abortive, had not the marquis been obliged to march back to the defence of York.

Colonel Bellasis, whom he had left with a considerable body of troops, was totally routed at Selby by Sir Thomas Fairfax. This misfortune obliged Newcastle to abandon Durham. Afraid of being inclosed between two armies, he retreated to York; and the Scottish general having joined Fairfax, they blocked up that city. But as the combined forces were not numerous enough to invest so large a place divided by a river, they contented themselves with preventing any reinforcement of troops from joining the marquis. Some time before Newcastle's retreat, another party of the parliament's forces, under the command of Meldrum, had besieged Newark, a place of the utmost importance to the royalists, as it kept open a communication between the king's southern and northern quarters. Prince Rupert was, therefore, ordered to attempt the relief of that fortress. Rupert was at Chester when he received the order, but assembling immediately his troops, which amounted to about seven thousand men, he advanced with such expedition to Newark, that he surprized Meldrum's army, and after killing about five hundred men, he disarmed the rest, and seized all their cannon, carriages, and baggage. This defeat struck terror into the garrisons of the neighbouring towns, and Gainborough, Lincoln, Slyford, and several other places were abandoned by the parliament's forces. The prince also relieved Latham-house, which had been besieged by a body of two thousand men, and gallantly defended for eighteen weeks, by the counts of Derby. He took Bolton by storm, put the garrison to the sword, and marched to Liverpool, which made no resistance. His army was now increased to ten thousand men, full of spirits, and flushed with victory.

While the prince continued at Liverpool, the earl of Manchester made himself master of Lincoln, and joined the Scots and the army of Fairfax before York. That city, though vigorously defended by Newcastle at the head of his army, was soon reduced to extremities; and the parliament's generals after enduring the hardships of a winter's campaign, and suffering great losses from skirmishes with the enemy, flattered themselves that all their labours would now be crowned with success. But they were soon alarmed with the news that prince Rupert was approaching. That intrepid general, having joined Sir Charles Lucas, who commanded Newcastle's cavalry, hastened to the relief of York, at the head of an army of twenty thousand men. The combined army immediately raised the siege, and retreated to Marston-moor, in order to give battle to the royalists. Prince Rupert, informed of their intention, approached the city by another quarter, and interposing the river Ouse between him and the enemy, safely joined his forces with those of Newcastle. The marquis endeavoured to persuade him, that, having so successfully effected his purpose, he ought to be contented with the present advantage, and leave the enemy, now much diminished by their losses, and discouraged by their ill success, to dissolve by those mutual dissensions, which had taken place among them. Had Rupert listened to this advice, he had, in all probability, triumphed over the enemy without striking a blow. The Scots had found themselves greatly disappointed during their march, in which they thought to have met with little or no resistance. They had expected the plunder of the richest counties in England, and their generals thought of nothing less than of making the English officers serve under them. In all these particulars they were deceived, and their rough, vexatious manners, rendered them excessively odious to the English commanders. Their avarice was insatiable, and all their words and conduct shewed that good pay and the hopes of plunder, were the chief motives that excited them to undertake the expedition. When these failed, and when they found that the money granted by the parliament was not so punctually paid as it had been liberally voted, they began to talk of returning to their own country to defend it against the attempts of Montrose, who was then in arms, and acting under the king's commission. They would infallibly have carried this design into execution, had it not been for the hopes of an engagement, when they flattered themselves of acquiring riches by plundering the baggage of the enemy. But when prince Rupert reached York, by taking a different rout, they became more sullen than ever. Manchester, Fairfax and Cromwell, were, by no means, fond of their company, while this morose, discontented humour prevailed; they would have thought it less dishonourable to have submitted to a generous enemy, than to be insulted by their own needy mercenaries. Newcastle was no stranger to these divisions among them, and urged the propriety of continuing quiet in their quarters and suffer their enemies to perish by their own dissensions. But these arguments were urged in vain; fighting was the element of prince Rupert. He entertained the most invincible contempt of the Scots; and he had a few days before received a letter from the king, containing little less than a positive command to fight them upon almost any terms, even after he had relieved York. But the greatest misfortune was a misunderstanding between the prince and the marquis of Newcastle, whose characters agreed only in personal courage, and a strong attachment to the king's service. The marquis loved fighting; but hated the fatigues of war; the prince loved both. The marquis had served the king with his person and fortune, the prince with his person only. The marquis trusted greatly to King, his lieutenant-general; the prince surveyed and directed every thing in his own person. The marquis was fond of state and ceremony; the prince despised both; and each was jealous of the great merits of the other, with regard to the favour of the sovereign, who equally loved and honoured them both.

When Rupert entered York, he took upon himself the command of the whole army, and told the marquis, that he intended the next day, the second of July, to draw out the garrison and give battle to the enemy. The officers who could use the greatest freedom with the prince, used every argument in their power to dissuade him from this resolution; but all their attempts were in vain; the prince continued fixed to his purpose; and the marquis, that he might not incur the least imputation of fear, submitted to the order; but at the same time resolved to serve under the prince in no other capacity, than that of captain of his own troop of horse.

The enemy, not imagining the prince would hazard a battle in his situation, were filing off towards Tadcaster, Cawood, and Selby, in order to cover the east-riding of Yorkshire; and render it more difficult for the royalists to obtain supplies, when they were agreeably surprized to perceive, that the prince, by the dispositions he was making, intended to fight them. They immediately recalled all their advanced parties, and formed the line of battle. While these dispositions were making in the parliamentary army, the garrison of York were so discontented at the behaviour of the prince towards their favourite general, that it was with the utmost difficulty the marquis and general King persuaded them to march out of the city and join the royal army. This junction being completed, the prince formed his line of battle. He himself commanded the right wing, which consisted of five thousand horse. The generals Goring and Potter, commanded the main body; and Sir Charles Lucas and colonel Henry, the left wing: the whole army consisted of seventeen thousand foot, nine thousand horse, and a train of twenty-five pieces of cannon. The parliamentary army were, at least, equal to that of the prince in number. Sir Thomas Fairfax and colonel Lambert, commanded the right wing, in which the Scottish cavalry was posted. His father, the lord Fairfax, and general Leven, commanded the main body; and the earl of Manchester, assisted by Cromwell, the left wing. Before the battle began the marquis of Newcastle and his friends again desired the prince to suspend the action; assuring ing him, that they hourly expected a reinforcement of three thousand men from the north, and that Montrose was actually on his march, at the head of an army, to join them from Scotland. But the prince was deaf to every argument: he would listen to nothing but that of fighting the enemy immediately. The battle was begun by prince Rupert, who charged, with his usual fury, the left wing of the parliamentary army, where Cromwell conducted the choicest troops, enured to danger under that determined leader, animated by zeal, and confirmed by the most rigid discipline. This body stood firm, and charged in their turn with so much impetuosity, that the cavalry of the royalists gave way; and the infantry that stood next to them, was also borne down, and put to flight. Newcastle's regiment, alone, resolute to conquer or perish, obstinately kept their ground, and maintained, by their dead bodies, the same order in which they had first been ranged. Sir Thomas Fairfax and colonel Lambert, also broke through the royalists; and transported by the fury of pursuit, soon reached their victorious friends, who were also in pursuit of the enemy. But this indiscreet impetuosity had nearly proved fatal to the parliamentary army. Sir Charles Lucas, who commanded in the right wing, perceiving that the tempest was past, restored order to his broken troops, and made so furious an attack on the parliamentary cavalry, that they were thrown into disorder, pushed upon their own infantry, and the whole wing put to flight. Animated with this success, the royalists flattered themselves that the difficulty was over, and were on the point of seizing the carriages and baggage of the enemy, when Cromwell appeared in his return from pursuing the broken forces of the other wing. Both parties seemed astonished when they perceived that another battle must be fought before the victory, which each thought their own, could be obtained. The charge was again renewed with its former fury, and the balance of victory for some time suspended: but after the utmost efforts of courage by both armies, the parliamentary forces prevailed. Rupert's whole army was pushed off the field of battle, and his train of artillery taken by the enemy. About four thousand of the royalists were slain, and fifteen hundred taken prisoners, among whom were Sir Charles Lucas, and several other persons of note. Not above three hundred soldiers fell on the parliament's side, among whom were a Scotch lord, and a lieutenant-colonel.

Enraged to find all his successful labours rendered abortive by one act of fatal temerity, the marquis of Newcastle determined to pass over to the continent, and abandon a party where he met with such unworthy treatment. Munificent and generous in his expences; polite and elegant in his taste; courteous and humane in his behaviour; the marquis had brought a great accession of friends and of credit to the cause he embraced: but he was now lost to the royal party. He repaired immediately to Scarborough with a few friends, where he found a vessel ready to sail, and which landed him safely in France. He continued abroad till the restoration; and, tho' reduced to necessity, he scorned to acknowledge the usurped authority of those who assumed the government of England, and enjoyed his opulent fortune.

The resolution of Rupert, was equally precipitate. For though the cavalry of the royalists was, in a manner, still entire, and though the greater part of the infantry had escaped into York, he determined to abandon that city, and march his army towards Oxford, which was still in the king's possession. Rupert had no sooner left the city of York, than it was besieged by the parliament's army. Glenham, who commanded the garrison, made a brave defence, but was at last obliged to capitulate on honourable terms. Lord Fairfax was made governor, and a thousand horse were sent into Lancashire to join the parliamentary forces in that quarter, and watch the motions of prince Rupert.

The king's forces, in the southern quarters, wore also a melancholy aspect in the beginning of the year; but they were conducted with greater abilities and greater success. Apprehensive that the parliamentary forces would attempt the siege of Oxford, Charles sent the queen to Exeter, where he hoped she might be delivered, unmolested, of the child, of which she was now pregnant, and also escape easily into France if pressed by the forces of the enemy. Essex and Waller, who commanded the two armies of the parliament, received orders to join their forces and march towards Oxford; and if they found the king continue in that city to besiege it, and by one decisive blow put an end to the war. Charles ordered a rendezvous of his forces at Marlborough; and after proroguing his parliament at Oxford, came in person to the camp, and reviewed his army, which consisted of six thousand foot, and four thousand horse. As soon as the armies under Essex and Waller began their march towards Oxford, Charles drew his garrison out of Reading, and demolished the fortifications; the place being in no condition to stand a siege, if attacked by so powerful a force. It is not easy to say what might have been the consequence had the junction, between the forces of Essex and Waller been effected, as they amounted to upwards of twenty thousand men; but these two generals hated each other so heartily, that they always found means to evade the orders of the parliament. Essex took possession of Abingdon, the place being unaccountably abandoned by the king's forces. Waller, at the same time, marched his forces to Farnham, so that nothing hindered the two armies from joining: for the royalists, having abandoned Reading and Abingdon, the parliamentary army became masters of Berkshire, and the king was obliged to retreat to the northward of Oxford. It was now thought that the condition of Charles was desperate; for Essex having gained the pass of Anslow-bridge, and Waller that of Newbridge, their armies were between him and Oxford, the only place of strength he was possessed of in the southern quarters. Charles retreated to Worcester, and it was expected at London, that the king must either deliver himself up to Essex, or throw himself into the hands of the parliament. Possibly this might have been the case, had a good understanding prevailed between the parliament's generals; but their dissensions gave Charles an opportunity of gaining two days' march of Essex, who now ordered Waller to pursue him; and took upon himself to prosecute the western expedition, originally assigned to the other. Waller complained loudly of Essex for usurping his command, and produced his orders from the parliament; but Essex was absolute, and threatened to try Waller by a court martial; if he refused to obey.

Charles had now refreshed his army at Worcester; but fearing to be shut up in that city by Waller, who had now reached Evesham, retired with his army to Bewdley, and directed his course towards Shrewsbury. Waller, who expected a large reinforcement, marched forwards, extending his quarters by degrees along the east side of the Severn; till he placed himself between the king's army and Shrewsbury. This was the very thing the king desired; for returning upon his own foot-steps he reached Oxford; and having reinforced his army from that garrison, marched, in his turn, in quest of Waller.

After several marches and counter-marches, the two armies faced each other at Cropedy-bridge, near Banbury, but the Cherwell ran between them. On the twenty-ninth of June, Waller, who had now received considerable reinforcements, drew up his army in order of battle, but in so advantageous a situation, that Charles made a feint of marching towards Daventry, leaving a party of cavalry to guard Cropedy-bridge. This motion drew Waller from his advantageous post; and perceiving that the king's van was at a considerable distance from their rear, he attacked the party at Cropedy-bridge, at the head of fifteen hundred horse, a thousand foot, and eleven pieces of cannon. The post was soon abandoned by the royalists; but his detachment had no sooner passed the bridge, with an intention to fall upon the rear of the king's army, than they were attacked, repulsed, and pursued with considerable loss. Stunned and dispirited by this blow, the army of Waller melted away by desertion; and the king thought he might safely leave it, and march to the westward against Essex, who had obliged prince Maurice to raise the siege of Lyme, and made himself master of Weymouth and Taunton.

Charles received so many reinforcements during his march, that he now appeared in the field with an army superior to that of the enemy. Prince Maurice hovered round the camp of Essex, with a flying army of four thousand horse and foot, cut off his convoys, and perpetually harassed his rear during his march. Essex was now greatly distressed, and knew not what course to pursue: he was incapable of fighting the royal army, and had no place of strength whither he might retreat till he received reinforcements. A council of war was called, when lord Roberts proposed their marching into Cornwall. He observed, that the greater part of the inhabitants of that county was well affected to the parliament, and would join their army as soon as the troops appeared among them; that there was the greatest reason to think the king would not attempt to follow them into Cornwall, because he must by that means be exposed to the danger of putting himself between two fires, as it was more than probable Sir William Waller would soon be in a condition to follow him, and harass his rear. These reasons had the desired effect, and a resolution was taken of marching directly into Cornwall.

The king followed the parliament's army, and it was proposed, in a council of war, to attack Essex in his camp; but Sir Richard Granville being daily expected from the western parts of Cornwall with a considerable body of forces, it was thought more expedient to cut off his provisions, and force him to surrender at discretion. Essex informed the parliament of his danger, and desired that a body of troops might be sent to fall upon the king's rear. General Middleton received a commission to execute that service, but he came too late. The army of Essex, cooped up in a narrow corner at Lestithiel, deprived of all forage and provisions, and seeing no prospect of success, was reduced to the last extremity. The king pressed upon them on one side; prince Maurice on another; Sir Richard Granville on a third; and Sir Jacob Ashley on a fourth. Essex, Roberts, and some of the principal officers, escaped in a boat to Plymouth: Balfour, with his horse, passed the king's guards in a thick fog, and got safe to the garrisons of his own party. Skippon, who commanded the foot, had no method of escaping; he was therefore obliged to capitulate; by which it was agreed, that they should deliver up their arms, artillery, baggage and ammunition. This was accordingly performed; and the soldiers being conducted to the parliament's quarters, were dismissed.

Charles acquired great reputation, even among his enemies, for his conduct in this campaign; and indeed it must be owned, that it fell little short of the best generals of that age. After his affairs were, in all appearance, desperate, he had reduced two strong armies of his enemies, commanded by their best officers, to the very situation which he himself had dreaded but a few weeks before. He triumphed over those very persons whom it was thought almost impossible for him to escape. Middleton attempted to intercept the king's provisions, and was, in some attempts, successful; but Sir Francis Doddington watched him so narrowly, that, after many bloody skirmishes, he was obliged to retire to Sherborne.

But notwithstanding these successes in the west, the king's affairs were in great disorder, both in the midland counties and the north. He therefore staid no longer than was necessary to recruit and refresh his army, after their long and tedious marches. When he reached Chard, in Somersetshire, he published a proclamation, wherein he declared, that he was so desirous of restoring the public tranquillity, that he was determined to march to the neighbourhood of London, in order to open a negotiation with the parliament, and invited all his loyal subjects to assist him in procuring so desirable an end. On the ninth of October, he received a petition from the gentlemen and freeholders of Somersetshire, for liberty to wait upon his majesty nearer London, to become petitioners to the parliament, and request them to embrace his majesty's offers of peace; adding, that if their petition was refused, they would spend their lives and fortunes in his majesty's defence.

During the king's stay in the west, colonel Gage, one of the royal officers in Oxford, undertook the difficult service of relieving Basing-house, belonging to the marquis of Winchester, which colonel Norton, at the head of a large detachment of the parliament's forces, had besieged upwards of three months. Gage had above forty miles to march from Oxford, and his route lay near the garrisons of Abingdon and Reading. He, however, performed the task with great applause; for though his party was not strong enough to raise the siege, yet he found means to throw into the house a large convoy of ammunition and provisions. He afterwards returned to Oxford without suffering any loss. The town of Banbury, and the castle of Dennington, were both relieved; and the king's army, after driving Waller out of Andover, marched unmolested to Newbury.

The parliament were alarmed; and it was determined to oppose the king with very numerous forces. They had now armed anew the subdued forces of Essex, and ordered Manchester and Cromwell to march with their recruited troops from the eastern association. All these forces, joining with those of Waller and Middleton, formed an army far superior to that of the king, and advanced to give him battle. Newbury was a second time the scene of the bloody animosities between the English. In this battle both parties were guilty of overights. The king quitted his advantageous situation, and drew his army out into Speen-field, situated between Newbury and Dennington-castle, thinking that he could there be attacked only in front. But in a council of war held at Cheveley, it was resolved, that Waller, assisted by the London brigade, and the forces of Essex, should take possession of Speen-hill; that the earl of Manchester should advance to Shaw; that the former should begin the attack, and the latter, on a signal given, force the pass at Shaw, by which the king's dispositions must be broken. This was, however, a very dangerous service, as Charles was in possession not only of Dennington, near which Skippon, who commanded Waller's infantry, must pass, but also of Doleman-house, which was fortified, and flanked Manchester's forces. Waller, however, with the officers under him, acted with great intrepidity and success. They made a large circuit to avoid the fire of Dennington-castle, but their rear suffered very considerably by a fallly made from the garrison. After escaping this danger, they attacked the king's troops about three in the afternoon on the twenty-seventh of October, and not only drove them from their works, but also took nine pieces of cannon. In this attack the soldiers of Essex, exhorting one another to repair their broken honour, and revenge the disgrace at Lestithiel, charged with the utmost fury, and some of the cannon they recovered, being the same they had lost in Cornwall, could not forbear embracing them with tears of joy. But the earl of Manchester had not the same success in attacking the passage at Shaw: for though he passed the Kennet on the left, and seemed at first to have the advantage; yet Goring, putting himself at the head of Cleveland's brigade, drove him back with great slaughter; and another person attempting to take Doleman-house, was obliged to retire with considerable loss; and night coming on before the action on that side could be renewed, put an end to the battle.

This was one of the most obstinate engagements that happened during the whole course of the civil war. Both sides had committed oversights; and both endeavoured to repair them by performing wonders; and the field must have been more bloody, had not darkness intervened; and stopped the slaughter. Charles, however, feared that a second engagement would be fatal to his army, and determined to avoid it. He therefore left his baggage and cannon in Dennington-castle, and immediately retreated to Wallingford, and thence to Oxford. Soon after his arrival, he was joined by prince Rupert, at the head of a considerable body of cavalry, and a good train of artillery. Strengthened by this reinforcement, he ventured to advance towards the enemy, now employed in the siege of Dennington-castle. Essex, detained by sickness, had not joined the army since his misfortune in Cornwall. Manchester, who commanded in his absence, though his forces were much superior to those of the king, declined an engagement, notwithstanding the pressing solicitations of Cromwell, who conjured him not to neglect so favourable an opportunity of putting an end to the war. The king, therefore, carried off his artillery from Dennington-castle, in the face of the enemy, and by that means sufficiently repaired the honour that had been lost by his retreat from the battle of Newbury. But this was not all the advantage Charles gained by this action; it excited animosities between Manchester and Cromwell, equal, at least, to those that before subsisted between Essex and Waller, and which had proved so favourable to his majesty. The battle of Newbury put an end to the campaign, and both armies were soon after distributed into winter quarters.

But though the military operations were over for a season, the contests between the different generals increased when they repaired to London: the whole city and parliament were agitated by their mutual reproaches and accusations. These, indeed, owed their rise to a party, which had been some time formed in the parliament, but which the dread of the royal power had hitherto suppressed. The great success of the parliament's armies now called them into action. This party were called independents, a sect hitherto blended with the presbyterians, and acquired distinction only from the destruction of monarchy. Enthusiasts by system, infatuated with the idea of religious perfection, and believing that they were all supernaturally inspired, they would admit of neither rites, nor bishops, nor ministers. They pretended that the holy spirit, by its inward communications, placed both poor and rich upon a level, and made the ignorant equal to the learned. They hated royalty no less than hierarchy. The object of the puritans was to restrain, theirs to annihilate the prerogative; and adding a profound policy to their absurd reveries, they executed what others thought impossible. Cromwell, who was at the head of the independents, had a capacity adapted to the greatest enterprizes, the ardour of an enthusiast, the daring spirit of the leader of a party, the dissimulation of a hypocrite, the talents of a general, and the genius and address of a statesman. He declaimed, with great violence, in the house of commons, against the conduct of Manchester, whom he accused of not pushing the war with the necessary vigour; especially of neglecting, at Dennington-castle, the opportunity of totally defeating the royal army. "I shewed him evidently (said Cromwell) how this success might be obtained; and only desired leave, with my own brigade of horse, to charge the king's army in their retreat; leaving it in the earl's choice, if he thought proper, to remain neuter, with the rest of the forces: but notwithstanding all my importunity, he positively and obstinately refused his consent; and gave no other reason but that, if we met with a defeat, there was an end of our pretensions; we should all be rebels, and traitors, and be executed and forfeited by the law."

These harsh censures provoked Manchester, who, in his turn, accused Cromwell with seditious speeches, which tended to ruin the parliament. He told the house, that a scheme having been proposed; which it seemed improbable the parliament would agree to, Cromwell insisted upon it, and said; "My lord, if you will stick firm to honest men, you shall find yourself at the head of an army, which will give law both to king and parliament." This discourse (continued Manchester) made the greater impression upon me, because I knew the lieutenant-general to be a man of very deep designs; and he has even ventured to tell me, that it never would be well with England till I was Mr. Montague, and there was not a lord or peer in the kingdom. The sharpness of these disputes alarmed the independents; they perceived that they must now carry their scheme into execution, or abandon all thoughts of effecting it; and accordingly they formed the resolution of new-modelling the army. Their maxim was, that he who draws his sword against the king should throw away the scabbard. They were for decisive actions, and officers that would hesitate at no enterprize. They were, indeed, far inferior in number, both in the parliament and in the kingdom, to the presbyterian party, but they had address sufficient, in the end, to carry their design into execution.

A solemn fast, by their influence, was voted, in order to implore the assistance of heaven. Some of the most furious preachers lamented the dissensions in parliament, and charged the members with interested views. They complained of the perfidious remissness of the leaders, who, instead of putting a speedy end to the war, fought only, by prolonging it, to enrich themselves with the substance of the people. They intreated the Lord to raise up men more worthy to be the instruments of his providence. The day following, these discourses were represented by the independent party in parliament, as the manifest inspiration of the Holy Spirit. The necessity of finding some remedy for these disorders was insisted on. The members were conjured to divest themselves of all personal interest and lucrative employments. Cromwell remarked, that since the commencement of the war, a number of able officers had been formed, who were capable of conducting the most dangerous expeditions; that the troops wanted a reform on a new plan, and the success would depend on the extirpation of abuses. These representations produced the desired effect. A committee was appointed to frame what was called the "Self-denying Ordinance," by which the members of both houses were excluded from all civil and military employments, except a few officers, who were specified. This ordinance gave occasion to the most furious debates, and, for some time, rent both the parliament and city into factions. It was observed by the independent party, that the discipline of the army did not correspond to the merit of the officers; nor were there any hopes, till the present vices and disorders, which prevailed among the soldiers, were repressed by a new model; that the forces of the parliament would ever be attended with signal success in any undertaking. The presbyterians, on the contrary, represented, that besides the ingratitude of discarding, by fraud and subtlety, so many noble persons, by whom the parliament had been hitherto chiefly supported, they would find it extremely difficult to supply the place of men, now formed by experience to command and authority: that the rank alone, possessed by such as were members of either house, prevented envy, retained the army in obedience, and gave weight to military orders: that greater confidence might safely be reposed in men of family and fortune, than in mere adventurers, who would be apt to entertain separate views from those embraced by the persons who employed them. But notwithstanding these reasons, which were urged with great force and eloquence, the bill passed both houses of parliament. Essex, Warwick, Manchester, Denbigh, Waller, Brereton, and many others, resigned their commissions, and received the thanks of parliament for their services. But at the time when the other officers resigned, care was taken to send Cromwell, at the head of a body of horse, to the relief of Taunton, besieged by the royalists, so that he kept both his commission and his seat in parliament, notwithstanding he had himself been one of the principal promoters of the Self-denying Ordinance.

A.D. 1645. Sir Thomas Fairfax was now appointed general, and it was voted to increase the army to twenty-two thousand men. Fairfax was equally eminent for courage and for humanity; but he was entirely governed by Cromwell, who was in fact the commander of the army. The new model was introduced with all the dispatch the importance of the cause required. Such officers only were appointed as the independents could confide in. A rigid discipline increased the religious fervor of the soldiers. Excited by the example, and the exhortations of their officers, who served them for ministers, they passed in prayer, in conference, and in spiritual lectures, all the time they could spare for amusement or repose. Their inflamed imagination raised them above the character of humanity. Dangers and death were nothing to men in a state of spiritual ecstasy; they seemed the avenues to heaven. In the royal army, on the contrary, there was nothing but licentiousness and disorder. The soldier instead of pay, subsisted by committing every species of robbery. The officer ridiculed the enthusiasm of the parliamentarians, without reflecting on the effects it would produce. This contrast indicated the most fatal events; nor were these at a considerable distance.

While Fairfax and Cromwell were employed in new modelling the army, the negotiations for a peace were carrying on between the king and parliament, but with very little hopes of success. The conferences were opened at Uxbridge; Charles having retracted his former declaration, that the two houses at Westminster were not a free parliament. But it soon appeared that peace was still at a considerable distance; the demands of the parliament amounting to nothing less than a total abolition of monarchy. The cessation of arms with the Irish was to be declared null and void; and after the catholics in that kingdom should be subdued, the parliament was to nominate the governor and magistrates of that kingdom. It was required that the whole military power should be given up to the parliament for seven years; and that afterwards, instead of returning to the king, it should be regulated by a bill. The parliament were not contented with a toleration in religion, they demanded a total abolition of episcopacy, and a subscription to the covenant throughout the kingdom. Even the principal officers of the crown, and the judges, were to be nominated by the parliament, and the power of making war and peace was wholly to depend upon their determinations. Charles offered that the militia should be intrusted, during three years, to twenty commissioners nominated either by common agreement between him and the parliament, or the one half by him and the other by the parliament. And after the expiration of that term, he insisted, that he should be again reinstated in his constitutional authority over the militia. With regard to religion Charles agreed, that indulgence should be granted to tender consciences, in respect to ceremonies; that the bishops should exercise no act of jurisdiction or ordination, without the consent and council of such presbyters as should be chosen by the clergy of each diocese; that they should reside constantly in their diocese, and be obliged to preach every Sunday; that pluralities should be abolished; that abuses of every kind in the ecclesiastical courts should be redressed; and that a hundred thousand pounds should be levied from the bishops' estates and the chapter lands, for payment of the debts contracted by the parliament.

With regard to the affairs in Ireland Charles was willing to make any concessions, that did not tend to the prejudice of his protestant subjects. And it must be owned, that notwithstanding the unpopular conduct of the king with regard to his granting the cessation to the Irish rebels, he was more defensible than the parliament. The charge against him consisted "in his having encouraged the two houses, to undertake the war, and his subjects to contribute money for carrying it on, and even putting it out of his power to treat with or pardon the rebels, without the consent of the parliament, by which means the rebels had been reduced to the last extremity, when the king granted them a cessation, and had sent for some of the best regiments employed against them in Ireland to make war against his parliament." But it was well known that the war in that kingdom had been shamefully neglected by the parliament, and that the army had been so ill paid, that the soldiers were ready to disband; that the face of the country lay uncultivated; that the officers of the army through mere want were ready to join the enemy, or to return to England; that no more than one hundred and seventy barrels of powder remained in the magazine of Dublin for the supply of the army, and that the forces in general were reduced to the last extremity for want of provisions; that all the representations of the king's subjects had been disregarded and unanswered by the parliament; that the money raised for the support of Ireland, had been employed in England against the king; and, that the house of commons had plainly told the protestant governors of Ireland, that they must expect no farther supply from England, unless they would exchange the native commodities of Ireland for the stores that should be sent them; a thing impossible to be done, all the commodities of that kingdom being in the hands of the rebels. Add to this, that the English parliament were themselves reduced to such necessities for money, that the agents of the protestant army in Ireland, were told, by one of the principal members of the Irish committee, that if five hundred pounds would save Ireland, it could not be advanced. Of four hundred thousand pounds raised for the support of the army, near one half had been employed in maintaining the civil war in England; and of all the troops raised for that service not more than six regiments of foot, and a thousand horse had actually landed in Ireland from England, all the rest having been employed against the king; great part of the Scottish forces had also been recalled and sent into England on the same service. Though these were undeniable facts, and tho' Sir Philip Percival, who had suffered greatly in the king's service, justified the cessation, by the strongest arguments of necessity; yet the king's commissioners found the prejudices of the public extremely strong both against the cessation, and the peace which was then negotiating at Oxford. The king's commissioners were not, however, intimidated; they spoke with such force upon the subject, that the parliamentary commissioners were greatly disappointed in their hopes of exposing the king: they were even apprehensive of having the odium of not supporting the Irish war, thrown upon themselves; it being certain that Charles had in his hands the most convincing evidences of the facts advanced by his commissioners. The votes of the parliament had, indeed, been very pathetic with regard to the cruelty of the Irish rebels, and the miseries suffered by the protestants in that kingdom; but hardly any thing had been done conformable to these resolutions. It is not sufficient to weep over the miseries of a distressed people, without affording them the necessary assistance. But what rendered it impossible to conclude the treaty was a farther demand made by the parliament, parliament, by which the king was to except from the general pardon, forty of the most considerable of his English subjects, and nineteen of his Scots, together with all popish recusants in both kingdoms, who had carried arms in his defence. It was also demanded that forty-eight more, with all the members who had sat in either house at Oxford, all lawyers and divines who had embraced the king's party, should be rendered incapable of any office; be forbid the exercise of their profession, be prohibited from coming within the verge of the court, and forfeit the third of their estates to the parliament.

The negotiation at Uxbridge being broken off, each party prepared to decide the important contest by the sword. On the third of April, Fairfax repaired to the rendezvous of his troops at Windsor, where, by the great care and assiduity of Skippon, his serjeant-major, he found the army in excellent condition. Cromwell, having joined him from Salisbury, was dispatched with a party of horse into Oxfordshire, to prevent the junction of a large body of cavalry, detached from prince Rupert's army in Worcestershire, with the king's forces, quartered in the neighbourhood of Oxford. He was fortunate enough to meet, at Islip-bridge, five of the best regiments in the royal army, commanded by the earl of Northampton, and gained a complete victory, took two hundred men prisoners, and four hundred horses. He then summoned and took Blechingdon-house, commanded by colonel Windebank, who was afterwards shot at Oxford, for delivering up the place. His next attempt was against another party of the royalists posted at Brampton-bush, under the command of Sir William Vaughan, whom he defeated and took prisoner, with two hundred of his men and several officers.

Taunton was still besieged by the royalists, and the garrison was now reduced to such extremity, that they had, for some time, subsisted on the most nauseous food. It was defended by colonel Blake, and attacked by Goring and Sir Richard Granville: but the latter being wounded, his command was given to Sir John Berkeley, whom the troops refused to obey; and a difference happening between general Goring and the council in the west, the siege was raised at the approach of the parliamentary army.

Cromwell, after his successful encounters with the royalists, summoned Farringdon-house to surrender. But colonel Bruges, who commanded the garrison, instead of complying with the demand, sallied out at the head of his troops, and Cromwell was defeated, though he had been joined by a strong party of foot from Abingdon, under the command of major-general Brown. In the mean time prince Rupert defeated Mafsey, governor of Gloucester, and joined the king at Oxford. Soon after Goring defeated a body of Cromwell's horse, and brought his forces to the royal camp. The king's army now consisted of above six thousand horse and five thousand foot, and it was expected that the latter would, in a few days, be double their number.

Fairfax had, by orders of the parliament, advanced to the relief of Taunton, and it was now imagined that his forces were so fatigued by long marches, that it would be easy for the king, whose army consisted chiefly of horse, to overtake him before he could join Cromwell, and force him to a battle. Had this advice been followed, it is more than probable Fairfax had been defeated, which would have proved decisive in the king's favour; but unfortunately for Charles it was neglected, and Goring was detached with a squadron of horse to watch his motions. He was met by Cromwell at Redcot-bridge, but had the good fortune to defeat that able general.

By this time the king had taken the field at the head of his army, and directed his march towards Warwickshire, in order to relieve Chester, which had been for some time besieged by Brereton; but on the approach of the royal army, he drew off his forces, and retired toward Lancashire. Charles therefore changed his rout, and determined to attack the town of Leicester, which was very strong and defended by a good garrison: but by the remarkable bravery of his troops, the place was carried by storm, and the governor, with all his garrison, consisting of fifteen hundred men, were made prisoners of war. Could the king have restrained the excesses of his soldiers, this acquisition would have proved of the utmost importance; but the disorders they committed after they were masters of the town, did more prejudice to his affairs, than all the plunder they acquired, tho' it was very rich, did him service. Besides the prisoners, he took about a thousand horses, fourteen pieces of cannon, and a great quantity of ammunition and military stores.

The parliament was greatly alarmed at the loss of Leicester. They pressed the Scots to quicken their march to the southward; and Fairfax, being now joined by Cromwell and Brown, was ordered to block up Oxford. But those measures were greatly embarrassed by the backwardness of the Scots, who had retreated into Westmoreland, and by the bad condition of Fairfax's army, after its fatiguing march into the west. Fairfax, however, obeyed his orders, and sat down before Oxford on the twenty-third of May; though he was apprehensive the king would soon return, and shut him up between his army and the town, which was strong and well garrisoned. On receiving advice that the king was marching to relieve Oxford, Fairfax was ordered to leave the command of the blockade to general Brown, and watch the motions of the royal army; it being strongly suspected, that instead of marching to Oxford, the king intended to fall upon the associated counties. It soon appeared that this opinion was well founded; and orders were immediately dispatched for raising the blockade of Oxford, and giving the king battle, if he continued to advance. Colonel Vermuyden, who had been sent to join the Scots, finding they were retreated into Westmoreland, returned to the southward, and put himself between the royal army and the associated counties. Borsfallow-house had been, for some time, besieged by Skippon, but made so brave a defence, that he was obliged to draw off his forces. He joined Fairfax on the sixth of June, and the next day the whole army reached Sherington, in order to defend the associated counties; certain advices having been received that the king had directed his march towards Northampton. The parliament at Westminster were very uneasy, not from the success of Charles; but from the reproaches of the expelled members, who beheld the progress of the king with infinite pleasure. For Goring had now cooped up Welden, who had been detached by Fairfax to Taunton, between his army and the walls of that place; and advice was every hour expected that both Welden and the town had surrendered. Charles had, however, seen his error, and repented his having sent Goring into the west; but he still had it in his power to rejoin him, or to retire either to Leicester or Worcester, where he might have recruited and refreshed his army, while that of the parliament was harassed with fatiguing marches.

But instead of pursuing any of these prudent measures, a fatal resolution was taken to fight Fairfax. This was principally owing to the ungovernable ardor of prince Rupert, who excited the impatient humour of the nobility and gentry, of which the army was full, by urging the many difficulties under which the royalists laboured, and from which they could be relieved by nothing but a victory. The king's forces lay about Daventry, in Northamptonshire, where he waited five days in expectation of engaging Fairfax, of whose marches he was totally ignorant. At last certain advice arrived, that the parliament's general, who had now been joined by all his parties, was advanced to Wooton, and that his head quarters was within six miles of that of the king. It was not even now too late for Charles to decline an engagement ment without any injury to his reputation: He might have taken possession of a strong camp upon Borough-hill, where the forces of Fairfax could not have attacked him, and where he might have waited till joined by a party of twelve hundred horse, detached into Leicestershire; or even till Goring returned from his expedition against Welden's army. But these advantages were neglected, and the royal army advanced against that of the parliament.

The forces, which on both sides were nearly equal, were drawn up in Naseby field, the spot on which the bloody contest between the king and his parliament was decided. The right wing of the royalists was commanded by prince Rupert, the left by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and the main body by the king in person. In the parliament's army, Cromwell commanded the right wing, Ireton, his son-in-law, the left, and Fairfax, assisted by Skippon, the main body. The parliament's army had the advantage of the ground and situation: their front extended somewhat farther than the king's; and a party of their dragoons possessed themselves of some hedges, which flanked prince Rupert's horse. The charge was begun by prince Rupert, with his usual celerity and usual success. Ireton made a stout resistance; and even after he was run through the thigh with a pike, still maintained the combat till he was taken prisoner; but all his courage was not sufficient to support the dreadful charge of the prince; his whole wing was broke, and pursued with the most precipitate fury, by that violent commander. He was even so inconsiderate, as to lose time in summoning and attacking the artillery of the parliament, which had been left with a strong guard of infantry. The king led on his main body with great intrepidity, and with all the conduct of a prudent general. The contest was here very sharp, Fairfax and Skippon nobly supporting the great reputation they had acquired. The latter being dangerously wounded, was desired by Fairfax to leave the field; but he declared he would continue there as long as any soldier would stand his ground. But notwithstanding all the intrepidity of these two generals, the infantry in the center was broke; and Fairfax's own regiment, commanded by Sir Charles Doyley, was the only body of foot that kept their ground. Fairfax, however, with great presence of mind, brought up the reserve, and renewed the combat. In the mean time, Cromwell attacked the left wing of the royal army with such intrepidity, that they could not support the charge; they were broken, and pursued about a quarter of a mile, when Cromwell, who improved by his prudence the advantage he had gained by his valour, detached a party to prevent their rallying, while he himself turned back upon the king's infantry, and threw them into the utmost confusion. One regiment only maintained its order unbroken, though twice desperately assailed by Fairfax. But the third attempt proved decisive: Doyley charged them in front, while Fairfax attacked them in the rear. The gallant regiment was now broken, and partly dispersed. Sensible, when it was too late, of his error, prince Rupert abandoned his fruitless attempt upon the enemy's artillery, and joined the king, whose infantry was now totally defeated. Charles did all in his power to animate this body of cavalry to exert that valour they had already displayed; he called aloud to them, "One charge more, and we recover the day." But they saw too evidently the disadvantages under which they laboured, to obey even the command of their sovereign. The king was obliged to quit the field, and leave the victory to the enemy. He retreated first to Leicester, and then to Litchfield.

The number of the slain in the parliament's army was greater than that in the king's; they lost a thousand men, he not above eight hundred. But Fairfax took four hundred officers and five thousand men prisoners. He also took twelve pieces of cannon, two mortars, eight thousand arms, forty barrels of powder, and a hundred colours, together with the king's equipages and cabinet, in which were copies of his letters to the queen, which the parliament afterwards ordered to be published. In a word, this victory was at once the greatest and most complete of any gained by the parliament during the whole course of the civil war.

But though this defeat was dreadful, it was the infatuation of Charles in following the worst councils, that rendered it decisive. He had still a fine body of two thousand horse, and a thousand foot, in Wales, under general Gerrard. Goring was at the head of an army before Taunton, little inferior to that the king had lost at Naseby, and the routed horse were every day coming in to some of the royal garrisons. But a flood of misfortunes were now to be poured on the head of this unfortunate prince: his enemies conquered his towns, garrisons, and armies, almost as fast as a traveller could pass from one to the other. The lord Loughborough surrendered Leicester to Fairfax, without stipulating any other condition, than that of obtaining quarter for himself and his garrison. But Fairfax being no stranger to the wretched condition of Taunton, sent a messenger to the parliament for instructions concerning his march into the west. In the mean time, he passed from Leicester to Lutterworth, and proceeded, without any interruption, to Dorchester. The miseries of civil discord had, for some time, been so severely felt by the inhabitants of the western counties, especially those of Devon, Dorset, and Wilts, that they had formed a scheme of neutrality, under the title of Club-men. Their declared intention was to resist either party who should attack them, and to mediate fair conditions between the king and his parliament. This association was now so strong, as to be formidable to both parties, who equally complained of their sufferings from the Club-men. Soon after Fairfax reached Dorchester, Mr. Hollis, a gentleman of Dorsetshire, with several other leaders of the Club-men, waited upon him with the following articles and requests. "That the associates provide arms, set watches, be quiet with those that excite no disturbance, seize all disorderly soldiers, and send them to the nearest garrisons: not to deny quarters and contributions proportioned to their abilities: till their petitions be delivered, not to favour either party, nor to protect any not associated. To request the renewal of a treaty, with a cessation of arms, and also that the garrisons in Dorset, Devon, and Wilts, be put into their hands, till the king and parliament agree about their disposal: that they be freed from all charges, except the maintenance of those garrisons: that all laws, not repealed, be in force, and executed by the ordinary officers: that all persons who desire it, might be at liberty to lay down their arms; and that others who have absented themselves from their houses may have free liberty to return." The general told them, that he greatly approved of their endeavours to bring about a peace; but not of the cessation of arms, or of disbanding the soldiers; but promised to protect them from being plundered, and required them to discontinue their meetings. Perhaps he would not have dismissed the leaders of the Club-men on such easy terms, had he not been very desirous of prosecuting his favourite scheme, the relief of Taunton, the parliament having consented to his leading the army into those parts, where the royalists were still powerful, and capable of making a gallant resistance.

But feuds and animosities had, for some time, prevailed among the officers, and threatened inevitable ruin to the royal party. Goring was capable of performing all that could be required from the bravest and vilest of mankind: his abilities were equal to his ambition, which soared above all his master could bestow. His abilities were sufficient to clothe vice with every advantage; his eloquence to delude caution into ruin. His heart, insensible either to the happiness or miseries of others, laid not a check on his career of wickedness. His profligacy, his intemperance, his riots, his oversights, and his negligence, rendered it problematical for what end nature had bestowed her gifts on a person who disgraced them; and why fortune courted a man so ungrateful to her favours. The hopes of victory could not restrain him from debauchery, nor the fear of infamy deter him from treachery. His serving the royal party was not in him the result of principle, but of accident; and when opposed by the king's council, it caused him more pains to disappoint than it would have done to have executed the excellent dispositions laid down by himself for the service of his master. This was the true reason for his strange behaviour before Taunton. The ravages and barbarities of his soldiers had rendered him so disagreeable to the royal party in the west, that he knew they had done him ill offices with his master, and was resolved the service should suffer. He was accordingly so negligent in guarding the passages to Taunton, that the besieged received frequent relief from the adjacent country, and even his chief officers were suffered to have interviews with those of the enemy. This at once prolonged the siege, and discouraged the infantry so greatly, that they mouldered away; and when Fairfax advanced to relieve the place, Goring found himself under a necessity; wantonly occasioned by his own negligence, of raising the siege. He retired to Lamport, an open town in Somersetshire, where he was defeated by Fairfax, who killed three hundred of his men, and took fourteen hundred prisoners.

Fairfax now sat down before Bridgewater, a strong and important town in that country. The place was defended by colonel Windham, at the head of a garrison of two thousand six hundred men. For some time, the besieged made a stout resistance; but the outer town being taken by storm, Windham capitulated, and delivered up the place to Fairfax; by which the whole garrison were made prisoners of war. The taking of Bridgewater was a dreadful blow to the royalists, because it was considered as impregnable; and the king's friends had laid up in it, as a sure repository, their treasure and most valuable effects.

Charles was now retreated to Cardiff, in South Wales, where he had leisure to reflect on his fallen condition; and, perhaps, saw it more clearly, and felt it more sensibly, than any man of his party. But when he was the sport of fortune, he seemed regardless of her frowns. When his best friends, even those who had been most forward in advising war, now pressed him to accept of peace on almost any conditions, Charles declared himself of a different opinion. He admitted, indeed, that he had nothing but ruin to himself, his cause, and his family, before his eyes; but, at the same time, declared, that he would neither sacrifice his conscience, injure his successor, nor forsake his friends. He told prince Rupert, who was one of the party for peace, that if his case was to be viewed by a politician, it would appear next to frenzy for him to decline any terms; but as a king, a christian, and a gentleman, low as his fortunes were, he would grant no other terms than what he had offered at Uxbridge; and these he knew would not be accepted.

The Scots having taken Carlisle, which had, for eleven months, been bravely defended by Sir Thomas Glenham, marched to the southward, and sat down before Hereford; but they were so disgusted by the treatment they had received in England, that the siege advanced very slowly. They complained loudly of the want of money, provisions and artillery, which had been promised them by the parliament, but the promise had never been performed. Charles being therefore in no great pain with regard to the fate of Hereford, directed his course to the northward; and, after very fatiguing marches, reached Doncaster, where he was joined by a body of three thousand men; it being the peculiar fate of that prince to acquire more friends by his misfortunes than by prosperity. It required, indeed, all his fortitude to support the shocks of ill fortune, by which he was every day assailed. The castles of Scarborough, Skipton, Sandal, and Pontefract, after making a noble opposition, were obliged to surrender to the parliament; but their garrisons joined the royal army.

The king was now very desirous of pushing forward into Scotland, to join Montrose, who, at the head of a handful of naked, half-armed highlanders, had cut in pieces several armies of regular veterans, commanded by officers of experience, and supported by the whole strength of the kingdom. The Scottish army before Hereford were alarmed at his success; and general Lesley, at the head of all the cavalry and dragoons, marched directly towards Scotland. Immediately after his departure, the earls of Leven and Callender, who commanded at the siege of Hereford, drew up a kind of manifesto, enumerating the difficulties and disappointments they had met with, and urging the necessity of saving their own country from the destruction with which it was threatened by Montrose. They accordingly raised the siege of Hereford, and began their march to the northward. Lesley, informed of the king's intention, marched with so much expedition, that he reached Rotherham, and secured the pass at Ferrybridge, before the king was informed of the route he had taken; while Pointz, one of the parliament's generals, took post, with a strong body of horse, in the neighbourhood of Worcester. It being now impossible for Charles to lead his army into Scotland, he directed his march towards the eastern associated counties, with so much success, that he took Huntingdon, defeated several parties of the enemy, and returned to Oxford with a considerable booty.

In the mean time, Fairfax made himself master of Bath and Sherborne-castle, and prepared for besieging Bristol; an enterprise, which, from the strength of the garrison, and the great reputation of prince Rupert the governor, was deemed of the last importance. But so strangely precarious in most men is the quality of military courage! a weaker defence was not made by any town during the whole war. The general expectations were here totally disappointed. The lines were no sooner taken by storm, than the prince capitulated, and delivered up the city to Fairfax. Charles, who, on receiving advice that Fairfax determined to besiege Bristol, had collected all his forces to relieve the city, was astonished at so unexpected an event, which was hardly less fatal to his party than the battle of Naseby. Exasperated at the behaviour of Rupert, he instantly recalled all his commissions, and sent him a safe conduct to pass over to the continent.

Every thing now portended the ruin of the royal party. The king marched to the relief of Chester, which was besieged by Jones, at the head of a strong detachment of the parliament's forces. Pointz followed him close; and on his arrival in the neighbourhood of Chester, attacked his rear, and forced him to give battle. The action was very sharp, and victory seemed to incline to the royalists, till Jones fell upon their troops on the other side, and put them to flight, with the loss of six hundred slain, and a thousand prisoners. The king fled, with the remains of his broken army, to Newark, and thence escaped to Oxford, where he shut himself up during the winter.

Fairfax and Cromwell, having now no powerful army to oppose them, divided their forces. Cromwell, at the head of four regiments, marched to the Devizes, and soon obliged the garrison to capitulate. Berkeley-castle was taken by colonel Rainborough, but the garrison, consisting of five hundred men, were suffered to march out without their arms. Cromwell's detachment being now strengthened by three regiments of horse, he marched to Winchester, and sat down before the castle, which was defended by lord Ogle, at the head of a numerous garrison; but after a vigorous defence, he was obliged to capitulate on honourable conditions. Cromwell's next expedition was against Basing-house, which, under the brave marquis of Winchester, had already repelled so many desperate attacks of the enemy. But it could not resist the impetuosity of Cromwell; he took it sword in hand, put the garrison to the sword, and sent the marquis, with a few of the principal officers, prisoners to London. Langford-house also, four days after, shared the same fate.

The army of Fairfax was attended with the same rapid success. Tiverton was taken, the general laid siege to Exeter, and forced the royalists, with the prince of Wales at their head, to retreat behind the Tamar. Fairfax therefore became master of the whole country to that river, and extended his line to Tornefs, which he now took possession of. This success so greatly alarmed the royalists, who had formed the blockade of Plymouth, that they retired behind the Tamar in great disorder, leaving all their artillery and ammunition in the hands of the enemy.

A. D. 1646. Fairfax was now at liberty to pursue the design he had formed against Dartmouth, which, with the assistance of a squadron of the parliament's ships, under the command of admiral Batten, he took by storm on the eighteenth of January. One hundred and twenty pieces of cannon, a thousand prisoners, a hundred horses, with proportional arms and ammunition, with two small ships of war belonging to the king, fell into the hands of Fairfax. Among the prisoners were the earl of Newport, colonel Seymour, and a great number of inferior officers. Poudram-castle next fell into the hands of the victorious Fairfax, who now laid close siege to Exeter. Lord Hopton, who commanded the royal army, consisting of eight thousand men, advanced to relieve the place. The two armies met at Torrington, where Hopton was defeated, all his foot dispersed, and he himself, with his horse, obliged to retire into Cornwall, Fairfax pursued his victory with so much vigour, that he inclosed the royalists at Truro, and forced the whole army, consisting of five thousand men, chiefly cavalry, to surrender upon terms. The soldiers delivering up their horses and arms, were permitted to disband, and received twenty shillings each to carry them to their own houses. Such of the officers as desired it, were granted passes to retire beyond the seas: the others, having promised never more to bear arms against the parliament, received a free pardon, on paying compositions proportioned to their abilities. Fairfax now returned to the siege of Exeter, and, after making himself master of that city, which completed the conquest of the west, marched his victorious army to the middle of the kingdom, and fixed his quarters at Newbury. The prince of Wales had the good fortune to escape when the royal army was inclosed at Truro; and, pursuant to the repeated orders of his father, passed over into the isles of Sicilly, thence to Jersey, and afterwards to Paris, where he joined the queen, who had fled thither from Exeter, when the earl of Essex commanded the parliament's forces in the west.

Not was Charles more successful in other parts of the kingdom. Hereford was taken by surprize; Chester surrendered: Lord Digby, who had attempted, at the head of twelve hundred horse, to force his way into Scotland, and join Montrose, was defeated at Sherburn in Yorkshire, by colonel Copeley; his whole force was dispersed, and he himself obliged to fly, first into the Isle of Man, and thence into Ireland. The town and castle of Chepstow were delivered up to the parliament; the counties of Pembroke and Carmarthen were reduced by Laughren: Shelford and Wyverton houses were taken, and even the undaunted countess of Derby was obliged to surrender Latham-house. And, to put a final period to the hopes of the royalists, news arrived, that Montrose himself, after the most astonishing success, was totally defeated, and obliged to fly, with his broken forces into the mountains.

Such was in general the state of affairs when the inclemency of the season put an end to the rage of war. It would have been endless to have mentioned all the smaller actions and skirmishes, the sieges of castles, and the taking of houses, that happened during this whole campaign, so fatal to the royal party. The genius of Cromwell shone in its full lustre; he was the support of the independents, while his amazing success awakened the jealousy of the presbyterians. He flew from post to post with amazing expedition; the news of one conquest hardly arrived before another was finished; the shouts of victory in his troops were blended with the singing of psalms, and the consultations for battle and destruction were always preceded by the exercises of praying and preaching. That artful general always took care to keep the minds of his soldiers warm either by the heat of battle, or the force of enthusiasm: he was at once their martial and their spiritual leader. Every county was a bloody scene of action, and on almost every gentleman's estate, encounters happened, which exceeded in fury, those of any foreign war. The numbers that fell in the more distinguished battles were inconsiderable when compared with the total, that were slain in those lesser skirmishes. "To the work of the Lord diligently," was now become the watch-word of the independents, and implied, that no quarter ought to be given to the royalists, and that the war should be carried on without regarding the few decencies which had hitherto been preserved towards his majesty and the chief nobility of the kingdom.

The escape of the king from Newark to Oxford was, however, a great disappointment to the independents. Not that they had the least apprehension of his recovering any power that could renew their alarms; but they feared, what afterwards happened, that he would make another attempt to conclude a peace with the parliament. As soon as the king knew that the prince of Wales had made his escape, he demanded, from the two houses, a safe conduct for the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, Mr. Ashburnham and Mr. Palmer, to repair with his propositions, to Westminster. The commons had for some time been employed in debating on the situation of public affairs. The presbyterians thought that matters had now exceeded the crisis they proposed, and perceived that both they and the parliament were on the point of receiving law from the independents and the army; and therefore, that it was more advisable for them to conclude a peace with his majesty, than become the dupes of that violent party. And as they had hitherto maintained a considerable majority in the house, they now determined to make use of it for settling the peace of the kingdom; but at the same time, they well knew that the utmost caution would be necessary to ensure success. They were aware that the independent party would derive great advantages from the London populace, if the commons gave any countenance to a treaty. It was therefore agreed to frame a set of articles which were to be sent to his majesty, and, after being approved by him, to have the sanction of an act of parliament. Those articles were founded on the demands before made at Uxbridge, but with an addition of the following particulars: "That their general, Sir Thomas Fairfax, should be created a baron, and have five thousand pounds a year settled on him for life: That lord Fairfax, his father, should be made an earl: That lieutenant-general Cromwell should be made a baron, and enjoy two thousand five hundred pounds a year: That the earls of Northumberland, Essex, Warwick, and Pembroke, be created dukes: That Denzil Hollis be made a baron, Sir William Waller a baron, and enjoy an annuity of two thousand five hundred pounds a year: That Sir Arthur Haslerig be made a baron, with two thousand pounds per annum: That Sir Henry Vane, and Sir Philip Stapleton, be created barons, and the latter enjoy two thousand pounds a year: That Sir William Brereton have one thousand five hundred, and major general Skippon one thousand pounds per annum."

It was imagined by the presbyterian party, that their thus liberally providing for the friends of the independent party, as well as their own, would be a means of suppressing the violence of the faction; if it was possible to satiate the avarice and ambition of their leaders. They therefore gave no answer to the king's message, which alarmed Charles, who sent a very pathetic letter to the commons, but received no reply; the commons were busy in forming their propositions. In the mean time, the differences which every day increased between the parliament and the Scots, gave his majesty some hopes, that a rupture between them would be the consequence; which could not fail of being advantageous to his affairs.

After the defeat of Montrose in Scotland, all the foot, and part of the Scottish horse, were starving in England; nor did they receive one shilling but what they raised by contributions. It was, however, at last voted, that they should be paid thirty-one thousand pounds per month, provided they would return to the southward, and lay siege to Newark, which was likely, at that time, to prove the hottest service in England. But the answer of the Scots was so unsatisfactory, that they were required to give a positive and speedy answer; and, in the mean time, several strong resolutions were made by the parliament, if they refused to undertake the siege.

The marquis of Argyle was now at the head of those violent covenanters in Scotland, whose characters nearly resembled those of the independents in England. He had been defeated by Montrose, who had suffered his forces to live at free quarters on his estates. At the same time, he was hated by the Hamilton party, so that he was under a kind of necessity of opposing all offers of accommodation with the king. The duke of Hamilton, on the other hand, saw himself without abilities to serve his sovereign, unless he would grant all that was demanded of him with regard to religion. Besides these two, there was a third party in Scotland, consisting of the earls of Callender, Traquair, Morton, Roxborough, and several others, who cherished the genuine sentiments of public liberty, and sincerely wished that some method might be found for restoring Charles to all his just rights, both in England and Scotland, under proper restrictions and security; but they were at once too weak and too wise to attempt any thing themselves, unless properly assisted. There was, however, one principle, in which all the three parties agreed, that the return of their army into Scotland, before the large arrears due to the troops from the English parliament, must be attended with the ruin of their country, and the destruction of their civil liberty. They perceived it would be impossible to find subsistence for a small body of horse under Lesley; and had therefore sent the greater part of them back to England, reserving one regiment only.

Charles made another effort for negotiating a peace with the parliament, and desired to have a personal treaty with the two houses. He offered to come to London, on receiving a safe conduct for himself and his attendants, and to commit the trust of the militia to such persons against whom there could be no just exception. But they absolutely refused him access; and even issued orders for seizing his person, if he attempted to visit them. At last they told the king, that they were preparing some bills, and his passing them would be the surest indication of his desire of restoring peace to this distracted country. About this time, an action, which happened in Ireland, served to augment the calumnies that were propagated to the disadvantage of the king, and which he had always considered as the greatest misfortunes he had yet experienced.

Desirous of concluding a final peace with the Irish rebels, and of obtaining their assistance in England;

he commissioned Ormond, the lord-lieutenant, to promise them an abrogation of all the penal laws that had been enacted against the catholics. But as some agent was thought necessary to conduct the negotiation, lord Herbert, lately created earl of Glamorgan, was considered as a person proper for this undertaking, as he was a catholic, and allied to the best families in Ireland. Glamorgan was strictly enjoined not to conclude any thing with the rebels without the approbation of Ormond, and to consult him in every step of his negotiations. Had these instructions been carefully observed, the king had received the reinforcement he so greatly wanted; without giving his enemies the opportunity of loading him with reproaches. But bigotted to his own religion, and passionately desirous of serving his master effectually, he secretly, of himself, without communicating any part of the negotiation to Ormond, concluded a peace with the council of Kilkenny, by which it was agreed, that the Irish should enjoy all the churches they had ever possessed since the beginning of their insurrection, on condition, that they should assist the king of England with a body of ten thousand men. Great secrecy was observed in concluding this treaty, and it was at last discovered by accident. The titular archbishop of Tuam being killed in a sally made by the garrison of Sligo, the articles of the treaty were found among his baggage; and several copies of them were sent over to the English parliament. Persuaded that this incident would excite the loudest clamour against the king, the lord-lieutenant and lord Digby committed Glamorgan to prison, charged him with high-treason for his temerity, and maintained that he had acted entirely without authority from his majesty. The king also disavowed the treaty, and declared that he had no authority to conclude any thing without the privity and approbation of the lord-lieutenant. The parliament, however, lost not so fair an opportunity of reviving the old clamour with regard to the king's desire of favouring the abominations of popery; and accused him of delivering the whole kingdom of Ireland to that hated sect.

The parliament, when they abolished episcopacy, did not immediately regulate the affairs of the church. At length that great work was finished, and a presbyterian government, with all its congregations and assemblies, was established. The elders of each parish joined with the ministers, were to preside in all spiritual matters, in that congregation; and the general assembly over those of the whole kingdom. That assembly of their clergy had already voted, that presbytery was of divine right; but the parliament refused their assent to that opinion, because they imagined it would be productive of a spiritual authority equal at least, if not superior, to that before enjoyed by the bishops. The clergy of all sects of christians, under pretence of keeping the sacraments from being profaned, had assumed the power of the keys, or the right of fulminating excommunications. The parliament thought proper to set limits to this power, which they considered as dangerous to liberty. They passed an ordinance, by which all the cases in excommunication should be used; they admitted appeals to be made to the parliament from all ecclesiastical courts; and appointed commissioners to take cognizance of such cases as fell not within their ordinance. The zealots were highly offended at the parliament; for intermixing so much civil with ecclesiastical authority; they considered it as a profanation of religion.

But what gave them the highest offence, was the propensity shewn by many of the members to allow a toleration to all religious sectaries. This excited an universal clamour among the presbyterians, who loudly exclaimed against what they termed a most scandalous measure. "What!" said they, "shall we make a Noah's ark of the church? make it a receptacle for all unclean beasts? We are obliged by the covenant to oppose heresy and schism. No political "political reasons can counterbalance this duty." The dispute grew very warm between the presbyterians and independents; the former opposing, and the latter supporting the reasonableness of admitting a toleration in religion; and the king might have profited by it, if their hatred to him had not united those whom their religious opinions had divided.

The king was not displeased at these disputes in the parliament; but he soon perceived, that if it were possible for him to derive any advantage from the misunderstandings of his parliament, it would come too late. Fairfax was approaching, at the head of a powerful and victorious army, to besiege him in Oxford, whence it would be impossible for him, after the city was invested, to make his escape. He could not bear the thought of being made a captive, and led in triumph through the streets of his capital, amidst a prejudiced and insolent populace, and a rude, enthusiastic soldiery, who hated his person, and despised his dignity. The Scots army had now invested Newark, and seemed to open the only asylum to majesty in distress. He imagined that the Scots had not yet lost all attachment to their sovereign; and that, as zealous presbyterians, they would not willingly submit to the independents. Montreville, the French minister, desirous of serving the king, had solicited the Scots generals and commissioners to give protection to their distressed sovereign; and having received many general professions and promises, he transmitted these, possibly with some exaggeration, to the king, who now determined to throw himself into the arms of his Scottish subjects.

The utmost secrecy was, however, observed in this transaction; and that no interruption, sufficient to occasion a discovery, might happen, orders were given at every gate in Oxford to admit three persons to pass without being examined. These precautions being taken, Charles, attended only by Dr. Hudson and Mr. Ashburnham, passed about midnight through that gate which leads to London. The king, in the dress of Ashburnham's servant, with a portmanteau behind him, passed through Henley, and Harrow on the Hill. He once entertained some thoughts of entering the capital, and throwing himself into the arms of the parliament; but this design appearing too dangerous, he pursued his first intention; and, after passing through many cross roads, reached the Scottish camp before Newark. The surprize of their generals and commissioners was prodigious: they pretended to do him homage, and paid him every external mark of respect; but were determined to make him a captive. They allotted him a guard, under pretence of protection and esteem, but in reality to secure his person.

Newark still made a noble defence against the Scots, who now applied to the king for orders to the governor to surrender the place. He readily obeyed, and the gates were opened to the enemy. Soon after the king's arrival, the Scots had informed the parliament of their being in possession of the king's person; but hearing that the commons intended to demand him, and that the army of Fairfax was already in motion towards their camp, they thought proper to retire towards the frontiers of their own kingdom, and encamped at Newcastle, a place of great strength. This motion was not disagreeable to Charles; he imagined it was taken merely for the protection of his person; and flattered himself, that by the junction of his friends with the Scots, he should be once more in a condition of facing the enemy, and, possibly, of restoring peace to his exhausted kingdoms.

But Charles well knew that the Scots would never heartily concur in promoting his interest, unless he could gain the favour of their ministers: he was therefore very attentive to their long and enthusiastic sermons, and seemed very desirous of their instructions. But he soon perceived that the covenanting zealots were by no means his friends. One of their preachers, after bitterly reproaching him, in the harshest terms, for his conduct, gave out that psalm, which, in the English translation, begins, "Why boastest thou thyself, thou tyrant, that thou canst do mischief?" The king stood up, and called for that psalm which begins, "Have pity upon me, O Lord, for men go about to devour me." The good-natured audience shewed that they were penetrated with the sight of majesty in distress, and sung the psalm called for by the king. Pity, for once, triumphed over enthusiasm.

Charles was now required to issue orders to the governors of all his garrisons, to surrender the places they defended to the parliament. The king made no opposition: he perceived he could hope for no effectual assistance from the Scots, and knew that any farther opposition would only tend to exasperate still more the party that was formed against him: Fairfax carried those orders into execution; and granted the garrisons honourable terms: he even prevented, as far as in his power, any insults from being offered to the unfortunate royalists. The capital, with all the other forts garrisoned by the king's party in Ireland, were also delivered up to the parliament's officers: and Montrose, after experiencing a great variety of good and bad fortune, threw down his arms, and retired to the continent.

All opposition on the part of the royalists being now ceased, it was thought that no time should be lost in settling the distracted state of the kingdom. But this was not easy to be performed. The strength of the independent party in parliament was greatly increased, and the army was at the devotion of Cromwell; but both began to entertain jealousies of the Scots. It was therefore voted, "that there is no farther occasion for the Scottish army to continue in England. And, that one hundred thousand pounds be raised, and one moiety thereof paid to the Scots, on their delivering up all the towns they have garrisoned in England, except Berwick, and the other on their return to Scotland." At the same time, they ordered the Scots commissioners to deliver to the house an account of the arrears due to their army, that they might be discharged according to the treaty between the two kingdoms.

The proposals for establishing a peace were now laid before the king, and appeared to be such as might be expected by a captive entirely at the mercy of an inexorable conqueror. The parliament demanded, before any treaty was signed, that the king should give the royal assent to the following bills. "1. To recall all proclamations published against the parliament, and their actions. 2. To sign the covenant, and pass an act for its being taken by the whole kingdom. 3. An act to abolish the hierarchy. 4. To confirm the assembly. 5. An act for settling religion according to the plan established by both houses of parliament. 6. To confirm unity and uniformity in religion. 7. An act against jesuits, papists, &c. 8. An act for educating the children of papists in the protestant religion. 9. An act for penalties against catholics. 10. An act against saying mass in any place within the kingdom. 11. The same to be extended to Scotland, if the parliament of that kingdom think proper. 12. An act for the due observation of the Lord's day, against pluralities, non-residents, and for regulating the universities. 13. An act for vesting the militia in the parliament for twenty years; for empowering the commons to raise what money they thought necessary, and for confirming the privileges of London with regard to their own militia. 14. An act to render void all honours and titles conferred since the great seal was carried from the parliament, and that no peers be admitted but by consent of both houses. 15. An act to confirm the treaty between England and Scotland, and for appointing conservators of the peace. 16. An act to establish the declaration of both kingdoms, published on the thirtieth of June, 1643, with the qualifications of exception from pardon, with regard to several persons, both English and Scots, and the name of those rendered incapable of any office, and such such as have deserted the parliament. 17. An act to render void the cessation concluded with the Irish rebels, for leaving the conduct of the war in that kingdom to the care of the parliament, and for settling religion there in the same manner as in England. 18. An act for vesting the government of the Tower and their own militia in the magistrates of London, and for confirming their charters. 19. A bill for confirming all grants and processes issued under the parliament's great seal, and for rendering void all those of any other."

Charles, though no stranger to the substance of these proposals, told the messengers, that as they tended to introduce such important innovations in the constitution, it was highly reasonable he should be allowed a proper time for deliberation. They replied, that he must give his answer in ten days. The king complained, that the terms made use of were not defined, and desired to know their meaning. The messengers told him they had no power to debate, and that he must give a positive answer. Upon this the king delivered a paper, in which he complained of the limited powers of the commissioners, and demanded permission to come to London and treat with his parliament in person. He added, that as he never could condescend to pass bills absolutely destructive of that just power with which he was entrusted by God and the laws of the kingdom, so he would cheerfully give his assent to such as were reasonable, and really tended to promote the peace and happiness of his subjects. He therefore conjured them as christians, and as men who desire to leave a good name behind them, that they would receive his answer in so favourable a manner, that the issues of blood may be stopped, and the dreadful distractions of this unhappy kingdom fully settled.

This paper was considered by the parliament's commissioners as no satisfactory answer, and they made some difficulty of receiving it. It, however, produced no effect; and the king was given to understand, that if he refused to comply with their demands, they would settle the kingdom by their own authority. But two difficulties still continued to be removed; to prevail upon the Scots to deliver up the king; and to settle the payment of the arrears of their army.

Both these particulars caused very long debates in the parliament. The Scots pretended, that as Charles was king of both nations, they were equally intitled with the English to vote on the question relative to the disposal of his person; and that where the titles of both are equal, and the subject indivisible, the present possessor was intitled to the preference. On the contrary, the English maintained, that as the king was in England, his person could not be disposed of by any foreign nation. But though they differed so widely with regard to the disposal of his majesty's person, they agreed in imposing on him such rigorous conditions, that Charles, notwithstanding his deplorable situation, refused to accept them. They did not, indeed, wish he should recover his freedom; they never intended to blend lenity and tyranny together in so inconsistent a manner. The Scots, however, determined not to deliver up the king to the English parliament, but keep him as a pledge for their arrears, which, in the present distracted state of the nation, they were unlikely to obtain by any other means. According to their own account, the sum amounted to no less than two millions; for as the parliament had paid them very little money, the contributions they had levied, and the price of their living at free quarters, were all the deductions to be made out of the whole pay due to them, ever since they first entered England. This sum was, however, considered as very exorbitant by the parliament; and the demand occasioned very long and severe debates. At length the Scottish commissioners agreed to accept of four hundred thousand pounds, in lieu of all demands; one half to be paid immediately, and the other in less than a year.

As the delivering up the king's person was considered as the principal condition of this infamous bargain, the money was raised with great alacrity. The Scottish parliament had indeed voted, that the king should be protected, and his liberty be made one of the conditions of the treaty; but they were obliged to retract their resolution on the interposition of the general assembly, who declared, "that as Charles had refused to take the covenant when tendered to him, it became not the godly to concern themselves about his fortune." This resolution, however, was not sufficient to disturb the tranquillity of the king's mind, so greatly had he profited in the school of adversity. He was playing at chess when he was informed of the final resolution of the Scots to deliver him into the hands of the English parliament; but he continued his game without interruption; nor could any person in company perceive that the letter he perused brought any advice of consequence.

The parliament had now surmounted every difficulty; the whole power of the nation was in their hands. Fairfax, the unhappy, the unwilling instrument of the miseries of his country, was now in London, and complimented by the parliament in terms which can with propriety be used only to the divine Being. Lenthall, the speaker of the house of commons, told him, that he was "the Almighty who came riding on the wings of the wind." Fairfax despised and detested such gross flattery; but he was not proof against the arts of Cromwell. The army was now modelled in such a manner, that they no longer considered themselves as the servants of the parliament, but rather as its masters; and Cromwell pointed out to Fairfax, with great justice and candour, the distractions that every where prevailed, both in church and state. Scarcely two divines could agree in a standard of faith, or two statesmen on the same scheme of measures necessary to be pursued. Hence he concluded, that the army was now the sole principle of unity, the center to which all lines must point. The soldiers, he said, were the chosen people of God, and had within them that unerring light of grace, which soared above all sublunary institutions, and corrected all human errors. He meant, however, only those soldiers under the command of Fairfax and himself; for there were besides two armies, one under Massey, governor of Gloucester; and the other under Mitton, in Wales. Massey's soldiers felt the infirmities of human nature; they were distressed with cold, hunger, and the want of every necessary comfort of life. They therefore presented several strong petitions to the parliament, enumerated their services, and asked that relief to which as servants, as men, and as christians, they were so justly entitled. But all their petitions and remonstrances were in vain; they were threatened with being sent to Ireland, and in the mean time suffered to live at free quarters, that the disbanding of them, which was now determined, might appear the less unpopular, though they were paid but a small part of their arrears.

The independents had strongly opposed the treaty with the Scots, and were for demanding the person of his majesty at the head of the army, and driving them out of the kingdom by force. Every vote, therefore, in their favour, was strenuously debated; but the presbyterians having, as yet, the majority, carried their point; and the measure for sending the Scots into their own country, by an amicable treaty, was adopted. This being settled, it was voted, that Holmby-house, in Northamptonshire, should be the place for receiving his majesty; and a committee of lords and commons, with a party of the army, were appointed to attend him thither from Newcastle; but, at the same time, they declared, that nothing should be done towards settling the peace, till the Scottish forces had passed the English borders. When the English commissioners arrived in the Scottish camp, and were permitted to kiss the king's hands, he received them with the same grace and cheerfulness, as if they had travelled on no other errand, but that of paying their court to him. His majesty was allowed only nine servants to attend him; and though he was treated by the commissioners with all the external marks of respect, he was not suffered to have any intercourse with his friends. Some weeks before the king was delivered into the hands of the parliament's commissioners, the earl of Essex paid the debt of nature. This was a severe blow both to the king and presbyterian party. Sensible of the deplorable state of the nation, to which, from mistake rather than design, he had so greatly contributed, he determined to exert all his power to bring about a peace, and restore the tranquillity of the nation; but death put a final period to his design, deprived the presbyterians, or moderate party, of a popular leader, and so greatly lessened the power of the house of peers, that it was almost annihilated.

A. D. 1647. While the king continued at Holmby-house, the nation began to be very uneasy at the situation of public affairs. The house of commons had either by themselves, or their committees, diverted the ordinary course of laws, even in matters of private property; but they had often declared, that as soon as the necessity of the times would permit, the courts of judicature should resume their ancient functions. The lords did not fail to put them in mind of those declarations, but very little more was done than that of appointing some lawyers to go the circuits, and entering into a debate about the necessity of constituting new judges. A committee of the commons had sat, at Goldsmith's-hall, ever since the beginning of the civil war, with almost unlimited power; and to them was committed the care of the greater part of the landed estates in the kingdom, being sequestered for the adherence of their owners to the royal cause. The lords were of opinion, that the public distractions of the nation could not be composed, unless those severities were laid aside, and more lenient methods pursued; and began to exert themselves with regard to the committee at Goldsmith's-hall. But this was a power the commons were determined to support, and not to suffer their proceedings to be examined. They therefore made an apology in favour of their committee, and plainly told the lords, that many of their house had petitioned for, and obtained large sums from that committee; particularly the earl of Northumberland ten thousand pounds; the earl of Kent, and the lord Gray of Warke, four thousand pounds each; the lord Say two thousand pounds, and the earls of Lincoln, Denbigh, and Stamford, fifteen hundred pounds each.

But the greatest grievance consisted in the army, which, though there was not now the shadow of an enemy in the field, was still kept up to the great terror of the presbyterian party, who were therefore determined to take the first favourable opportunity of reducing that alarming instrument of the independents. The army had for some time been greatly neglected, and had presented many petitions to the parliament for their arrears, which were not only disregarded, but an order had been made by both houses, that no part of the army should be quartered within twenty-five miles of London.

In the mean time the nation laboured under every species of oppression. The public distractions had discouraged trade, manufactures, and agriculture in England, and the public now reflected, in all the bitterness of spirit, on the blessings of tranquillity they formerly enjoyed, and which they now saw no hopes of returning. The presbyterians were desirous of dismissing the army, even without rewarding them for their former services. Cromwell very justly opposed their design by observing, that the parliament had nothing to support the authority they had acquired but the army. On the twenty-seventh of February a motion was made in the house with regard to the reduction of the forces, and carried by a majority of two only. It was then resolved to begin with reducing the cavalry, and it was determined that four thousand horse and one thousand dragoons would be sufficient for the service of the whole kingdom. They next proceeded to consider how the forces and garrisons of the kingdom should be disposed of and provided for; and the question was put, "whether there should be a number of foot kept up at the pay of the kingdom, more than will be sufficient for the keeping such garrisons as shall be continued." This question passed in the negative, notwithstanding the independents exerted all their interest to procure a larger number. It was soon after voted, "that three thousand horse, nine hundred foot, and twelve hundred dragoons, should be sent over to Ireland." But the most violent questions carried against the independents, were, "That no officer should command under Fairfax, above the degree of a colonel; and that no member of parliament should have the command of any garrison or fort in England." They next voted, "That such persons as shall be employed as officers in the garrisons, or forces that shall be kept up in the kingdom, under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax, shall conform to the establishment of the church, established by both houses of parliament."

These votes being directly levelled against the independents in the army, and who were the most active persons in it, it is no wonder that Cromwell and his party determined to attempt the independency of the army upon the ruins of the parliament. This was no difficult task for Cromwell to perform, by giving the officers a very unfavourable opinion of the house of lords, who were daily sending messages to the commons concerning the danger of the kingdom from the army. Manchester had indeed given the house a very unfavourable opinion of Cromwell's intentions, and the artful methods he made use of to gain an ascendancy over the army. The presbyterians in the army equally hated Cromwell, and had already voted, that the Scottish forces in Ireland should be sent back to their own country, and that the war in that kingdom should be prosecuted by the English forces only. This vote greatly alarmed the army; they well knew, that if they were once sent into Ireland, their petitions and remonstrances would have little weight: the parliament would leave them to earn a wretched subsistence with their swords in opposing the Irish rebels. The arrears due to the army were already very considerable, amounting to no less than three hundred and thirty-one thousand pounds. A petition was therefore presented to Sir Thomas Fairfax, by the officers of the army, in which they enumerated the hardships to which they must be reduced if their arrears were any longer deferred. Fairfax laid the petition before the parliament; but received only a harsh answer. The parliament even threatened to proceed against the promoters of the petition as enemies to the state and disturbers of the public peace.

As the army had certainly some reason for their petition, it is no wonder that the declaration of the parliament tended to increase rather than lessen the mutinous dispositions of the soldiers. They lamented, that they who had so long exposed themselves to every danger in order to establish the liberty of the subject, should themselves be deprived of the privileges of Englishmen, and even denied the privilege of representing their grievances. The commons, fearful of the consequences of exasperating the army, sent commissioners, at the head of whom were Cromwell and Ireton, to the head quarters at Saffron-Walden, to make proposals for entering into the Irish service. But instead of insisting, the generality absolutely rejected the terms, and desired an indemnity, ratified by the king, for any illegal actions, of which, during the course of the war, they might have been guilty; together with satisfaction for arrears, freedom freedom from pressing, relief for widows and maimed soldiers, and pay till disbanded. They expressed no dissatisfaction against Skippon, who was appointed to command the troops in Ireland, but discovered a much stronger desire of serving under Fairfax or Cromwell. The commissioners, who were in reality the sole cause of all the discontents in the army, failed not to foment the disorders they were sent to appease.

A military parliament, in opposition to that at Westminster, was immediately formed, consisting of two houses. The principal officers composed a council, or house of peers; while two private men, or inferior officers, chosen from each troop or company, under the title of agitators, formed the lower house. This establishment afforded an easy method for the leaders to augment the mutinous disposition of the army, without the least danger of being discovered. At the same time, the general humour that then prevailed in the nation for forming plans for imaginary republics, was, in some measure, gratified. Their first resolutions sufficiently indicated the consequences that would soon ensue from their deliberations. They voted, that the offers of the parliament were not satisfactory; that eight weeks pay (which was all, they said, the parliament promised) was but a small part of fifty-six weeks, which they pretended was their due; that no visible security was given for the remainder; and that having been declared public enemies by the commons, there was sufficient reason to fear, that unless the declaration was recalled, they might be hereafter prosecuted as such. Cromwell, in order to carry on his ambitious designs under the impenetrable veil of hypocrisy, had taken care to repair to London before these violent resolutions were taken, in order, as he pretended, to lay the increasing discontents of the army before the parliament.

Alarmed at these rebellious dispositions of the soldiers, the parliament determined to make one vigorous effort more, in order to support their authority. They voted, that all the troops that refused to insist for Ireland should be disbanded in their quarters. But this resolution was hardly passed by the commons, before the new parliament in the army ordered a general rendezvous of all the regiments, in order to concert measures for supporting their common interests. A plan secretly suggested by Cromwell, decided the victory in their favour. Not a moment was to be lost; both the magistracy and the militia of London had declared for the parliament; some of the best officers in England, and even the general himself, were for supporting the same authority; the sources of money were almost exhausted, and the soldiers had no other alternative than that of subduing the parliament, or submitting implicitly to their authority.

The king was still at Holmby-house, and guarded by a party of soldiers under the command of colonel Graves, who was supposed to be in the interest of the commons. It was, however, determined to seize the king's person, and conduct him to the army. A party of five hundred horse, commanded by one Joice, originally a taylor, but now advanced to the rank of cornet, accordingly marched for Holmby-house. The guard made not the least opposition; Joice came into the king's presence, armed with pistols, and bluntly told his majesty he must go with him immediately. "Whither?" said the king. "To the army," replied Joice. The king asked by what authority he acted, and required to see his warrant. Joice pointed to one of the soldiers he had brought with him, tall, handsome and well accoutered. "Truly," said the king, smiling, "your warrant is written in very legible characters; it may be read without spelling." In the mean time the parliament's commissioners, perceiving the guard made no opposition, sent an officer to know who commanded the party upon duty. He was answered, "That they all commanded." The commissioners now came into the room, and asked Joice if he had any orders from the parliament? He said, "No." "Have you any from the general?" "No." "By what authority do you act in this manner?" He pointed, as before, to the soldier. "We will write to the parliament," said they, "to know their pleasure." "You may if you please," replied Joice, "but in the mean time the king must immediately go with me." He added, that he had no design to insult the person of his majesty, but would conduct him with safety to their head quarters.

All resistance was in vain, and the king, after protracting the time as much as possible, stepped into his coach, and was carried to the army, who were then hastening to their rendezvous on Triplo-heath, near Cambridge.

Fairfax, who was totally a stranger to the whole transaction, knew not how to behave on this occasion. No body could be found who gave the orders, which were merely verbal; and while they were employed in tracing them to their source, Cromwell arrived from London and finished the debate. He justified the conduct of Joice, by asserting that Graves intended to carry his majesty to London the next day, where a treaty was intended to be signed between him and the parliament, and the poor soldiers left to shift for themselves; or perhaps be treated with greater severity. Fairfax was however far from being convinced of the propriety of Joice's conduct. He thought he had gone too far; but consented that the king should be carried back to Holmby-house, and reside there under a guard of his own officers and soldiers. But Whalley, a creature of Cromwell, being appointed to command the detachment, conducted his majesty to Newmarket, instead of Holmby-house.

The parliament were struck with astonishment when they were informed of this daring insult on their authority. The city was thrown into the utmost confusion; distraction seemed painted in every countenance. Many of the presbyterian members, terrified at the power of the army, either absented themselves from the house, or joined with the independents in passing such resolutions as might tend to allay the ferment raised among the soldiers. They voted that the army should receive their full demands, and that both officers and soldiers should receive a reasonable gratuity, besides their pay; but, at the same time, they voted, that the king should be conducted back to Holmby-house; while the lords pressed strongly that he should be carried to Oatlands. The army, however, put a negative upon both; and Joice openly avowed in the presence of the king, Fairfax and Cromwell, that what he had done was the sense of the whole soldiery, and that though he had undertaken to act in that manner without a written order from his commander, he had done no more than his duty. Both the council of officers, and house of agitators were wholly moved by the direction of Cromwell, who thus conveyed his will to the whole army. He had conducted himself in parliament with such profound dissimulation and refined hypocrisy, that he even deceived those, who had long made it a practice to deceive others. Whenever any intelligence of disorders in the army arrived, he appeared agitated in the most violent manner with the passions of grief and anger. He wept bitterly; he lamented the misfortunes of his country; he advised the most violent measures for suppressing the mutiny; and by giving these precipitate counsel, he at once seemed to prove his own sincerity, and inflamed those discontents of which he intended to make his own advantage. He appealed to heaven and earth, that his devoted attachment to the parliament had rendered him so odious in the army, that his life was exposed to the utmost danger while he continued among them. These asseverations produced the desired effect, and he had now, by his profound and artful conduct, attained a situation, where he could cover his enterprizes from the eye of the public; and by seeming either to obey the commands of his superior officer, or yield to the motions of the soldiers, could, with ease and secrecy, pave the way to his future greatness.

When Fairfax drew up the whole army on Triploheath, the soldiers seemed more dissatisfied than ever; there was not one among them who was satisfied with the last votes of parliament. The presbyterian party were now sufficiently alarmed, and immediately applied to the city for protection. Their request was granted, and two regiments of militia marched to Westminster for that purpose. This imprudent measure served only to increase the ferment already too violent in the army. It was pretended that the parliament itself was under restraint; and that it was therefore necessary for them to march into the neighbourhood of the capital, in order to restore liberty to the members. Fairfax, who solemnly disclaimed all intentions of breaking with the parliament, was pleased with what he considered as an instance of the soldiers duty, and gave orders for the army to march towards London. Destitute at once of talents for cabal, and of penetration to discover the cabals of others, Fairfax had given his confidence entirely to Cromwell, who, by the most specious pretences, the appearance of an open sincerity, and a scrupulous conscience, imposed on the easy nature of this brave and virtuous general.

On the twelfth of June advice arrived in London, that the army had advanced to St. Albans. The city had already armed their militia, drawn out their artillery, posted their guards, and displayed the same warlike appearance as in the beginning of the war against the king. But the enemy they were now to encounter was of a very different kind; and they were so greatly terrified with the names of Fairfax and Cromwell at the head of a powerful and victorious army, that on their approach, the warlike order of the militia subsided; letters full of civility and professions of esteem passed between the magistrates and the general, who still continued to advance, notwithstanding repeated messages were sent by the parliament, enjoining the general not to lead his army nearer than within forty miles of London. The parliament now found it necessary to submit, and endeavour, by compliance, to stop the fury of the enraged army. Their first indication was their ordering the vote, which declared the military petitioners public enemies, to be erased from their journal-book.

The tyranny exercised by the parliament had rendered them very unpopular: from being once the idol of the nation, they were now become the object of general hatred and aversion. They experienced the measures they had so lately adopted in their usurpations upon the crown. The army rose every day in their demands. One claim was no sooner granted, than another still more enormous and exorbitant was made: they seemed determined never to be satisfied. At first they only pretended to petition the parliament for what concerned themselves as soldiers: they next insisted on a vindication of their character: they then thought it necessary that their enemies should be punished; and at last they claimed the right of modelling the government, and settling the nation. In these exorbitant demands, they preserved, in words, the utmost deference and respect to the parliament, while in actions they insulted them in the grossest manner. They did not pretend to accuse the whole assembly; their petitions were levelled against evil counsellors only, by whom they said it was seduced and betrayed.

On the sixteenth of June, they charged with high treason, as enemies to the army, and evil counsellors to the state, the following eleven members: Denzil Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, Sir John Maynard, major-general Maffey, Mr. recorder Glyn, colonel Walter Long, colonel Edward Harley, and Mr. Anthony Nicholls. These members, who were the leaders of the presbyterian party, they insisted should be immediately sequestered from parliament, and committed to prison. The commons replied, that a general charge was not sufficient for them to proceed to such extremities. It was answered, that such a charge was thought sufficient in the cases of Strafford and Laud. Such is, generally, the case of contending parties, in the alternate usurpations of authority; they indulge themselves in the same excesses they had condemned in their adversaries.

It was in vain for the accused members to appeal to the people; the parliament was no longer considered as the defender of laws, and the restorer of liberty. It had exercised a power more arbitrary than that which had given occasion to its enterprizes against the crown. The excise on liquors and provisions, with a great variety of other imposts, had alienated the minds of the people, who had before been wholly strangers to such burthens. Immense sums (which, according to some authors, amounted to forty millions) levied in five years, gave ample occasion for complaints, especially when compared with the small subsidies paid before the civil war. The commissioners, who were intrusted with the disposal of this money, gave no account of it. The episcopal clergy, cruelly persecuted, without any other cause than their adherence to the principles of the church of England, were become an object of pity rather than hatred. In the room of the courts of high-commission and star-chamber, abolished with so much justice and spirit, tribunals by no means less odious were established in every county.

The general charge against the eleven members was succeeded by a declaration signed by Fairfax and his officers, asserting their right of keeping their arms, till they saw the purposes for which they first took them up fully answered. The paper was drawn up in a very masterly manner, and contained the following demands: "That both houses be immediately purged of such ministers who ought not to have a seat in that assembly: that those persons who have abused the confidence of the parliament and army, and endangered the kingdom, may be speedily disabled from doing any farther mischief: that some interval of time may be appointed for the continuance of this, as well as of future parliaments, and that new elections be successively made according to the bill for triennial parliaments: that provision be made to prevent future parliaments from being dissolved at the king's pleasure, without their consent, but suffered to sit their proper time: that the right of the people to represent to the parliament their grievances, by way of petition, may be vindicated: that the discretionary powers given to country-committees during the war, may be taken away, as they are now no longer necessary: that the people may be satisfied with regard to disbursements of the money levied on the nation: that public justice being satisfied by a few examples of the most exceptionable persons, some course may be taken, by a general act of oblivion, that all apprehensions of a future war may be entirely removed."

Terrified at these demands of the army, the city of London sent a deputation to St. Albans, disclaiming any intention to raise forces for opposing the army. This timidity of the citizens greatly intimidated the presbyterian party, which now became contemptible in the eyes of the soldiers. The prosecution against the eleven commoners was pushed with great violence; and the members themselves, unwilling to give occasion to fresh discords, begged leave to retire from the house; and the army, for the present, seemed satisfied with this mark of submission.

Having thus completely subdued the parliament, and no signs of resistance appearing in the city, the army, at the desire of the commons, retired farther from the capital, and fixed their head-quarters at Reading, carrying the king with them. He had experienced much greater lenity since he had been with the army than before: he enjoyed not only his favourite diversions, but his favourite mode of worship, ship, and the conversation of his favourite friends. His children were once allowed to visit him; and passed a few days at Caverham-house, where he resided. This interview was remarkably tender and affecting: no man ever loved his family more sincerely than Charles. Cromwell, who was present at this interview of the royal family, confessed he had never beheld so tender a scene.

The chiefs of the army seemed to pay their court to his majesty. Fairfax declared he intended to force the parliament to moderate their demands, and to restore him to his just rights. Cromwell and Ireton went still farther; they professed a respect, and even a veneration for his person; and actually imparted to him proposals, to which they promised to procure the agreement of the army, and to which he might assent with little or no violence to his conscience. All the agitators, except those infected with the principles of levelling, made the same professions, and were even friendly enough to put him upon his guard against those officers whose sincerity they suspected. The parliament, afraid of his forming some accommodation with the army, addressed him with far more respect than formerly: they even invited him to reside at Richmond, and contribute his assistance to the settlement of the nation. Charles flattered himself, that the present scene of distractions, oppressions and terror, would induce the people to reflect on that ancient form of government, under which they and their ancestors had so long enjoyed happiness and tranquillity.

Courted by both parties, the king hoped he should soon be restored to his just rights, and once more hold the sceptre of his ancestors. The independents, however, seemed to be most in his interest. He had sufficiently experienced the rigour of the parliament: they pretended wholly to annihilate his authority: they had confined his person. In both these particulars he had received more indulgence from the army. None of his friends were excluded from his presence. And in the proposals sent him by the council or officers for the settlement of the nation, they insisted neither on the abolition of episcopacy, nor on the punishment of the royalists; two points to which the king had the greatest reluctance. They also insisted, that a period should be put to the present parliament; a measure which Charles had extremely at heart. He hoped, by gratifying a few particular men, to draw over the whole army to his interest. Accordingly he offered to invest Cromwell with the order of the garter, create him earl of Essex, and give him the command of the army. Ireton was to be lord-lieutenant of Ireland. But notwithstanding these favourable appearances, the king was still sensible that they were but ambiguous proofs of the army's affection to his person and cause; he feared they were only intended to procure the countenance of him and his friends to favour their designs in effectually humbling the parliament. On the other hand, he reflected, that the independents, being the professed patrons of the liberties of the people, could not surely act so contrary to their own principles, as to deny that liberty to their king. What they demanded for their own consciences, they could not, with the least appearance of reason, deny to his.

The militia of London had lately been put under the command of presbyterian officers, and the army now determined to place it in the hands of the independents. This, together with the unsettled state of public affairs, occasioned petitions to be sent to the parliament from all ranks and degrees of people. The garrisons in the country, being neglected and ill paid, began to mutiny, and send petitions to both houses for redress. The Welsh forces were actually in arms against the parliament. The northern army had imprisoned Pointz, their old, brave, and successful general. Many of the soldiers who had engaged to go to Ireland, retracted their promise, and offered their service to Fairfax. Those who had insisted under the parliament, amounting to several thousands, held nightly meetings to consult the most proper measures to be pursued at this alarming crisis. These disorders were wholly occasioned by the army of Fairfax, who had engrossed to themselves all the money that had been raised. The people no longer paid any reverence to the parliament. Multitudes of young men and apprentices flocked to Westminster with petitions, some for the old committee of militia, and others against it; but all of them speaking in the strain of supreme authority, as if both the parliament and army had been their servants. The artful Cromwell enjoyed this storm; which he perceived would soon sweep before it all the obstacles that opposed his ambition. One day the mob of the independents; the next that of the presbyterians; prevailed. The parliament was no longer guided by those able men who could direct the tumult, and turn confusion to their own advantage; the populace were now masters, and the parliament had no will of its own.

It seemed, therefore, absolutely necessary for the army to march to London, as the parliament was entirely directed by a seditious multitude. Accordingly the troops began their march from Reading towards the capital. When they reached Hounslow-heath, they were drawn up, and exhibited a very formidable appearance. They were twenty thousand strong; and determined, without any regard to laws or liberty, to pursue whatever measures their generals should think proper. Here they were met by the speakers of the two houses, Manchester and Lenthall, attended by eight peers, and about sixty commoners; who having secretly left the city, presented themselves, with their maces, and all the ensigns of their dignity; and complaining of the violence exercised by the citizens, applied to the army for defence and protection. They were received with the greatest demonstrations of joy; the same respect was paid them as to the parliament of England; and the army, being provided with so plausible a pretence, advanced to chastise the rebellious city, and to reinstate the violated parliament in all their liberties and privileges.

On the thirtieth of July, the parliament met, pursuant to their prorogation; and it being now absolutely necessary for them either to resign their whole authority, or oppose the violent designs of the army, they resolved upon the latter. Accordingly they chose two new speakers, lord Hunston and Henry Pelham. Vigorous measures were immediately pursued. One of their first votes was to require the general not to advance nearer than thirty miles of London, or, if already advanced, to retire to that distance. They renewed their former orders for insisting troops, and appointed Massey their commander. They ordered the artillery to be drawn out, and the trained bands to man the lines. The whole city was in a ferment; every corner resounded with military preparations. But the terror of an universal pillage, and even massacre, had seized the timid inhabitants: confusion was painted in every countenance. When any intelligence arrived that the army halted, or seemed to make preparations for a retreat, the cry of "One and all!" ran with alacrity from street to street among the citizens. When news came of their advancing, the cry of "Treat and capitulate," was equally loud and vehement. All was uproar, confusion, and dismay.

Next day the lords and commons voted, "that his majesty be desired to come to London, and there treat with both houses of parliament and the commissioners of Scotland for a safe and honourable peace." But the affairs of the parliament were now in such confusion, that this vote, which was sent to Fairfax, was disregarded, and the army continued still to approach nearer to the capital. Rainborow having been detached over Kington-bridge, at the head of a strong party, presented himself before Southwark, and was gladly received by some soldiers quartered there for its defence, and who were resolved not to separate their interests from those of the army. It was now absolutely necessary for the city to capitulate, though nothing better than the following dishonourable conditions could be obtained: "That they should desert the interest of the impeached members, recall their declaration lately published, relinquish their militia, deliver up all their forts and line of communication to the army, together with the Tower of London, and all the magazines of arms and military stores deposited in that fortress; disband all their forces, and drive all the reformadoes out of the line; withdraw all their guards from the houses of parliament, and receive within the lines such forces as the army shall think necessary; demolish their works, and suffer the whole army to march through the city."

These terms were complied with: the army marched in triumph through the city; but preserved the greatest order, decency, and the appearance of humility. The two speakers were conducted to Westminster, and took their seats without the least opposition. The eleven impeached members, being accused of exciting the late tumult, were expelled, and most of them retired beyond the seas. Seven peers were impeached: the lord mayor, one of the sheriffs, and three aldermen, sent to the Tower: several citizens and officers of the militia committed to prison; and every act of the parliament annulled, from the day of the tumult till the return of the speakers. The lines of communication were levelled; the militia restored to the independents; and regiments were quartered in Whitehall and the Mews. Every thing being completed, the parliament and city entirely reduced to servitude; and the sword alone giving law to the state, a day was appointed for a solemn thanksgiving to God for the restoration of liberty.

The army now lay in the neighbourhood of Putney, greatly distressed for want of money, and threatening every moment to break into the city, and become their own pay-masters. Fairfax, who was still the tool of Cromwell, though his intentions were sincere with regard to the peace and happiness of his country, found the utmost difficulty in restraining the impatience of the soldiers, and the spirit of levelling which was now diffused among the troops, by means of the agitators. The general council of the army was now applied to in the same manner as the parliament had been formerly; nor did the commons venture to pass any vote of importance without knowing the sense of the officers. The presbyterian party, however, still gave the generals great uneasiness on the popular topic of sending relief to Ireland; and some votes passed for sending seven or eight regiments over to that distressed kingdom, which the officers of the army did not think prudent to oppose. Cromwell, however, found a pretence, from the want of money, to render the whole ineffectual for the present. Even that daring leader himself found some difficulty of rendering the resentment of the agitators abortive; he was obliged to chastise some of them with his own hand, and to order others to be tried by a court-martial.

The leaders of the army, who now, in reality, governed the nation, carried the king to Hampton Court, where he resided, for some time, with all the appearance of dignity and freedom. He possessed so remarkable an equanimity of temper, that, during all the variety of fortune which attended him, no change was perceived either in his countenance or behaviour. Though a prisoner in the hands of his most inveterate enemies, he supported, towards all that approached him, the majesty of a monarch. His manner, which was not in itself popular or gracious, now appeared truly amiable, from its meekness and equality.

While the king continued at Hampton Court, the parliament again presented him with nearly the same conditions which they had offered him at Newcastle. The army also offered him propositions for a peace. Charles seemed to prefer the latter, and desired the parliament to take the proposals of the army into consideration, and make them the foundation of the public settlement. The offers of the army were to the following purpose:

"That there be biennial parliaments, each to sit one hundred and twenty days, and after that time to be adjournable or dissolvable at the king's pleasure; that this biennial parliament may appoint committees to sit during the interval for such purposes as shall be thought necessary: that the king, with the advice of the council of state, may call a parliament extraordinary during the intervals, with proper limitations of meeting and dissolving: that the biennial parliament be never interrupted: that a better proportion be observed in elections; all counties to have a number of members proportional to the taxes they pay to the public: that no poor boroughs send any more representatives to parliament: that effectual provision be made for the freedom of elections; and that the parliament only have power to give directions for that purpose: that liberty be allowed for entering dissent in the house of commons; and no member be censured for what he shall say in parliament, but by the house itself: that the judicial power of the lords and commons be established without appeal, and the king rendered incapable of pardoning offenders condemned by them, without their consent: that the peers have no jurisdiction over the commons without the concurrence of that house, and the members judged only by those of their equals: that grand-jurymen be chosen by the several parts and divisions of each county respectively, and not left to the discretion of any under sheriff; and that these grand-jurymen at each assize present the names of persons to be made justices of the peace; and at the summer assizes, the names of three persons, out of whom the king shall chuse one for sheriff."

"That, for the future security of parliament and the militia in general, an act be passed for vesting in both houses, or persons whom they shall appoint, the power of the militia by land and sea, during ten years: that it shall not be exercised by the king, nor by any person appointed by him, during the said interval; nor afterwards, but by the advice of the parliament, council of state, or the parliamentary committees during the recess: that both houses raise and dispose of money for such forces as shall be thought necessary, for the payment of the public debts, and for the uses of the kingdom: that these ten years security may be rendered firmer, it shall be provided, that none who have carried arms against the parliament, during the late war, be capable of any office or trust during five years, without consent of parliament; nor sit as members thereof, till after the second biennial parliament."

"That, in order to restore peace to the kingdom of Ireland, commissioners for the admiralty, together with an admiral and vice-admiral, be appointed, with ample powers to execute fully these offices; and that sufficient pay be provided for the service: that the forces in pay be commanded by a lord-general: that commissioners be appointed to discipline the militia in every county; and also a council of state to superintend the powers given to these commissioners: that the said council have the same power with the king's privy-council, but not to make war or peace without consent of parliament: that this council of trusty and able persons do continue in office during their good behaviour, but not above seven years: that a sufficient pay be provided for the standing forces; the establishment to continue till two months after the meeting of the first biennial parliament."

"That an act be passed for disposing of the great offices of state for ten years by the lords and commons in parliament, and by the committees in the intervals, in submission to the approbation of the next parliament; and after the expiration of that term, they shall name three, out of whom the king shall appoint one, to fill up any vacancy."

"That

"That all the peers created since the great seal was carried to Oxford on the twenty-first of May, 1642, be disabled from sitting and voting in parliament."

"That an act be passed to annul all the acts, declarations, &c. against the parliament and their adherents; and to confirm the ordinances for indemnity."

"That an act be passed to make void all grants passed under the great seal, since the twenty-first of May, 1642; and to confirm and render those valid that passed under the great seal made by authority of parliament."

"That the treaties between England and Scotland be confirmed, and that conservators be appointed for preserving the peace between the two kingdoms."

"That the ordinance for taking away the court of wards and liveries be confirmed; but the king's revenue to be made up some other way, and the officers of those courts to have reparation."

"That an act be passed, declaring the cessation of arms in Ireland to be void, and leaving that war to the prosecution of the parliament."

"That a bill be passed for taking away all coercive power, authority and jurisdiction of bishops, and all other ecclesiastical officers, extending to civil penalties upon any, or to repeal all laws whereby the civil magistracy hath been, or is bound, upon any ecclesiastical censure, to proceed, ex officio, unto any civil penalties against any persons so censured."

"That all the penal laws, or clauses, enjoining the use of the common prayer, and for imposing penalties for not coming to church, be repealed; and that some provision be made for discovering of recusants."

"That the taking of the covenant be not enforced upon any person, and that all ordinances enjoining it be repealed."

"That these particulars being provided for, his majesty, his queen, and their royal issue, be restored to a condition of honour and freedom in this nation, without diminution of their personal rights, or farther limitation of the exercise of their power."

"That a certain number of persons, not exceeding five for the English, besides the Irish rebels, be referred to the judgment of the parliament; and that the grievances of the people, with regard to the abuses of lawyers, imprisonments for debts, regulations of assessments, and removing the disputes about tithes, asserting the people's rights in petitioning, and various other grievances, be redressed."

These offers of the army were certainly more reasonable, and better calculated to form a solid foundation for peace, than those of the parliament. But some event, or the ambitious designs of Cromwell, rendered the whole scheme abortive. Several writers have asserted, that the daring usurper really intended to make a private bargain with the king; a measure which carried the most plausible appearance, both with regard to his own safety and advancement; but that he found insuperable difficulties in reconciling to it the wild humours of the army. Others say, that a discovery made by Cromwell prevented his closing with the king, and determined him to pursue the ambitious scheme he had formed of becoming himself the despotic master of the whole kingdom.

In the memoirs of lord Broghill we meet with the following story, which deserves some attention, as it agrees very well with the character of Cromwell. It is related in the following manner, by Mr. Maurice, chaplain to Roger, earl of Orrery. "Lord Orrery, in the time of his greatness with Cromwell, just after he had so seasonably relieved him in great distress at Clonwell, riding out at Youghall one day with him and Ireton, they fell into discourse about the king's death. Cromwell thereupon said more than once, that if the king had followed his own judgment, and had been attended by none but trusty servants, he had fooled them all; and that once they had a mind to have closed with him, but, upon something that happened, fell off from that design. Orrery, finding them in good humour, and being alone with them, asked, if he might presume to desire to know, why they would once have closed with his majesty, and why they did not? Cromwell very freely told him he would satisfy him in both his queries. The reason, said he, why we would have closed with the king was this: we found that the Scotch and presbyterians began to be more powerful than we, and were like to agree with him, and leave us in the lurch. For this reason we thought it best to prevent them, by offering first to come in upon reasonable conditions: but while our thoughts were taken up with this subject, there came a letter to us from one of our spies, who was of the king's bedchamber acquainting us, that our final doom was decreed that very day; that he could not possibly learn what it was, but we might discover it, if we could but intercept a letter sent from the king to the queen, wherein he informed her of his resolution; that this letter was sown up in the skirt of a saddle, and the bearer of it would come with the saddle upon his head, about ten o'clock that night, to the Blue Boar in Holborn, where he was to take horse for Dover. The messenger knew nothing of the letter in the saddle, though some in Dover did. We were at Windsor, continued Cromwell, when we received this letter, and immediately upon the receipt of it, Ireton and I resolved to take one trusty fellow with us, and go in troopers habits to that inn. We did so, and leaving our man at the gate of the inn, (which had a wicket only open to let persons in and out) to watch and give us notice when any man came in with a saddle, we went into a drinking-stall. We there continued drinking canss of beer, till about ten o'clock, when our centinel at the gate gave us notice, that the man with the saddle was come. We rose up presently, and just as the man was leading out his horse saddled, we came up to him with drawn swords, and told him, we were to search all that went in or out there; but as he looked like an honest man, we would only search his saddle and so dismiss him. The saddle was ungirt; we carried it into the stall where we had been drinking, and ripping open one of the skirts, we there found the letter we wanted. Having thus got it into our hands, we delivered the man (whom we had left with our centinel) his saddle, told him he was an honest fellow, and bid him go about his business; which he did, pursuing his journey without more ado, and ignorant of the harm he had suffered. We found in the letter, that his majesty acquainted the queen, that he was courted by both factions, the Scots presbyterians and the army; and that those who bade the fairest for him, should have him: but yet he thought he should close with the Scots sooner than with the other. Upon this we returned to Windsor; and finding we were not likely to obtain good terms from the king, we from that time vowed his destruction."

Whether this story be true or false, it is certain that the behaviour of the officers of the army was about that time greatly altered towards his majesty. Cromwell indeed pretended, that he was obliged to act in a very different manner from what he had hitherto done. He said that the agitators had rendered him odious to the army, and had represented him as a traitor; who, for the sake of private interest, was ready to betray the cause of God to the great enemy of piety and religion. At the same time he pretended that desperate projects were formed, and that he, feared all the authority of the officers would not be sufficient to prevent these violent enthusiasts from executing their bloody purpose.

Charles was now sufficiently alarmed, and justly concluded, that if these assertions were true, it would be unsafe for him to stay any longer at Hampton court; if they were not true, they could be thrown but for no other reason than that of making him a close prisoner. At all events therefore he determined to attempt his escape before he was deprived of the few remains of liberty he still enjoyed. He was confirmed in this resolution by the looks, the gestures, and the expressions that dropt from the officers and soldiers at Hampton-court, as he walked about the gardens and village. He understood that this alteration was owing to his not embracing the army's propositions without reserve, and his not excluding the Scots and parliament from the negotiation.

Determined to take this imprudent step, and without forming any rational scheme for the disposal of his person, Charles effected his escape from Hampton-court in a dark stormy night with more ease than could have been expected. He had no other attendants in his flight than Sir John Berkley, Mr. Ashburnham, and Mr. Legg, all gentlemen of his bed-chamber. The difficulties they encountered on the way, and in passing through the forest in a dismal night, must have discouraged any person, but one in Charles's situation, who thought no danger so dreadful as that he had escaped. Early in the morning he reached Tichfield, a seat belonging to the earl of Southampton, where the countess dowager resided, a woman of great honour, to whom the king knew he might safely intrust his person. But he could not hope to continue long concealed at Tichfield: and it was not easy to determine what measure it was most prudent to embrace. Hammond, a creature of Cromwell's, and who had married a daughter of the famous Hamden, was governor of the Isle of Wight, which lay in the neighbourhood of Tichfield. Very little surely could be expected from a man devoted to the chiefs of the army, yet, because he was nephew to Dr. Hammond, the king's favourite chaplain, it was thought proper to have recourse to him in this alarming exigence. Ashburnham and Berkley were accordingly dispatched, with orders not to inform Hammond where the king was concealed, unless he would promise not to deliver him up to any person whatever; or if he could not protect him, to restore him to his liberty. The very nature of the negotiation itself sufficiently demonstrates that the king was under the greatest anxiety of mind when he sent his servants into the Isle of Wight: for what security could be expected from Hammond? or how could Carisbrook-castle, weak and unprovided with military stores, be sufficient to defend the person of his majesty against the joint efforts of the parliament and army? Notwithstanding this, had Ashburnham, who alone was acquainted with Hammond, acted conformable to the instructions he had received, he might, at least, have escaped the snare-into which he fell. But without exacting any promise from Hammond, he treacherously, or at least imprudently, brought the governor to Tichfield; and Charles, distracted and amazed at this wrong step of his servant, passed over with Hammond to the Isle of Wight, and was received at Carisbrook-castle with great appearances of respect.

The king's departure from Hampton-court was not discovered for near an hour after; when some persons entering his chamber, found on the table several letters directed to the parliament, to the general, and to the officer who had attended him. The parliament was confounded with the news of the king's escape, and voted it high-treason, and death without mercy, in any one to conceal his person. But they were soon relieved from their terror, by letters from Hammond; on the receipt of which it was resolved, that the king should be confined in Carisbrook-castle, and none of his friends or adherents be either suffered to visit him, or even continue on the island.

The king being thus in a place of safety, and the parliament incapable of resisting the army, Cromwell applied himself seriously to quell the disorders among the troops, which had been at first artfully fomented by himself, but which were now risen to a height that seemed to threaten the destruction of all order and government. The members of the republic established in the army, thought themselves fully qualified to settle the kingdom, and various schemes for that purpose were every day debated by these military legislators. It was on all hands determined to abolish royalty, and set nobility aside: all ranks of men were to be levelled, and an universal equality of property, as well as of power, was to be introduced among mankind. They said that the saints were the salt of the earth; that an entire equality had place among the elect; and that the most common centinel, if enlightened by the holy spirit, was entitled to the same respect as the greatest commander, and equally capable of executing all the offices of government. Cromwell found it was high time to put a period to those enthusiastic opinions, which would otherwise destroy his whole ambitious scheme of power. He accordingly issued orders that the meetings of the agitators should be discontinued. But they did not, in this respect, chuse to pay an implicit obedience to their general. They had tasted the sweets of power, and were unwilling to resign it. They secretly continued their meetings, and made no difficulty of asserting, that their own officers, as well as the church and state, stood in need of a reformation. Several of the regiments were so heated with these enthusiastic ideas, that they joined in presenting seditious remonstrances to their general: they even appointed separate places of rendezvous; and every thing seemed to threaten an universal anarchy and confusion. The resolution of Cromwell only was able to put a stop to this alarming appearance of the commencement of the most dreadful disorders. He chose the time of a review for striking terror into the levellers; and as soon as the troops were drawn up in order, Cromwell seized the ring-leaders in the presence of their companions; held a council of war upon the spot; and caused one of the mutineers to be shot directly. Struck with terror at the boldness of the action, the rest of the levellers threw down the symbols of sedition, which they had carried before them, returned immediately to their duty, and readily submitted to the usual discipline.

While Cromwell was employed in quelling the disorders of the army, a committee of lords and commons, with the earl of Denbigh at their head, was sent to the king with four bills, to which he was desired to give the royal assent. The first was for settling the militia of the kingdom; the second for recalling all declarations, oaths and proclamations against the parliament, and their adherents; the third for disabling those lords, created since the great seal was carried to Oxford, from sitting and voting in the house of peers; and the fourth for giving power to both houses of parliament to adjourn themselves as they may think proper. The king was required to give his answer in four days; but the Scottish commissioners presented a strong remonstrance against the four bills, and insisted on a personal treaty with his majesty at London. This occasioned great uneasiness to the independents at Westminster, and several spirited papers passed between them. The Scots reproached the English parliament with having broken all the fundamental articles of the agreement between the two kingdoms. This breach gave great pleasure to the king, and the Scots were indeed now so well disposed to serve him, that they offered, if he would make his escape to Berwick, to support him with the whole force of their kingdom. Whether this quarrel induced Charles to flatter himself that the parliament would be obliged to offer him more reasonable conditions, or whether he hoped that the army would insist upon more equitable terms, is uncertain, but the king thought proper to reject the bills.

Cromwell having reduced the agitators to obedience, now determined to carry the ambitious scheme he had formed into execution. He did not however think proper to intrust the whole of his design to any but Ireton, and two or three particular favourites.

From

From the suggestion of Ireton, Cromwell called at Windsor a secret council of the chief officers of the army, in order to deliberate of the most proper methods for settling the kingdom; and the future disposal of the king's person. Before the council began, Cromwell poured out devout prayers; when the minds of the members were sufficiently elevated by enthusiastic raptures, the conferences were begun, and the black design of bringing the king to justice; and punishing their sovereign, under the sanction of a judicial sentence, was first proposed, and resolved to be carried into execution.

A. D. 1648. When the committee from the Isle of Wight reported to the house, that the king had absolutely refused to pass their bills, insisting, that all the terms on both sides should be adjusted; before any concessions should be insisted on; the republican party took fire at this refusal: they openly inveighed, in the most virulent terms, against the person and government of the king; whose name hitherto, in all debates, had been mentioned with some degree of reverence. Sir Thomas Worth had the boldness to move, that the king should be removed, and committed close prisoner to some inland castle; that articles of impeachment should be drawn up against him, he himself deprived of all share in the administration, and a new form of government established. This motion was seconded by Cromwell and Ireton with great warmth, but in general terms. The former desired them to settle the nation without having any farther recourse to the king; who had rejected all their propositions; promising that the army, who had hitherto defended the parliament at the expence of their blood, would still continue, with fidelity and courage, to protect them against all opposition, in this vigorous measure. "But," added he, with a stern look, "teach them not, by your neglecting your own safety, and that of the kingdom, (in which theirs too is involved) to imagine themselves betrayed, and their interest abandoned to the rage and malice of an irreconcilable enemy, whom, for your sake, they have dared to provoke. Beware," he cried, raising his voice, and clapping his hand on his sword, "beware, lest despair cause them to seek safety by some other means, by adhering to you, who know not how to consult your own safety; and how destructive such a resolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to consider."

The house well knew that it was much easier for Cromwell to execute than to utter a menace, and shuddered at the thought. The question, therefore, of no more addresses being presented to his majesty, was carried by a majority of forty-nine. This vote, in reality, dethroned the king, and formally overturned the whole constitution. But it was not enough to resolve on so violent a measure; it was determined to support it by a declaration equally violent. The king was accused of the blackest crimes, however improbable; in order, by blasting his fame, to prevent the populace from uniting in his favour. Not only government, but even society itself, seemed to be overturned. The people looked with contempt upon the parliament, and with execration upon the army. One John Lilburn, an active, resolute fellow, whose conduct is still a paradox, had been committed to the Tower by the house of lords, but released by the commons, and re-committed by the peers. Being afterwards questioned by the commons for some incendiary practices, he boldly disowned the authority that had committed him; upon which he was sent to the same prison by the commons themselves. His cause now became the cause of the people; and the nation was filled with petitions and counter-petitions, each wilder than the other, all of them in the wrong, and all dictated by ignorant, headstrong fanatics. Cromwell enjoyed these national clamours; his whole scheme depended on preventing the people from uniting against the army.

Hammond now received orders to treat the king with great severity. All his servants were removed, his correspondence with his friends cut off, and no person allowed to visit him. An old, decrepid man, employed to kindle his fire, was the best company he enjoyed during the interval of this rigorous confinement, which lasted several months. At the same time, new prosecutions were carried on against his friends. Hollis and Maynard, together with most of the eleven commoners lately impeached by the army, had resumed their seats in the house, and spoke with great boldness and freedom against the violent measures pursued by the independents. It was therefore necessary to silence these opposers, whose speeches had the most alarming effect among the people. Their impeachments were accordingly re-assumed, and a vote passed for rendering them incapable of ever sitting again in that parliament.

The mutinies and spirit of levelling, which still prevailed among the soldiers, notwithstanding the attempts of Cromwell to reduce them to obedience, afforded now the only gleam of hope to the royalists. The Scots indeed, who were highly exasperated at the measures pursued by the independents, were proceeding vigorously in their levies for invading England; but their late conduct had been so detestable, that very few of the royalists joined them. But amidst this gloomy night of despair, a gleam of hope unexpectedly appeared, which seemed to revive the spirits of his majesty's friends. For though Cromwell was master of the king's person, the general, the parliament, the city, and the army, the nation, in general, thought as freely as ever, and beheld, with impatience and indignation, the handful of fanatics who held them in chains. But great art was requisite to unite into one common cause so many people differing in their principles, their characters, their actions, and their interests. The greater part of the presbyterians were now well disposed to join the royalists; and were headed by the earl of Holland, Sir William Waller, the generals Poyer and Laughern, and other officers and persons of distinction, who had signalized themselves against the king. General Goring, the earl of Norwich, lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and a few others, directed the royalists; and undertook to raise the northern provinces; while Sir Marmaduke Langdale engaged for the northern, together with Berwick and Carlisle. The Scots were to be commanded by the duke of Hamilton, and the Welsh by Laughern and Poyer. But the chief dependence of the royal party rested on an intrigue now carrying on for putting the fleet under the command of the prince of Wales. The seamen had been, for some time, neglected, so that very little art was necessary to prevail upon them to desert a party that seemed to treat them with contempt. Seventeen ships, lying in the mouth of the river, declared for the king; and putting Rainborough, their admiral, ashore, sailed over to Holland, and took on board the prince of Wales.

The first who declared themselves were Langhorne and Poyer, who having a considerable body of Welsh troops under their command, displayed the royal standard, and were joined by great numbers of persons. They were already masters of Chepstow, Pembroke, and several other places of strength in that country, and their army exhibited a formidable appearance. Hales, a young gentleman of fortune in Kent, put himself at the head of the royalists in that county with surprizing success. Sandwich, Dover, Gravesend, Canterbury, and almost every place of strength in the county, declared for the king. Lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and other gentlemen of fortune, excited commotions in Essex; while the earl of Holland raised forces in Surry. Pomfret-castle, in Yorkshire, was surprised by Maurice. Langdale and Musgrave were in arms, and masters of Berwick and Carlisle, in the north.

The Scots were impatient to enter England, but their march was delayed by the opposition made by the general assembly. The parliament had voted to raise an army of forty thousand men, and to call over a considerable body under Monro, who commanded the Scots forces in Ireland. The rigid presbyterians, headed by Argyle, dreaded the success of Hamilton. They saw, that if his army proved victorious, the natural consequence would be the restoration of monarchy, before presbytery was established in England. They considered all attempts to join the king, before he had subscribed the covenant, as no other than sapping the very foundations of christianity. They were, indeed, highly offended with the independents, who profanely called their covenant an almanack out of date, and claimed an unbounded liberty of conscience, which the presbyterians regarded with horror. But they hated the king more than they abhorred toleration, and thundered out anathemas against all who paid obedience to the parliament. Thus the two supreme tribunals in the kingdom directly opposed each other. One threatened the people with eternal torments if they assisted the royal party in England; the other pronounced against them the sentence of imprisonment, banishment, and military execution, if they refused.

Amidst such jarring interests it is no wonder that the levies went on very slowly. The royal party in England exclaimed loudly of these delays, which they attributed to a refined policy in the Scots; as if their intentions were that all the king's party should first be suppressed, and the victory be entirely owing to the presbyterians. Hamilton, with much better reason, complained of the precipitate measures of the English royalists, who, by their ill-timed insurrections, forced him to march his army before his levies were completed, or his preparations in sufficient forwardness. The Scottish parliament, not intimidated by the violent measures of the general assembly, resolved to send three demands to the English parliament, and if they were refused, to order their army to march immediately and join the royal party. Their first demand was, the establishment of the presbyterian religion in England. This they well knew would be rejected by the independents, and flattered themselves that this refusal would render the king's cause more popular in Scotland. Their second demand was, that Charles might come to some of his own houses in the neighbourhood of London, with honour, freedom, and safety, in order to the establishment of a safe and equitable peace. And their last, that the army of Fairfax might be disbanded, and the English parliament restored to its freedom. The messenger who carried these demands was limited with regard to time, and during the interval, the Scottish forces were recalled from Ireland, and the earl of Inchiquin, at the head of the English troops in that kingdom declared for the king. No satisfactory answer being returned to the demands of the Scottish parliament, Hamilton published a spirited declaration, and numbers of the royal party prepared to join his army, as soon as he had passed the English borders.

The sword of civil discord, which had hardly been sheathed, was again drawn, and seemed to threaten the whole kingdom with destruction. The parliament at Westminster beheld these commotions with terror, and shuddered for the event. The independents in the army quartered in the neighbourhood of London, made no secret of their design to plunder the capital as soon as the Scottish forces entered England, in order to prevent the citizens from joining their presbyterian brethren. This declaration struck the wealthy inhabitants with horror. The whole city was in a ferment, and the people so much exasperated, that they attacked and overpowered a party of the trained bands, and advanced in a body to Whitehall, where they were met by Cromwell, at the head of two regiments of horse, who drove them back into the city, but thinking it would be imprudent to pursue the blow, the tumult increased to so violent a degree, that the lord-mayor was obliged to take shelter in the city. The next morning Cromwell persuaded Fairfax to give him leave to enter the city with two regiments of horse. This produced the desired effect. Struck with terror at the appearance of that victorious general, the people dispersed, and tranquillity was once more restored in the capital. This was the only attempt made by the Londoners in support of the royal cause: the terror of the army kept the citizens in subjection. They were obliged to bear the humiliating yoke of being governed by the drags of the people, and to see hypocrites exercising iniquity under the mask of religion.

On the eighth of May advice arrived that the royalists were in motion, and that the number of forces in Wales was daily increasing. The establishment of the army at this time, was twenty-six thousand men; but by insisting supernumeraries, the regiments were greatly augmented, and in general consisted of more than double their stated complement. Cromwell was ordered to march into Wales, at the head of two regiments of horse and three of foot, to relieve colonel Horton, who commanded in that principality, while Fairfax himself undertook the service in the north. Laughern, who had formed an engagement with the Scots, declared himself too soon; for before Cromwell reached the borders of Wales, and even before Laughern had procured arms for his men, Horton found means to put himself between the horse and foot of Laughern's army. A battle ensued, in which the Welsh forces were completely routed; and major-general Stradling, with twenty-six captains, one hundred and fifty subalterns, and near three thousand soldiers were made prisoners. This defeat, however, did not subdue the whole party; they were still masters of several strong places, and seemed determined to defend them to the last extremity. Cromwell therefore sat down before Chepstow-castle; but finding it too well fortified to be soon reduced, he left a small party to block up the fortrefs, and marched with the main body of his forces into Pembrokeshire. On the eleventh of June he took the town and castle of Pembroke, and obliged Laughern and Poyer to surrender at discretion. Chepstow soon after fell into his hands, by which the principality of Wales was sufficiently reduced, and Cromwell made dispositions for leading his forces into the north, in order to oppose the Scots and royalists; the insurrections in Kent, Surry, and Suffolk, not suffering Fairfax to march into that country as he at first intended.

Petitions from several counties were now presented to parliament in favour of the king, and the inhabitants of Surry were so highly exasperated, as not receiving an immediate answer, that they attacked and killed several of the soldiers who were guarding the parliament. The Kentishmen, who were now on their march towards London, in order, as they pretended, to present a petition to the parliament, made choice of the earl of Norwich for their general. The commons were alarmed, and the earl of Pembroke was dispatched with terms to the insurgents. He offered indemnity to all who should lay down their arms, and free liberty to present their petition, after they had delivered up the towns, magazines, and stores they had seized. His offers were rejected, and the Kentishmen marched to Blackheath, where they drew up their forces, and prepared to make an attack upon the capital, persuaded that the citizens would open their gates upon the first summons. By this time Fairfax had collected his army, and the Kentishmen were informed by the parliament, that they must treat with their general. This greatly dispirited the insurgents, and perceiving no motion was made by the citizens in their favour, they retreated with great precipitation to Maidstone, where a party of them was attacked and cut to pieces by Fairfax. The earl of Norwich now thought that a fair opportunity now offered of giving the parliament's general the slip, and of advancing again towards the capital; fully persuaded that the citizens, being now delivered from the terrors of the army, would declare in his favour. He accordingly returned with the main body of his forces to Blackheath, where he hoped to be joined by the inhabitants of Suffex and Surry. But he was deceived in all his expectations; and a sudden panic seizing his soldiers, they deserted their general, and returned to their respective habitations. Upwards of two thousand of them, however, still kept together, and it was determined, if possible, to pass over into Essex, where they were informed the county was in arms for the king, under the command of lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and other officers of courage and experience. Not more than a thousand of them passed the river, where they were obliged to cut their way through a regiment belonging to the Tower-Hamlets, and afterwards to skirmish with the parliament's forces, during their march to Chelmsford, where they were joined by lord Capel, and the other officers already mentioned. Their army now amounted to three thousand men; but being in no condition to fight Fairfax, they pursued their march to Colchester, made themselves masters of the place, and took the parliament's committee prisoners.

During these transactions Fairfax crossed the Thames with his army at Gravesend, and marched with great expedition to Colchester, from a persuasion that the town was wholly destitute of fortifications, and that the royalists, who had retired thither, must surrender at discretion. He was mistaken. The enemy made a noble defence: few sieges in history are so remarkable as that of Colchester. Fairfax in person led his troops to the charge, which was at once both brave and desperate; but they were beaten off with loss by the besieged. The charge was again and again repeated, but without success, and Fairfax, unwilling to expose his troops to inevitable destruction, changed the siege into a blockade.

The nation was now wholly in a blaze, which could only be quenched by the blood of its inhabitants. Besides Kent, Essex, Wales, and the northern counties, the Cornish men were in arms; but were soon defeated at Penzance by Sir Hardress Waller, who afterwards took possession of Exeter. The inhabitants of Rutlandshire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, and the neighbouring counties, also took up arms, and were defeated by colonel Waite, near Stamford. Sir John Owen renewed the war in Wales, and besieged Carnarvan-castle, but his forces were routed; and he himself taken prisoner by colonel Carter. The most determined enemies of the parliament were those who, in the beginning of the war, had been the most active against Charles. They were therefore considered as apostates by the army, and punished with much greater severity than even the royalists themselves.

The removal of the army from the capital, though not sufficient to induce the city to declare in the king's favour, tended greatly to inspire the presbyterians in parliament with fresh vigour. They recovered so much spirit from the insurrections, which afforded sufficient employment for the forces under Fairfax and Cromwell, that they determined to make another attempt to conclude a peace with his majesty. On the twenty-third of May, several persons who had been sent to the tower by the independents were set at liberty by the commons, and it was voted, that the numerous impeachments against the leaders of the presbyterian party should be laid aside, and that the members of both houses should attend their duty in parliament. On the twenty-sixth of May, the guards from the army were discharged from attending the parliament, and a party of the city militia ordered to attend; and it was voted, that the king be desired to settle the presbyterian government of the church for three years. New propositions for settling the kingdom were sent to his majesty, and every thing seemed to wear the aspect of a speedy peace. The people had indeed so severely felt the weight of parliamentary authority, that they would have been glad to see the king replaced on the throne without subscribing any terms; and the presbyterians in parliament plainly saw, that this would be the consequence; should the English and Scots who had declared for the king, unite their forces. They knew that such an union would encourage, not only the most timorous among the people, but also many of the reduced officers and soldiers to declare for the royal cause. They were therefore desirous of preventing an incident which must have been pregnant with the most dreadful consequences to their party; and accordingly raised every opposition in their power to the measures of the Scottish parliament. At the same time they sent five peers and ten commoners to Newport in the Isle of Wight, in order to treat with his majesty. He was allowed to summon several of his friends and old counsellors, that he might have their advice in this important transaction.

Perhaps no sight was ever more moving and mortifying than the appearance and situation of Charles, when he entered the apartment where the parliament's commissioners were assembled. The moment his servants had been removed, he laid aside all care of his person, and had suffered his hair and beard to grow, and to hang dishevelled and neglected. His hair was become almost entirely grey; either from the decline of years, or from that load of sorrows under which he laboured, and which, though borne with almost unexampled constancy, had preyed greatly on his heart. But though he had paid no attention to his person, he had assiduously cultivated the talents of his mind. His faculties were strong and active, his judgment clear and penetrating; his prudence and patience invincible. He suffered not the smallest spark of the indignation he felt at his unworthy treatment to escape him. The parliamentary commissioners would not suffer any of his council to be present; they refused to enter into debate with any but himself. He alone during the transactions of two months, was obliged to support the argument against fifteen men of the greatest parts and capacity in both houses; and no advantage was ever obtained over him. This was indeed the scene in which, of all others, he was qualified to excel. His conception was quick, his understanding penetrating, his elocution chaste, his manner commanding; these accomplishments rendered him capable of triumphing in all discussions of cool and temperate reasoning. The parliamentary commissioners, who were before strangers to the king's abilities, were astonished. "The king is much changed," said the earl of Salisbury to Sir Philip Warwick: "he is extremely improved of late." "No," replied Sir Philip; "he was always so: but you are now at last sensible of it."

The first proposition the commissioners presented him was that for revoking all his proclamations and declarations against the parliament and their adherents, and acknowledging that they had taken up arms in their own defence. This was touching Charles in the sensible part. He made no difficulty of granting the former, but for some time opposed the latter with all the strength of reasoning. But the commissioners refused to recede the least from their proposition. It could not indeed be expected they would consent to give up this part of the article, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary by historians. The king, during the whole course of the war, had asserted, that the parliament and their adherents were fundamentally in the wrong; and had they not obtained from him an acknowledgement, that he himself was so, what security could they expect hereafter; as no consequences could be valid from erroneous premises. But Charles was now in their power; nor were the commissioners to be diverted from their purpose by his most pathetic representations of the wounds such a concession must inflict, both upon his judgment and his conscience. But finding that peace could be obtained on no other terms, he yielded to necessity. It was however agreed, that no part of any of the propositions should be binding, prejudicial, or made use of, unless the treaty was finally concluded.

The next proposition was that which regarded the abrogation of episcopacy and the liturgy of the church of England; and the total alienation of all church lands. This demand brought on a ridiculous dispute between the king and some ignorant presbyterian teachers; with regard to the divinity of episcopal government. Charles, even by his enemies, is allowed to have obtained the victory: but the more important part of the question, the policy, or rather the necessity of it, in the present situation of affairs, was never debated. He at last consented to suspend episcopacy for three years, and, at the expiration of that period, to name twenty divines, who should consult with others named by the parliament, with regard to the future form of church-government; that all who were willing might take the covenant, and use the directory of the presbyterians, provided he himself was at liberty to use the common prayer book in his own chapel; and that money should be raised on the sale of the church-lands, and only the old rents reserved to the owners and their successors.

The future disposal of the militia, was the next subject of debate. The parliament required not only to have an unlimited power of raising what men they thought proper, both for the land and sea-service, and of employing them as they please during twenty years, but also that of passing bills to pay them, which were to have the force of laws, even though the king should refuse the royal assent. Charles opposed these exorbitant demands with all the force of reason and eloquence; but all his endeavours were in vain: the commissioners had no power to recede one tittle from their instructions. Even this did not discourage the king from pursuing the work of peace: he granted their demands; but at the same time, he laid the three following demands before the commissioners, that they might be communicated to the parliament. 1. That he should be restored to his liberty. 2. That he should enjoy his revenue. 3. That an act of oblivion should be passed. These demands were sent to the parliament, where it was voted that they should be granted, on the king's consenting to the desires of the two houses.

The affairs of Ireland now came upon the carpet, and the commissioners insisted that the peace made with the rebels should be declared void. Charles, who thought no concession too great for obtaining the blessings of peace, remitted all the affairs of Ireland to be determined by his parliament.

With regard to the other points of the treaty, they admitted of less debate. Charles agreed that taxes should be levied for the payment of the army, and for discharging the debts of the public; that all the chief officers of state should be nominated by the parliament for ten years; that the militia of the city of London, the government of the Tower, and the appointing the chief officers in these departments, should be assigned to the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, for ten years; and that the king should receive one hundred thousand pounds a year, as a compensation for giving up the court of wards.

The time taken up in these debates rendered it necessary either to break off the treaty, or allow the commissioners a longer time to complete it, several of the king's concessions, particularly that relating to religion, having been voted unsatisfactory. The latter was chosen, and the time was enlarged to fourteen days longer. The parliament now demanded, that the earl of Newcastle, the lord Digby, lord Biron, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Richard Granville, Judge Jenkins, Sir Francis Doddington, and Sir John Winter, should be excepted from pardon, both with regard to lives and estates. This was a demand which Charles absolutely refused; he declared he would never agree to give up his friends to punishment. The severe repentance, which he had undergone for abandoning Strafford, had, doubtless, confirmed him in the resolution never again to be guilty of a similar error. He, however, consented, that the royalists should pay such compositions, as they and the parliament should think reasonable; he only begged that they might be as moderate as possible: he also offered, that the persons excepted by the parliament should be banished for a limited time.

The king wrote a letter to the prince of Wales, in which he related the whole of this transaction, and accompanied his narrative with many wise and pathetic reflections and advices. The conclusion of this letter is remarkable: "By what has been said, you see how long I have laboured in the search of peace. Do not you be disheartened to tread in the same steps. Use all worthy means to restore yourself to your rights, but prefer the way of peace: show the greatness of your mind to conquer your enemies rather by pardoning than by punishing. If you saw how unmanly and unchristian this implacable disposition is in our ill-wishers, you would avoid that spirit. Censure me not for having parted with so much of our rights: the price was great, but the commodity was, security to us, peace to my people; and I am confident, that another parliament will remember, how useful a king's power is to a people's liberty; of how much power I divested myself, that I and they might meet once again in a parliamentary way, in order to settle the bounds of prince and people. Give belief to my experience, never to affect more greatness or prerogative than what is really and intrinsically for the good of the subject, not the satisfaction of favourites. If you thus use it, you will never want means to be a father to all, and a bountiful prince to any, whom you incline to treat with extraordinary favour. You may perceive, that all men intrust their treasure where it returns them interest; and if a prince, like the sea, receive and repay all the fresh streams which the rivers intrust with him, they will not grudge, but pride themselves, to make him up an ocean. These considerations may make you as great a prince as your father is a low one; and your state may be so much the more established as mine hath been shaken. For our subjects have learned, I dare say, that victories over their princes are but triumphs over themselves, and so will more unwillingly hearken to changes hereafter. The English nation are a sober people, however at present infatuated. I know not but this may be the last time I may speak to you or the world publicly. I am sensible into what hands I am fallen; and yet, I bless God, I have those inward refreshments, which the malice of my enemies cannot disturb. I have learned to busy myself by retiring into myself; and therefore can the better digest whatever befalls me; not doubting but God's providence will restrain our enemies power, and turn their fierceness into his praise. To conclude, if God give you success, use it humbly, and be ever far from revenge. If he restore you to your right on hard conditions, whatever you promise, keep. These men that have violated laws which they were bound to preserve, will find their triumphs full of trouble. But do not you think any thing in the world worth attaining by foul and unjust means."

Notwithstanding it was so evidently the interest both of the king and parliament to finish this treaty while Cromwell and Fairfax were employed against the royalists and Scots, yet the fear of the army on the one hand, and of the king's insincerity on the other, continued to have so great an effect on many of the members, that they strengthened the hands of the independents, till it was too late to prevent inevitable ruin. The insurrections were every where quelled before the treaty was finished; and the army had leisure to carry into execution the violent and sanguinary projects they had formed.

Cromwell, after reducing the insurgents in Wales, marched with great expedition in order to meet the Scottish army, who, under Hamilton, had entered England, England, and were advancing forward without meeting with any opposition. But religious disputes rendered their expedition abortive, and destroyed that cause they entered England to support. They refused to join the royalists, because they had not taken the covenant: so that the two armies pursued the same route, but at some distance; nor could even the approach of the parliamentary army under Cromwell, oblige the bigotted covenanters to consult their own safety, by a close union with the royalists. The two armies, commanded by Hamilton and Longdale, amounted to twenty thousand men; yet these not being joined, Cromwell ventured to attack them at the head of eight thousand only. He fell upon the royalists by surprize near Preston in Lancashire, and though they made a brave resistance, were almost entirely cut to pieces. Cromwell had now an opportunity of taking vengeance on the Scots, whom he had long detested. He attacked Hamilton, put his army to the rout, and pursued the fugitives to Utoxeter, where the Scottish general surrendered himself prisoner. No forces now remained in the field to oppose the march of Cromwell, who, pursuing his victory, marched into Scotland, and having joined Argyle, and suppressed the earl of Laneric and Munro, he placed the power in the hands of the violent party among the presbyterians.

The siege of Colchester was now drawing to a crisis. The garrison, after enduring the utmost extremity of famine, were at last obliged to capitulate. No terms could, however, be procured from Fairfax: he insisted on their surrendering at mercy; and gave such an explanation of that term, as to reserve to himself the power of putting them all to the sword if he thought proper. The officers of the garrison were very unwilling to surrender unless they were promised, that their lives should be safe, and endeavoured to persuade the soldiers to make one glorious attempt on the enemy, and either cut themselves a passage, or sell their lives as dear as possible. But they had suffered too much during the siege; so that this proposal, which would perhaps have been embraced at first with alacrity, was now refused: and they surrendered the town to Fairfax.

Ireton, to whom Cromwell in his absence had consigned over the government of the passive general, persuaded him to take an unmanly revenge on the principal officers who had made so noble a defence; though that circumstance should have recommended them to the regard of every lover of military greatness. Accordingly Sir George Lucas, and Sir George Lisle were seized, and ordered to be shot immediately. Exasperated at so ungenerous an action, lord Capel reproached Ireton with this unmanly behaviour in the boldest terms, and challenged him, as they were all engaged in the same honourable cause, to execute on all the same impartial vengeance. Lucas was first shot, and was so far from being intimidated, that he gave himself, the orders to fire, with the same alacrity, as if he had been at the head of his own platoon of soldiers. Lisle ran and kissed the dead body, and then presented his own breast with the same undaunted resolution. The lords Goring, Capel and Loughborough, with the other officers of distinction, eight lieutenant-colonels, nine majors, thirty captains, sixty-five gentlemen, seventy-two lieutenants, sixty-one ensigns, one hundred and eighty-three serjeants, and three thousand and sixty-seven private men, were sent to different prisons.

The siege of Colchester put a period to what was called the second civil war; and all England was once more reduced to the power of the parliament. Fairfax led his army back to St. Albans, and renewed his complaint of the want of pay for his soldiers. The army also renewed their cabals, and almost every corps petitioned the general that justice might be executed upon criminals. Ireton's regiment, in particular, demanded, that the same fault might have the same punishment, from the king to the commoner; and that all such might be proceeded against as traitors, who should speak in behalf of the king, till he was acquitted of the charge of innocent blood. These demands so plainly indicated the dreadful catastrophe which soon after followed, that all who wished well to his majesty, both in and out of parliament, advised him to make his escape, which was conceived to be very easy: But Charles having given his word to the parliament not to attempt the recovery of his liberty during the treaty, and three weeks after; he could not be prevailed upon to hazard the reproach of violating his promise.

On the twentieth of November, colonel Ewer, at the head of seven other officers, presented a remonstrance from the council of the army to the parliament. It began with a demand that the treaty with the king should be laid aside, and that the prince of Wales and duke of York, should be declared incapable of government; that the army be satisfied out of the estates of the delinquents; that justice be done to the capital causes of the war; that a period be put to the present parliament; that there be a more equal representation of the people in the house of commons; that all who had borne arms for the king, should be disabled either for voting or being elected to serve in parliament; that the supreme power of government should be vested in the representatives of the people, among whom there should be a liberty of entering dissent; that all future kings should be elected by the people, but without any negative voice; that all matters of general settlement should be established by the general contract of the people; but that none should have a share in it who should oppose the matter of this remonstrance.

We shall not be surprized at the demands contained in this paper, which was intended to abolish the house of peers, and introduce a new scheme of government, when it is remembered, that the army had spoke the same language almost two years before; that many of the independent members had adopted it in their speeches; and that nothing but the late unexpected commotions, could have prevented Cromwell and his friends from carrying it before into execution.

This violent proceeding did not, however, intimidate the parliament. Though they well knew that they were in no condition to withstand the force of the army, yet they were determined to oppose them to the utmost of their power, and rather bring on a violent subversion of government, than give their consent to such sanguinary measures. They accordingly resolved to pay no regard to the remonstrance of the army. But this opposition tended only to hasten the execution of the project formed by the council of officers. Hammond received an order from Fairfax to attend him, and to resign to colonel Ewer; the custody of the king's person. In this emergency, Charles consulted his friends, who were permitted still to remain about his person, and all of them advised him to make his escape, which was still very practicable. But Charles, from a delicacy in point of honour, thought his royal word so far engaged, that he refused to consent, and still continued under the fatal delusion, that the preservation of his person was necessary both to the parliament and the army. But the earl of Lindsay, with great judgment, replied, "Take heed, sir, lest you fall into such hands as will not steer by the rules of policy. Remember Hampton-court, where your escape was the best security." Charles, however, continued obstinate; and the next morning the officers of the army, detached for that purpose, rushed into his apartment, and carried him over to Hurst-castle, where he was again made a close prisoner, and none of his friends suffered to visit him.

In the mean time the parliament voted that the seizing the king's person was done without their knowledge and consent; and sent a message to the general, to know by what authority that enterprize was undertaken. They also issued orders that the army should not advance any nearer to London. They next voted, "That the answers of the king to the propositions of both houses are a sufficient ground for the house to proceed upon for the settlement of the peace of the kingdom." It was also proposed by Hollis, the present leader of the presbyterians, a man of the most unconquerable intrepidity, that the generals and principal officers of the army, should be traitors to their country by the parliament, for their disobedience and usurpations.

These spirited proceedings brought matters to a crisis. The general marched the army to London, and placing guards in Whitehall, the Mews, St. James's, Durham-house, Covent-garden, and Pallace-yard, surrounded the parliament. The next day, when the commons were to meet, colonel Pride, formerly a dray-man, blocked up the passage to the house at the head of two regiments; and being directed by the lord Gray of Groby, he seized, in the passage, forty-one members of the presbyterian party, and sent them to a low room, which passed under the denomination of hell, whither they were afterwards carried to several inns. Besides these, above one hundred and sixty members more were excluded, and none suffered to enter the house but the most furious and most determined of the independent party, which was so small, that their number did not exceed sixty. This egregious invasion of the rights of parliament, was generally known under the name of "colonel Pride's purge;" so ready were the people to turn into ridicule the dethroning a party who had governed the nation with a rod of iron, and overturned the constitution of their country.

Cromwell, who was then in London, was thoroughly sensible of the despotic part the commons had acted, and well knew they were as much despised as the army was feared in every part of the kingdom. Colonel Whaley presented, at the bar of the house, a paper, entitled, "The humble proposals and designs of his excellency the lord Fairfax, and the general council of officers, in order to a speedy prosecution of justice, and the settlement formerly propounded by them." This paper, after reproaching the parliament and their proceedings, with all the bitterness of usurped authority, demanded, "That the secluded members, together with major Brown, might be secured and brought to justice: and that all those who refused to vote against the late Scottish engagement, as well as those who concurred in the vote of yesterday, with regard to the king's concessions being a sufficient ground for proceeding to a settlement, should be immediately suspended the house: and that all those who concurred not in these votes, should acquit themselves by a protestation." And, to complete the triumph of the army, Fairfax marched a large detachment into the city, and seized all the money at Goldsmith's-hall, amounting to twenty thousand pounds. He also secured the money in Haberdashers and Weavers halls, in order to pay the army part of their arrears.

The secluded members having published a paper containing a narrative of the violent manner in which they had been prevented from entering the house, together with a protestation against all acts, which since that moment had been transacted by the commons, the paper was voted to be false, scandalous, and seditious, tending to destroy the visible and fundamental government of the kingdom, and therefore ought to be suppressed. While the commons were employed in passing this vote so contrary to what every member in the house knew to be true, the army presented a scheme of government in consequence of their former declarations and remonstrances. But it was so wild and impracticable, and was so strongly tinged with that fanatical spirit so prevalent throughout the kingdom, that it is probable Cromwell suffered them to form so ridiculous a scheme, merely to keep them in employment.

The conduct of the parliament itself was equally mean and inconsistent. The commons had voted, that the lords Capel, Goring, and Loughborough, the earl of Holland, Sir Henry Linden, major general Laughern, and Sir John Owen, should be banished the kingdom: this vote they now revoked, declaring that it was destructive of the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom. In the same manner they repealed a vote whereby the duke of Hamilton was fined a hundred thousand pounds; together with all those that had the least tendency to conclude a peace with his majesty. At the same time they sent a committee to the general to know the reason why the members were restrained from coming to the house by the soldiers. The general answered, that he would consider the matter; but desired they would not give themselves the trouble of sending any more messages to him on that subject. But notwithstanding this insolent answer, the commons committed to prison Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, the generals Massey, Brown, and Copley, with other leaders of the presbyterian party.

The only difficulty Cromwell had to surmount in order to bring on the catastrophe of this detestable tragedy, consisted in disguising its horrid form from Fairfax. The force that had been laid upon the parliament, and the army continuing almost single, in opposition to the whole nation, together with some tenderness for the king, startled Fairfax. He began to fear he had gone too far; nor could all the arts of Cromwell quiet the fears with which his breast was agitated. The soldiers themselves proved awkward executioners of Cromwell's vengeance; they had suffered several of the secluded members to escape; and about sixteen of them were set at liberty by Fairfax. This seemed to be a kind of apology for the force put upon the house: but Cromwell prevented him from going any farther, by procuring a multitude of addresses from independents residing in various parts of the kingdom.

Nothing now remained than the last act of that bloody tragedy, which rendered the leaders of the independents detestable in the eyes of all Europe. Terror and astonishment had already seized the whole nation. Every man was fearful of being trodden under foot in this dreadful contention for power. Many began to withdraw with their effects to the continent, in order to seek in foreign countries that peace which was banished from their own. Public credit hardly subsisted, and the commerce of the kingdom, both foreign and domestic, was stagnated, and anarchy and confusion seemed to threaten the whole nation with destruction.

In the midst of this confusion, the king was ordered to be brought under a strong guard to Windsor, by colonel Harrison, the son of a butcher, and the most furious enthusiast in the whole army. Charles himself was now convinced, that the period of his life was approaching; but could not be persuaded that they intended to proceed against him by a formal trial, and make him fall a victim to what they called, the stroke of justice. He every moment expected a private assassination, a catastrophe so frequent with dethroned princes: there was not an instance to be found in history where a sovereign was put to death by the laws of his country. Harrison assured him that his fears were groundless, and that whatever was intended against him would be done before the sun. On his arrival at Windsor, all symbols of sovereignty were withdrawn, and his attendants had orders to treat him in no other manner than that of a private gentleman.

On the twenty-fifth of December, a committee was appointed by the commons to bring in a charge against the king, and other capital offenders. This committee was empowered to take informations with regard to facts, on which the charge against the king was to be founded; and on the twenty-eighth an ordinance for trying the king was brought into the house of commons, by Scot an independent member. This ordinance met with very little difficulty in the house. Some speeches were indeed made against it, but they seemed seemed rather calculated to save appearances, than prevent the ordinance from receiving the sanction of the commons.

A. D. 1648-9. On the second of January the ordinance was carried up to the peers by lord Gray of Groby. The upper-house had long been considered as of little weight in the legislature, and since the king's imprisonment had become totally contemptible. It happened however to be fuller than ordinary when the ordinance was presented: sixteen of the peers were assembled. When the charge against the king was read, every member was filled with astonishment: it was conceived in the following terms. "That Charles Stuart had acted contrary to his trust in departing from his parliament, setting up his standard, making war against them, and thereby been the occasion of much bloodshed and misery to the people, whom he was set over for good; that he had given commissions to Irish rebels, and was since the occasion of a second war; that he had invaded the rights of the subject, and endeavoured to destroy the fundamental laws and liberties of this kingdom." The peers looked upon each other with astonishment, and seemed deprived of the power of speech. The earl of Manchester first broke the awful silence, in a speech at once pathetic and constitutional. He affirmed it to be a palpable absurdity to say, "that the king could be a traitor against the parliament." The earl of Northumberland declared, that the far greater part of the people of England were far from being satisfied whether the king or parliament were the first aggressors; and that even if it should be granted that the king first began the war, there was no law in being, that declared, such an action to be treason; and for the parliament to declare it treason before the matter of fact was proved, and without any law to countenance such a proceeding, would be highly unreasonable." All the rest of the lords were of the same opinion, and the vote of the lower house was rejected without one dissenting voice. They also adjourned themselves for ten days, in order to embarrass the commons; not imagining they would dare to proceed without their concurrence.

They were fatally mistaken. The commons were not to be stopped by so small an obstacle. They immediately voted to proceed to the trial of the king without the consent of the house of lords. Their resolutions were couched in the following terms.

"Resolved, that the commons of England in parliament assembled do declare, that the people are, under God, the original of all just power.

"That the commons of England, in parliament assembled, being chosen by and representing the people, have the supreme power in this nation.

"That whatsoever is enacted or declared for law, by the commons, in parliament assembled, hath the force of law; and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the concurrence of the king and the house of peers, be not had thereunto."

These votes being passed, the ordinance for the trial of the king was again read, and assented to unanimously. Nothing less could be expected; the balance of government had been long destroyed, and the quarrel now was only about its spoils. The parliament had before declared, that they had a right to impose laws without the consent of the king; and the army had just as much right to give law to the poor remains of a parliament that now assumed the legislative power.

As it would have been an insult on the common sense of the nation even to offer a vindication of these violent measures on the principles of reason; recourse was had to the ridiculous pretensions of supernatural assistance. A woman of Hertfordshire, illuminated by prophetic visions, desired admittance to the council of war, and assured them of her being informed by a revelation, that their measures were consecrated in heaven, and ratified by a celestial sanction. The leaders of the independent party also augmented their pretences to sanctity.

"Should any one have voluntarily proposed," said Cromwell one day in the house, "to bring the king to punishment, I should have regarded him as the greatest traitor; but since providence and necessity have cast us upon it, I will pray to God for a blessing on your councils, though I am not prepared to give you any advice on this important occasion. Even I myself," added he, "when I was offering up petitions for his majesty's restoration, felt my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, and considered this supernatural movement as an answer, which heaven, having rejected the king, had sent to my supplications." Under such fanatical pretensions the leaders of the independents endeavoured to sanctify their sanguinary designs, and conceal from the people their thirst of power. It was not sufficient to sacrifice the constitution of their country to their ambition, heaven itself must be brought to applaud their measures!

The fate of the king was now to be precipitated on many accounts. The army might feel remorse if the fervours of fanaticism were suffered to subside. The people might recover from their consternation. The Scots might interpose. Foreign nations might declare in the king's favour. The states-general had already named an ambassador to negotiate a peace between his majesty and the parliament. The court of France appeared to be deeply concerned at the fate of Charles; the king of Denmark was fitting out armaments for his relief; and all Europe beheld his fate with pity and indignation. Cromwell knew this, and sat late every night in consultation with his officers. He had too found a judgment to think of entering upon any vindication of the late proceedings: he knew they would not stand the test of reason; and thought it would be more easy to justify the blow after it was given than before.

On the sixth of January information was brought to the house, that the king might easily make his escape; and Fairfax was ordered to confine him more closely, and not to suffer any of his friends to visit him; and on the thirteenth of January it was voted to leave the king's name out of all public papers. Nor was the government of the city of London less unhinged than the constitution. The independent faction, in the name of the common-council, presented an address to parliament, without the consent of the lord-mayor and aldermen, who had all of them absented themselves. The address was, however, voted to be regular, and the thanks of the house were accordingly returned. No member was found intrepid enough to oppose these proceedings, Cromwell having made no secret of his intention to expel every one who voted against the measures he proposed. The whole kingdom beheld these proceedings with silent horror. The queen wrote to the parliament in favour of her husband, and desired leave to attend him, but this letter was inhumanly thrown aside by the commons.

Prynne, who had suffered so deeply by the tyranny of the star-chamber, was the only man in England who dared to face this conflagration of rebellion. He had been elected a member of parliament, and was so honest as to speak, vote, and write, agreeable to his own opinion; and had been, with other members, excluded from his seat in the house, and kept prisoner at a common inn. But though his person was confined, he wrote strongly in defence of the principles he professed. He appealed to the public against the proceedings of the independent faction; and boldly printed a pamphlet, intitled, "A brief memento to the present unparliamentary junta to depose and execute Charles Stuart, their lawful king." This pamphlet gave so much offence to the party, that a committee was appointed to demand of Prynne, whether he would own it. Prynne readily replied, "I will give no answer till I am commanded by a lawful authority." The presbyterian members approved this answer, and made another faint attempt to try their strength with the army, but were defeated.

Had

Had they now quitted the house, they had done some service to their country, by depriving the party of their countenance; for though they were always ready to oppose the independents, they were always overborne by a majority; and the people, who had no opportunity of knowing what passed in the house, considered every transaction as an act of the whole parliament. Whereas by absenting themselves, few or none would have acted as a parliament, except those who set their hands to the warrant for the execution of their sovereign.

No long time was necessary for adjusting all the circumstances of the trial, and constituting what was termed "the high court of justice." It consisted of one hundred and thirty-three persons, as named by the commons, but never more than seventy met: so difficult was it found, notwithstanding the blindness of prejudice, and the allurements of interest, to prevail upon persons of any name or character to engage in so criminal a measure. It may, perhaps, be thought strange, that as a great number, nearly the majority, of the commissioners, who were empowered to act on this occasion, detested the guilty designs of the court, they did not attend, and endeavour to prevent the sentence. But the truth is, they were intimidated by the fierceness of the army. They knew, that if any difficulty occurred in completing this sanguinary measure, the independent faction among the officers would purge the court, as it had already done the parliament. The twelve judges were at first appointed in the number; but on their affirming, that it was contrary to all the ideas of English law to try the king for treason, by whose authority all accusations for that crime must necessarily be conducted; their names, as well as those of some peers, were afterwards struck out. Cromwell, Ireton, Harrison, and the chief officers of the army, most of them of very mean birth, were judges, together with a few of the members of the lower house, and some citizens of London. Bradshaw, a lawyer, was chosen president; Coke was appointed solicitor for the people of England; and Dorilaus, Steel and Aske, were named assistants.

Fairfax now seemed as one awakened from a lethargy, and startled at the guilt that was every day committing under the sanction of his name. He never, knowingly to himself, had professed independency, though he had in fact been the tool of Cromwell to establish it. His wrong notions, with regard to the army, occasioned all his miscarriages. He was persuaded that the profession of a soldier ought to be governed by severer maxims and principles of honour than those that fell within any civil system; and was always jealous of government, because he feared it wanted to make a property of the army. After he was made general in chief, he considered himself as answerable to the soldiers, with regard to their treatment from the parliament. Such military notions, greatly augmented by religious sincerity and fervour, rendered it very easy for Cromwell to mould Fairfax to his purposes; and it happened, that, in some particulars, he had justice on his side. The parliament had, for instance, violated several articles of capitulation granted by the army, which Fairfax considered as highly criminal. They had engrossed into their hands immense sums from sequestrations, delinquencies, and taxes; while the soldiers, who had given them all their power, were actually left to starve, or to live upon free quarter. These were undoubted truths; and Cromwell persuaded Fairfax, that the hardships of the soldiers proceeded from the notorious avarice and wicked policy of the members. The former induced them to evade all demands of money; the latter to abandon the soldiers, so that they were obliged to live upon free quarter, whereby they were become hateful, and an intolerable burden to the people. Fairfax being once convinced of these truths, was led to believe every thing that was reported of the parliament; and his ill opinion was increased on seizing, in the custody of their committees, when he marched his troops into the city, more money than would have been sufficient to quiet the clamours of his soldiers. But when his troops were satisfied, and his presbyterian friends laid before him the consequences that must result from the scheme formed by the army, he was struck with horror at the prospect, and would fain have prevented the dreadful effects of that power he had been so instrumental in obtaining.

At the first meeting of the high court of justice, which sat in Westminster-hall, an incident happened which deserves to be recorded. Lady Fairfax, the daughter of Horace lord Vere of Tilbury, having been seduced by the violence of the times, seconded all the ardour of her husband against the royal cause; but being now convinced of her error, she joined with her husband in bemoaning the miseries which threatened her country, and joined the friends of Fairfax in dissuading him from being present at the trial. Curiosity, however, prompted her to attend; and when her husband's name was called in reading over the list of commissioners, a voice was heard from one of the spectators, saying aloud, "He has too much wit to be present." And when the charge was read against the king, in the name of all the people of England, the same voice exclaimed, "Not a tenth part of them." Orders were now given to Axtel, the officer who guarded the court, to fire into the box whence the voice proceeded; but the soldiers being informed that it was their general's lady, they refused to obey. This circumstance sufficiently proves, that Fairfax was now convinced of his having been abused, and that Cromwell was then considered as the hypocrite, who had instigated the army to insist on this detestable trial.

It is not easy to form a more affecting idea than was now exhibited in the high court of justice; the delegates of a free people sitting in judgment on their supreme magistrate, and trying him for his misgovernment and breach of trust; and the pomp, the dignity, and the ceremony, were equal to the conception. The charge against the king was read by the solicitor, in the name of the commons; in which it was declared, "That Charles Stuart, being admitted king of England, and intrusted with a limited power; yet, nevertheless, out of a wicked design to erect an unlawful and tyrannical government, had traitorously and maliciously levied war against the present parliament, and the people, whom they represented; and was therefore impeached as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the commonwealth."

Charles, even in this hour of distress, lost not the majesty of a king. On the president's telling the king, that the court expected his answer, he asked by what authority he was brought thither? This question had been expected by Cromwell, and the president, by his direction, answered, "In the name of the commons of England." The king denied the authority of the court, and refused to submit to their jurisdiction. He observed, that being born their lawful hereditary king, all his subjects united could have no power to bring him to a trial; that having often exposed his life in defence of the liberties and fundamental laws of the kingdom, he would not now desert them, but was ready, in this last and most solemn scene, to seal with his blood those precious rights for which he had so long, though in vain, contended: That in the court which pretended to sit in judgment on his actions, he could not perceive the least appearance of the upper house, so essential a member of the constitution; and had learned from sufficient authority, that the commons, with whose power the court pretended to be invested, had been subdued by lawless force, and entirely deprived of their liberty: That those who arrogated the power of being his judges were born his subjects, and subjects of those laws, which declare, "That the king can do no wrong;"

but that without having recourse to that general maxim, which foresees even the worst of princes; he was ready to justify his conduct by the evidence of reason: and that if he were called upon in another manner, he should be desirous of demonstrating to them and all the world, the justice of that war he was unfortunately; and contrary to his inclinations, engaged in his own defence: but in his present circumstances he must not enter on the apology he was so desirous of making, lest, by ratifying an authority, no better founded than that of robbers and pirates, he should be considered as the betrayer of that constitution he was so desirous of establishing even by his blood."

This answer had no effect. Bradshaw, in the most atrocious and insolent language told him; that the court over-ruled his objections, and derived their authority from the people, the only source of genuine power. Thrice was Charles brought before the court, and as often denied their jurisdiction. The commissioners therefore proceeded to examine some witnesses, who deposed that the king had appeared in arms against the troops of the parliament. Upon which, after another insolent speech made by Bradshaw, sentence of death was pronounced against him. The king, during his last appearance before the court, seemed very desirous of being admitted to a conference with the two houses of parliament; but this was denied. The independents intended not to gratify any request he might make; they had already determined to abolish the power of the house of peers, and it would have been dangerous on this occasion to acknowledge them as a branch of the legislature. Their denial was accompanied with the most brutal insolence. The soldiers were suffered to use every mark of disrespect, and some of them even spit in his face. But even this insult could not shake the tranquillity of his soul, a sentiment of piety was the only effect it excited. He was more nearly affected by the ardent prayers and wishes offered up for his safety by the people who thronged about him, and which even the rod of lawless power was not sufficient to restrain.

The ambassadors of France, Holland and Scotland interposed to stop these horrid proceedings, but in vain. Every nation in Europe exclaimed against this example as the most egregious insult on law and justice. But all their exclamations and interpositions had no effect: the fate of the king was fixed and irrevocable. Four of the chief and most illustrious friends of his majesty, Richmond, Holland, Southampton and Lindsey, repaired to the house of commons, and represented, that, in quality of his counsellors, they alone were guilty of the measures imputed to him as crimes; and desired to save, by their own punishment, that precious life, which the commons themselves were so much interested to defend. This generous offer had no other effect than that of increasing the animosity of the court. For the more bad men see their conduct reproached by the virtue of the good, the more eager they are to consummate their base designs.

The short interval of time between his sentence and execution, was employed by the king in meditating those eternal truths which elevate the soul above the evils of mortality. All his family that remained in England were allowed to visit him. The duke of Gloucester was little more than an infant; but the advanced judgment of the princess Elizabeth, notwithstanding her tender years, rendered her sensible of all the miseries she was doomed to suffer. The king, after giving her the most prudent advice, and endeavouring to fortify her mind with pious consolations, charged her to tell the queen, that he had never during the whole course of his life failed in conjugal fidelity towards her, not even in thought; and that his tenderness for her should only end with his life. Holding the duke of Gloucester on his knee, he said, "Now they will cut off thy father's head." So unexpected a sentence seemed greatly to affect the child, who looked steadfastly upon him. "Mark! child what I say; They will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee a king: But mark what I say: Thou must not be a king, as long as thy brothers Charles and James are alive. They will cut off thy brothers heads when they can catch them! And thy head too they will cut off at last! And therefore I charge thee do not be made a king by them!" The duke replied, fetching a deep sigh, "I will be torn in pieces first." The king's eyes were filled with tears of joy and admiration at hearing so determined an answer from one of such tender years.

Every night during this awful interval, the king slept sound as usual, though the noise of workmen, employed in framing the scaffold, resounded continually in his ears. The morning of the fatal day he rose early; and calling Hubert, one of his attendants, bade him employ more than usual care in dressing him, and preparing him for so great and joyful a solemnity, which would put a final period to all his sorrows and to all his cares. Bishop Juxon, a man endowed with the same mild and steady virtues by which the king himself was so much distinguished, assisted him in his devotions, and paid the last duties to his sovereign and his friend.

The scaffold was erected in the street before Whitehall, it being intended by making choice of a spot, adjoining to his own palace, to display in a more evident manner, the triumph of popular justice over the power of royalty. When the king came upon the scaffold, he found it so surrounded with soldiers, that he could not expect to be heard by any of the people: He therefore addressed his discourse to the few persons who were about him, particularly to colonel Tomlinson, whom his virtues had reclaimed from an enemy to a friend. He protested his innocence, but, at the same time, acknowledged that his death was just in the eyes of the supreme Being, and that he was punished for not having opposed an unjust sentence, (meaning undoubtedly that of Strafford;) he generously forgave his enemies, and exhorted them and the whole nation, to live in obedience to his lawful successor. Having finished his speech, he laid his head on the block with the greatest decency and composure, and it was severed from his body by one blow of the executioner, who performed the bloody office in a vizor.

Fairfax was absent during the trial. He attempted by his influence to stop the execution, but not been able to succeed, he resolved to save the king by force. Cromwell and Ireton were no strangers to his resolution, and requested him to have recourse to prayer at a time when they stood so much in need of supernatural assistance. The fanatic Harrison was ordered to join with him in this pious office, and he took care to prolong the farce, till a person came and whispered him, that the king was no more. Then rising with the air of a prophet, he assured Fairfax, that the lord had heard their prayers; and made known his holy will in a very marvellous manner.

The nation, too long the dupe of hypocrisy, began to awake from its error. Never monarch, in the full triumph of success and victory, was more dear to his people, than this unhappy prince was now rendered by his misfortunes and magnanimity, his patience and piety. Each now reproached himself either with active disloyalty, or with a too indolent defence of his cause. The very pulpits, which had formerly thundered out the most violent imprecations and anathemas against him, were now bedewed with the tears of sincerity. His very enemies allow, that if temperance, chastity, regularity and piety can form a complete moral character, that of Charles may be deemed faultless. But he loved power to excess; and in order to retain it, he gave up a minister whom he loved and esteemed, and made concessions which he disdained and detested. Charles was, however, early and secretly sensible, that there was the same destination between power and prerogative, as between possession and a claim, and by endeavouring to render them inseparable, he forfeited both. By flying to fortify his prerogative before it was attacked, he pointed out to his enemies the places where it might be assaulted with most success; and his timorous friends drew him off from his defence, where he might have made a successful stand. Their fears of his being torn in pieces if he did not pass the bills that deposed him, were vain and chimerical; conscience and guilt had magnified their danger. When he began to grant, he found no end of concessions, nor means of resistance when he was persuaded to deny. In prosperity he was surrounded by harpies, who dreaded the vengeance of the public, and placed both his person and his crown between them and the stroke of justice. His friends wished to have the extent of his prerogative defined; that it might be known; his creatures to keep it concealed, that it might be dreaded; and his enemies to see it reduced, that it might be ruined. In a word, the character of this prince, like that of all other men, was mixed; but his virtues greatly predominated; and he certainly merited the esteem and affections of his subjects. In times of happier tranquillity he would have reigned with glory, and with the confidence of his subjects; but he wanted that political sagacity, which can adapt itself to critical circumstances and events; and he was led too easily by counsels inferior to his own.

The death of Charles was not more destructive to his family than to the constitution. For several days, even before his condemnation, the commons were employed in preparing acts for abolishing monarchy, and erecting a republican government on its ruins; and on the very day of his execution they published the following proclamation:

“Whereas Charles Stuart, king of England, being, for the notorious treasons, tyrannies and murders, committed by him in the late unnatural and cruel wars, condemned to death; whereupon, after execution of the same, several pretences may be made, and claims set on foot to the kingly office, to the apparent hazard of the public peace; for prevention whereof be it enacted and ordained by this present parliament, and by the authority of the same, that no person or persons whomsoever, do presume to proclaim, declare, or publish, or any ways promote Charles Stuart, the son of the said Charles, commonly called the prince of Wales, or any other person, to be king, or chief magistrate of England, or of Ireland, or of any of the dominions belonging to them, or either of them, by colour of inheritance, succession, election, or any other claim whatsoever, without the free consent of the people in parliament first had, or signified by a particular act or ordinance for that purpose; any statute, law, usage, or custom to the contrary hereof, in any wise notwithstanding.

“And be it farther enacted and ordained, and it is hereby enacted and ordained, that whosoever, contrary to this act shall proclaim, publish, or any way promote the said Charles Stuart the son, or any other person, to be king, or chief magistrate of England, or of Ireland, or of any of the dominions belonging to them, or to either of them, without the said consent in parliament signified as aforesaid, shall be deemed and adjudged a traitor to the commonwealth, and shall suffer the pains of death, and such other punishments as belong to the crime of high-treason. And all officers, as well civil as military, and all other well-affected persons, are hereby authorized and required to apprehend all such offenders, and to bring them in safe custody to the next justice of peace, that they may be proceeded against accordingly.”

An act was also passed “for repealing several clauses in the act of parliament of the 25th of Edward III. intitled, A declaration which offences shall be adjudged treason; and of one clause in the act of the first of Edward VI. intitled, Statutes concerning treasons, &c. repealed; and of one clause in the act of the third of James, intitled, an act for discovering and repressing recusants; and of part of an act made in the first year of queen Mary, intitled, A repeal for certain treasons, felonies, and premunire; and for repealing the act of the eleventh year of Henry VII. intitled, None that shall attend upon the king, and do him true service, shall be attainted or forfeit any thing; and of one clause in the act of the first year of Elizabeth, intitled, An act for restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state, ecclesiastical and spiritual; and of six several clauses in a statute passed in the fifth year of Elizabeth, intitled, An act for the assurance of the queen's power over all estates; and of an act passed in the seventeenth year of king James, touching the taking the oath of obedience to the king.”

Another proclamation was also published, ordering, “That all courts of law, justice, or equity, and in all writs, grants, patents, commissions, indictments, informations, suits, returns of writs, and in all fines, recoveries, exemplifications, recognizances, processes, and proceedings at law, justice, or equity, within the kingdoms of England and Ireland, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, instead of the name, stile, title, and test of the king heretofore used, the name, stile, and test of Custodes libertatis Angliæ autoritate parliamenti, shall be used, and no other. And the date shall be the year of our Lord, and no other: And that all duties, profits, penalties, issues, fines, amerciaments, and forfeitures whatsoever, which heretofore were sued for in the name of the king, shall from henceforth be prosecuted, sued for and recovered in the name of Custodes libertatis Angliæ autoritate parliamenti, and no other; and in all, or any of the proceedings aforesaid, where the words were, juratores pro domino rege, it shall from henceforth be juratores pro republica; and where the words, in any of the proceedings aforesaid used to be, contra pacem dignitatem, vel coronam nostram, that from henceforth these words, contra pacem publicam, instead of them, or any of them, shall be used.”

When the peers met on the sixth of February, pursuant to their adjournment, they entered upon business, and sent down votes to the commons; but the latter deigned not to take the least notice of them. A few days after, the lower house passed a vote “that no more addresses should be made to the house of peers, nor any more received from them; that the upper house was useless and dangerous, and should therefore be abolished.” They formed a new great seal, on which that assembly was represented, with this legend, “On the first year of freedom, by God's blessing, restored 1648. The king's statue in the Exchange was thrown down, and these words engraved on the pedestal, “Exit tyrannus, Regum ultimus,” the tyrant, the last of kings, is gone.

Charles left six children; three sons, Charles, born in 1630; James, duke of York, born in 1633; Henry, duke of Gloucester, born in 1641: and three daughters, Mary, princess of Orange, born in 1631; Elizabeth, born in 1635; and Henrietta, afterwards dutchess of Orleans, born at Exeter in 1644. Elizabeth did not long survive her father; his tragical end so deeply affected her, that she died of grief.

A few days after the execution of Charles, a book was published, intitled, “Icon Basiliké,” said to have been written by that prince. This work, so full of piety, meekness and humanity, published at so critical a juncture, excited, in a most remarkable manner, the compassion of the people for their murdered prince. The sale of it was so rapid, that it passed through fifty editions in less than a year. Some have not even scrupled to ascribe to that work the subsequent restoration of the royal family. It operated, says Milton, like the will of Cæsar, when read by Mark Anthony to the tumultuous Romans. It was, doubtless, the best prose composition in the English language, at the time of its publication.

Engraved for Sydney's History of England.

Some have denied the composition to have been the king's: but the arguments brought to prove, that these elegant meditations really flowed from the royal pen, seem much the stronger; and it is now the general opinion; that they were actually written by the king.

The REPUBLIC, or, COMMONWEALTH, of ENGLAND.

A.D. 1649. THE monarchical government of England being thus destroyed, and the whole constitution overturned, it became necessary to establish another in its room, and that of a republic, or commonwealth, was chosen. But the nation was so far from being unanimous, that it was divided into several parties, whose animosity was the greater, as they were almost all of them under the influence of enthusiasm. Some were for having no form of human government, because Christ, whose second coming they said was at hand, would be the sole governor of the world. Others asserted, that there was neither moral nor natural law remaining; and that the elect, under the direction of the Holy Spirit, were above human obligations. The presbyterians and royalists, though of opposite principles, were equally offended. These factions, however, gave no uneasiness to Cromwell; he knew, that when the basis of government is destroyed, the sword alone must give law to the people. He was master of the army, and on that foundation he determined to build his future greatness.

During the continuance of these divisions in the state, the trials of the duke of Hamilton, the earls of Norwich and Holland, the lord Capel, and Sir John Owen, came on before the high court of justice, where they were all found guilty, and received sentence of death. Hamilton and Capel made their escape, but were retaken; the former might have saved his life, but was honest enough to refuse it, as it was only offered at the expence of his honour. Great interest was used to save them all. Capel had joined early in the opposition to the king; Hamilton had served the parliament; and Holland had been, by turns, the friend and the slave of the faction: the other two had no merits to plead, either towards the party, or their persons; yet the three former suffered, whilst the two latter were saved. Hamilton died because he refused to betray his friends; Holland, on account of his apostacy, in deserting the cause he had long defended; and Cromwell honestly said, that Capel had so many virtues, that his life was incompatible with the safety of the faction.

The settlement of the government now became a serious affair with the party; and after long debates and consultations, it was resolved that a council of state should be established, consisting of thirty-eight members, who were to be intrusted with the following powers: to command and settle the militia of England and Ireland: to fit out such a navy as they should think proper: to appoint magazines and stores, and dispose of them; and to fit and execute the powers with which they were intrusted for one year.

Cromwell acted with great prudence in erecting this council of state; because their powers being limited with regard to time, it was impossible for them to make any successful opposition to the ambitious schemes he had formed, and several of the members were his own friends and creatures. In the mean time, a kind of anarchy prevailed in the kingdom. The landmarks of the constitution being removed, no man knew upon what foundation his property stood; and most of the judges, together with many sheriffs and justices of the peace, refused to act under the new government. Cromwell was not displeased at their refusal, because it enforced the necessity of keeping up a numerous army, and of proceeding by martial instead of municipal law. Hewson, one of the colonels, very properly observed, that the soldiers could hang twenty with less difficulty than the magistrates could hang one. This introduction of martial law rendered Cromwell absolute in the government: he took possession of the king's rooms of state at Whitehall; he disposed of civil property by his warrant; and he had his officers always at command, to present to the house such forms and alterations, both in the civil and military departments in government; and whatever he pleased to prescribe, were always approved of by the commons and the council of state. He met, however, with a strong opposition from lieutenant-colonel Lilburn, a very abusive and turbulent man, and he was sent immediately to prison. The women assembled in troops, and demanded his enlargement. They were told to take care of their families, and leave the government of the state to the men. The presbyterians, the peers, and the secluded members, also joined in the opposition, and filled the kingdom with the boldest invectives against the new government; and some had even the boldness to disseminate papers, proclaiming the prince of Wales to be king of England, under the title of Charles II. an appellation by which we must now distinguish him.

The Scottish commissioners had entered a strong protest against the proceedings of the commons, with regard to the trial of the late king, and had now received orders to quit England, without taking leave of the faction. They accordingly wrote a spirited letter to the commons, who voted, that it was a scandalous and reproachful libel against the just proceedings of the parliament, intended to lay the foundations for a new and bloody war; and that all who supported them should be considered as traitors and rebels to their country. But Cromwell, willing to avoid, if possible, a rupture with Scotland at that critical conjuncture, procured a vote in parliament on the twenty-eighth of February, that the commissioners should be sent to Scotland under a guard. The fate of that kingdom itself was now deplorable. Rent with factions, and distracted with fanatical enthusiasm, no measures founded on reason and the rules of policy could be taken. The body of the people abhorred the English faction, who had put their king to death, and were unanimous for proclaiming his son, and placing him on the throne of his ancestors; but they differed with regard to the terms on which the sovereignty should be offered. The violent presbyterians headed by Argyle, were for obliging him to observe every article of the covenant, and even previous to their sending any invitation, to oblige him to sign it, to submit implicitly to their church censures, to renounce the sins of his father's house, the iniquity of his mother, and to submit to several other mortifications, that even a private gentleman would have refused. The covenanting royalists as well as the episcopalians, were for proclaiming the king without obliging him to sign any conditions. The earls of Lauderdale and Lanerc, now duke of Hamilton, were at this time with Charles at the Hague, where he kept up the appearance of a court, though his affairs were in a desperate condition. The prince and princess of Orange wished well to his interest, but the selfish maxims of the Dutch republic, rendered it impossible to serve him effectually. The highest expectations were formed of Charles, who was now about nineteen years of age. He had behaved with the utmost tenderness towards his his father and his family; he had, with a prudence far above his years, reconciled to his service all the different members of his council; and had shewn great spirit on all occasions, as well as a close application to business. He had hitherto enjoyed very few opportunities of improving himself by reading, and the persons intrusted with his education by his father, were but ill qualified to improve him by their conversation, and still less by their instructions.

The states-general had given frequent intimations that their affairs would not permit them to come to a rupture with the ruling powers of England, and Charles knew not where to retire for protection. During this disagreeable suspense, the gallant marquis of Montrose appeared, with magnificent equipages, and a small number of chosen friends, at the court of Charles. His sentiments were very different from those of the other counsellors. He thought all treaties with rebels to be dishonourable; that the king ought to throw himself upon the friendship of his brother monarchs and the affections of his loyal subjects; undertaking himself, with very small assistance, of seating him on the Scottish throne. The great actions Montrose had already performed, his majestic deportment, and his unmerited sufferings for the royal cause, inspired all who approached him with impressions of awe, of love, and of pity. Though he was almost single in his sentiments, none ventured to oppose him; and his own countrymen regarded him as the guardian genius of injured majesty.

Plainer declarations of their desire that Charles should leave the Hague being now made by the States-general, it was resolved in council that the king should retire into France. He was received with great politeness in all the towns of Flanders through which he passed, and with as much state by the young king of France, as if he had been actually in possession of the English crown. But these civilities flowed entirely from a commiseration of his misfortunes, which was so strong with the public that cardinal Mazarine, and the queen regent of France did not think fit to restrain it. No effectual assistance was, however, to be expected; an asylum was all that could be brought to promise.

The affairs of Ireland seemed to display a dawn of success to the royal cause; the marquis of Ormond was at the head of a considerable party devoted to Charles; and though the Irish, at the instigation of the pope's nuncio, had again took up arms against the English, they were now sincerely united with the royalists. Had Charles appeared at the head of his army, there is no doubt but the whole kingdom would have declared in his favour; but his presence and the want of money, were great obstacles to the success of Ormond. He, however, made himself master of Drogheda, with other considerable garrisoned towns, and laid siege to Dublin, where Jones, the general of the parliament's forces had been obliged to shut himself up.

The English government was now sufficiently alarmed, and Cromwell, at his own request, was appointed to command the troops intended to be sent against the royalists in Ireland. Prince Rupert, ever since the fleet deserted to the prince of Wales, had commanded a considerable squadron, and taken several rich prizes. Dunkirk and Ostend also swarmed with privateers, that acted under commissions granted by Charles. The natural remedy for this evil was to fit out a superior fleet; but it was not easy to determine who was to command it. The earl of Warwick, the successful admiral of the parliament, though a violent presbyterian, was not an independent, and he had lately been disgusted with the government, on account of their putting his brother, the earl of Holland to death, notwithstanding he had exerted all his interest to save him. After long debates and consultations, it was determined to put the affairs of the admiralty into commission, and the command of the fleet was given to Blake, Popham, and Dean. The navy was soon in so respectable a condition, that the English channel was cleared of those privateers that had so greatly obstructed the commerce of the kingdom, and prince Rupert himself was blocked up in the harbour of Kinsale, by a squadron under the command of Blake and Dean.

It seemed to be a paradox in politics for Cromwell to undertake to head the expedition against the Irish in person, before the affairs of government were settled upon some solid basis. But his conduct was directed by wise maxims. He knew that power could only be maintained by the same measures by which it had been acquired. The dangerous spirit of levelling was far from being destroyed in the army; and this, with all other cautions, could only be cured by finding full employment for the soldiers. Cromwell promised himself great advantages from the spirit and temper of his soldiers returning from foreign conquest, when they had lost all tenderness for their mother-country, and regarded no will but that of their general. He was sensible that it was absolutely necessary to reduce Ireland, as it lay very convenient for receiving assistance and supplies from the Roman catholic powers, particularly from Spain, whose friendship the parliament had as yet great reason to distrust. Besides these motives Cromwell flattered himself with extending the fame of his military achievements, and of revenging himself on the marquis of Ormond, and other royalists in Ireland, who had accused him of being the sole cause of the king's death.

But before Cromwell led his troops against the Irish, he was determined to destroy that spirit of levelling which was now so common in the army, and which, if not crushed in the bud, must undermine the basis of his authority. The writings of Lilburn, and his associates, who were all unanimous in their hatred of Cromwell, had greatly encouraged the spirit of levelling; and some examples of severity made at London, blew the scattered sparks into a flame. One Thompson, a bold, intrepid trooper, headed the levellers, who appointed their rendezvous to be held at Banbury in Oxfordshire. Some of the regiments that had been appointed to go to Ireland, mutinied about the same time, particularly those commanded by Ireton, Scroop, and Reynolds. Thompson soon found himself at the head of two hundred horse, and expected daily to be joined by so large a body of mutineers, as would enable him to set the government at defiance.

Cromwell artfully prevailed upon Fairfax to accompany him in the disagreeable service of reducing the levellers. They reached Banbury soon enough to prevent the mutineers from uniting into a body, and Fairfax directing his march to Burford, made four thousand of them prisoners. This success rendered the whole design of the levellers abortive, Thompson himself being killed in the conflict.

The mutiny being quelled, the parliament passed an act declaring it treason in any one "to affirm that the present government is tyrannical, usurped or unlawful, or that the commons in parliament are not the supreme authority; or to endeavour to alter the present government; or to affirm the same of the council of state; to contrive the death of the general or lieutenant-general of the army; to raise a mutiny among the soldiers; to join with those that invade England or Ireland; to level war against the parliament; to counterfeit the great seal; or to kill any member of parliament, judge, or minister of justice."

The house of commons now exercised all the powers of royalty both legislative and executive. The earl of Pembroke was mean enough to sit in the house as a commoner, and to give Whitlock, keeper of the great seal, the same precedence as the chancellors enjoyed over noblemen in the times of monarchy. All foreign princes, though they detested the principles, dreaded the power of the new government. Even Christiana, queen of Sweden, herself, who had loudly exclaimed against the faction, received received with kindness colonel Potley, who was sent by the parliament to reside at her court. In a word, every thing smiled on the new establishment. The royal arms were taken down from all public offices and courts of justice, the royal titles erased out of public writings; and it was declared by the parliament and council of state, "That the people of England, and all the territories and dominions thereunto belonging, are, shall be, and are hereby constituted, made, and declared, a commonwealth, and free state, and shall so be governed by the supreme authority, the representatives of the people in parliament, and by such as they shall constitute as officers for the good of the people, and that without any king, single person, or house of lords." The new-coined money was also struck with the arms and titles of the Commonwealth of England.

About the middle of May, the army under Cromwell was ready to embark for Ireland. The news of this expedition determined the king, who was now heartily tired of the court of France, to retire to Jersey, the only spot he now inherited of all his large paternal dominions; and where he had already been proclaimed by the loyal governor, Sir George Carteret. This was, doubtless, placing his fortune on a very slender foundation; but it was the wisest measure he could pursue in this critical conjuncture, when the courts of France and Spain, notwithstanding all their pretended detestation of the rebels proceedings, only sought to make the best advantage they could of their being possessed of his person. The king of Denmark; and a few of the German princes, were, indeed, sincere in their endeavours to serve him; but they wanted money to fit out a fleet sufficient to face that of the English.

The siege of Dublin was carried on with great vigour, by the marquis of Ormond, and the garrison was now reduced to great distress. Cromwell knew the importance of saving the capital, and sent over immediately three thousand of his best troops, who landed under the favour of a squadron commanded by Sir George Askew, just at a time when Jones was going to capitulate. This reinforcement, together with a large quantity of provisions and stores landed at the same time, animated with new vigour the parliamentary garrison. They made a furious sally upon the royalists, drove them from their trenches, and obliged them to retreat over the river with great precipitation. Ormond now fortified his camp, and resolved to wait the arrival of some reinforcements he every day expected.

But the fortune of Cromwell bore down all opposition. Being invested with the sole command, both civil and military, in Ireland, the very magic of his name brought thousands of soldiers to his standard; so that, in a few days after his coming to his camp, he found himself at the head of a large army of veterans, from whose courage and experience he promised himself a plentiful harvest of glory. His military chest was well furnished with money, his soldiers with arms, and his camp with artillery, stores and provisions; while the confidence of the soldiers in the abilities and intrepidity of their general, rendered them almost invincible.

Cromwell's situation was now very different from what it had been before. He was at the head of a great and independent army, and entering upon a boundless career of conquest; while Fairfax, who was above him in commission, was little better than the cypher of a general, and hardly preserved the respect due to his great rank and services. Nor did the policy of Cromwell terminate here; he left the minds of the principal officers full of discontents against both the parliament and council of state, with regard to their impracticable schemes of government, and wild notions relative to their own importance in the state.

Having received his commission for three years, while that of the council of state was only for one, he thought himself in no danger of seeing any formidable combination formed against him between the civil and military powers, the only thing he had to dread. He therefore embarked his forces at Milford-haven; but, for want of a sufficient number of transports, he was obliged to leave three regiments behind him. He landed at Dublin, after a short passage, at the head of fifteen thousand men, and immediately dispatched a letter to England for a reinforcement. This was a caution very unusual with Cromwell, and seems to prove that he entertained not the best opinion of the parliament.

Ormond had made Sir Arthur Aston, who formerly commanded at Reading, governor of Drogheda, one of the strongest places in Ireland, and garrisoned the place with the flower of his troops, hoping it would be able to hold out for a month at least; during which he proposed to march his army from the neighbourhood of Dublin, in order to recruit his forces. But before Ormond could assemble his different divisions, Drogheda was invested with an army of twelve thousand men. Cromwell knew that the royalists depended chiefly on the defence of this place, and therefore exerted all his power to take it. The garrison made a very obstinate defence, but the town was at last taken by storm, and every one that appeared in arms put to the sword. This success was chiefly owing to the personal courage of Cromwell, who perceiving his men disheartened by the gallant resistance of the garrison, and the death of colonel Castle, one of their best officers, repaired to the breach, and led his troops to the attack with so much fury, that the Irish were seized with a panic, and acted with a despondency that would have dishonoured women; they made no farther resistance, but tamely suffered themselves to be put to death by the swords of the English, who considered it as impiety to suffer any of them to live. The whole war, indeed, was carried on with a cruelty which reflects eternal disgrace on the victors: the Irish were treated with infernal barbarity; no quarter was given them, either by sea or land; and they were generally excepted out of all capitulations and treaties.

The loss of Drogheda so intimidated the royalists, that they abandoned Trym and Dundalk. Tenalis was taken by storm; Wicklow submitted; and Cromwell marched his army into Munster, where he met with very little opposition. The dreadful execution at Drogheda struck all his opposers with despair. Lord Inchiquin's officers and soldiers deserted in great numbers; and the city of Cork was basely surrendered by the governor, when Cromwell was in no condition to have undertaken the siege.

But notwithstanding Cromwell's success, a very strong ferment was excited against his principles in the English parliament. Fortunately for him, the marquis of Ormond, by forming a kind of coalition with the Irish papists, and taking many of them into his service, rendered the royal cause in Ireland unpopular, even among the English presbyterians, and tended to increase the importance of Cromwell's success. They, however, took advantage of his absence, to pass some votes in parliament for moderating the excessive severities proposed against the delinquents. The army remonstrated strongly against these proceedings, but in vain; even their threats were disregarded.

The loyalists still continued under the infatuation, that they should yet be able to restore the king to his rights, and place him on the throne of his ancestors. They were even weak enough to imagine, that the spirit of levelling, which still continued in the army, might be useful to their cause; and accordingly dispersed themselves in different parts of the nation, joined the levellers, and spirited them up against the government. The effects of this preposterous conduct were some childish insurrections, in which several of them perished for a cause they, in their hearts, detested.

Colonel Pride, who had been remarkably active in all the mad, fanatical actions of the times, now became the head of a party, who insisted, that to put any man to death for theft only, was absolutely murder. This ridiculous opinion was carried to such a height, that they presented petitions to the council of state against all executions of that kind; and such regard was paid to their intercessions, that the lord mayor and his independent brethren were empowered to change the sentence of death into that of banishment, and many felons were accordingly sent to the American colonies. Notwithstanding these eccentric proceedings, the reins of government were, in the main, held with so steady a hand, that no convulsions shook the public tranquillity.

The Scots, from a retrospective view of the distractions that had prevailed in England since the captivity of the king, were very desirous of being again governed by a prince descended from their ancient kings. The demerits of the first Charles were almost forgotten, and his son had done nothing to induce them to believe he inherited his father's inflexibility with regard to religion. Even the marquis of Argyle, and his violent covenanters, were not averse to monarchical government, provided their king embraced their tenets of religion. Argyle well knew that the restoration of Charles was incompatible with the engagements he had entered into with Cromwell, on whom he chiefly depended for protection against the several factions formed in his country: but he hoped, that if Charles was restored, he would be nothing better than the shadow of a king, a mere name without authority; or that some incident might happen to prevent his landing in Scotland, notwithstanding the pressing invitations he had received from the inhabitants of that kingdom. The spies maintained by Cromwell at the court of Charles, informed him thoroughly of the state of parties formed among the king's friends; and that he wished rather to be restored by Montrose, and the episcopal royalists, than by either the presbyterian or independent party.

Convinced that Ireland could now afford him no assistance, Charles turned his whole thoughts towards Scotland, as the only part of his dominions where he could hope to be protected. The terms offered by the rigid covenanters were, indeed, highly disagreeable; but he thought proper to open a conference with Winram, who had been sent from Scotland to Jersey with the following propositions: 1. "That the king should sign the covenant, and pass an act for giving liberty to all that pleased to sign it, and for ratifying all that had been done in Scotland on that subject. 2. That he should give the royal assent to several acts which had been ratified in the two last sessions of the Scottish parliament; and that the kings of Scotland should, for the future, have no negative voice in that assembly. 3. That he should recall his commissions given to Montrose, for raising forces to be sent into Scotland, and put a final stop to his proceedings. 4. That he should put away all papists from about his person, and let known protestants only have seats in his council. 5. That some place, either in or near Holland, should be appointed to treat with commissioners from the states of Scotland, who would be sent thither, where every thing should be provided necessary for him and his train to reside in a legal manner. 6. That a speedy answer should be given to these desires."

These offers were the mildest ever sent by the Scottish government: they were afterwards loaded with many odious particulars with regard to the best friends of the royal family in both kingdoms, and with many intolerable particulars with regard to the person of Charles himself. In matters of religion, the young king was the very reverse of his father. He considered the different forms of worship, and church-government among christians, as so many different fashions of the same cloak. He was, indeed, fondest of episcopacy, but merely because he thought it better adapted to monarchy. His education had not greatly contributed to fix his principles with regard to any one sect. During his infancy, he had been chiefly instructed by the persons about the queen, who treated the church of England with more contempt than even presbytery itself. They ridiculed, in private, the most celebrated divines of the English court; while the pomp of their own worship, and the irregularity of their lives, implanted prejudices in the mind of Charles which were never obliterated, though they seldom carried him farther than to prefer the form of worship practised in the Roman to that used in the English church. But though he was not strongly prejudiced against any religion, yet every thing contributed to give him the greatest aversion to the covenant. He, however, determined to receive the Scottish commissioners, and the city of Breda was appointed for that purpose.

A. D. 1650. During this interval, Montrose hastened his preparations for landing in Scotland, and determined to exert all his power to place the king on the throne of his ancestors, without his signing any conditions. He had been encouraged by great promises of assistance from the courts of Denmark and Sweden, where many excellent Scotch officers, well affected to the king, had served with great reputation; but his impatience and loyalty would not suffer him to remain any longer inactive; and he landed, in the beginning of April, in the northern parts of Scotland, accompanied by a small number of German soldiers. He had flattered himself with being joined by many of his countrymen, but he was disappointed; no forces appeared to join his standard, and he was soon after surpris'd and taken prisoner by his countrymen. The fanatical Scots looked upon this great man only in the light of an impious, excommunicated person, who was a rebel to the covenant. He suffered the most horrid indignities, and was condemned to be hanged. The sentence ran, that his head should be nailed to the door of the prison, his legs and arms fixed up in the four principal towns of the kingdom, and his body interred with malefactors, unless his repentance induced the Scottish divines to take off the excommunication. "I am more proud," said he, to the presbyterian ministers, "to have my head nailed to the place mentioned in the sentence, than I should be to have my picture hung up in the king's chamber. Far from being disturbed at having my legs and my arms sent to the four principal towns in the kingdom, I wish I had limbs enough to disperse through all the towns in Christendom, in testimony of the cause for which I am condemned." In the evening, he put these sentiments into verse; and died as he had lived, like a hero. He was in the flower of his age when the jaws of fanaticism snatched him from his king and his country.

During these transactions in Scotland, the conferences were opened at Breda. Charles disputed every proposition offered by the Scottish commissioners, till he was informed of the defeat and death of Montrose, when he no longer made any opposition, but agreed at once to all their demands. The treaty being thus concluded, Charles embarked on board a small squadron of ships, and pursued his voyage towards Scotland. Before they reached their intended port, the Scottish commissioners produced fresh articles, by which they insisted on still greater sacrifices than any Charles had hitherto made. This gave Charles so much uneasiness, that he threatened to land in Denmark, rather than make such degrading submissions. His wisest counsellors were, however, of a different opinion; and Charles, fearing he might be intercepted by some of the parliament's ships, pursued his course, and landed safely in an obscure part of Scotland.

The king was immediately given to understand that he must expect no assistance in that kingdom unless he signed the covenant, and dismissed from his presence all persons who were obnoxious to their parliament. Charles was obliged to comply. The Scotch covenanting royalists retired from the storm.

Some

Some of the English fled back to the continent; and others were lodged in houses of the king's friends, but at a distance from his person. Buckingham alone, for whom the king entertained the sincerest friendship, was suffered to be with him. Notwithstanding these precautions, the people in general shewed a surprizing alacrity for his service; they flocked to his standards in every part of the kingdom. Argyle was careful that Charles should want nothing of the respect or attendance that had been paid to his ancestors, and endeavoured to give him just notions of his own interest; but, at the same time, suffered him to exercise no personal acts of power, or to have any voice in the management of public affairs.

This exterior appearance of royal honours had, however, a surprizing effect on the courts of Europe, as well as on the minds of all his friends both at home and abroad. Every corner of England was filled with reproaches against the parliament, and in some places insurrections actually happened which were not suppressed without difficulty. Charles, before he left Holland, had signed many commissions for agents and officers to act for him in England, and these were so active, and their endeavours so imprudently bold, that the council of state thought no time should be lost in recalling the general from Ireland. Cromwell had by this time so fully established his reputation, that he very readily accepted the invitation; and having made Ireton his deputy, he returned to England. He was received by the parliament with all the honours due to his eminent services, and as no time was to be lost, the affairs of Scotland were immediately taken into consideration. The presbyterian party had made several attempts to open a correspondence with their brethren in Scotland; but their messengers had always been intercepted by the troops quartered on the borders.

Cromwell was desirous of heading the troops intended against Scotland; but Fairfax, who had still great interest both in the army and parliament, was an obstacle that was not easily removed. Cromwell was unwilling to trust either his principles or ambition in the Scottish war; and he accordingly procured a vote in parliament that both himself and Fairfax should command against the Scots; and that Fairfax should receive a new commission from the house for that purpose. In the mean time the council of state received orders to prepare every thing necessary for the immediate march of the army. Fairfax, however, thought proper to refuse the offer, and to resign his commission. This was, in reality, what Cromwell wanted; he had now no superior in the army, and he feared no opposition in parliament. He, however, thought proper to publish a declaration in order to remove the scruples of the presbyterians, who loudly exclaimed against the intended invasion of Scotland. This paper declared, that though it was intended to carry the English arms into Scotland, a defensive war only was designed; and that this method was taken merely to prevent an invasion of England.

Cromwell left London on the twenty-ninth of June, and directed his march towards the borders of Scotland. He considered fighting and beating the Scots as nearly the same thing, and thought the whole difficulty consisted in bringing on a general engagement. But though he looked with contempt upon the forces of Scotland, he knew that it was absolutely necessary to drive Charles out of that kingdom; because while he resided there in a royal capacity, his party in England continued to encrease, many of them having already joined him in Scotland, and others were preparing to raise an insurrection in England as soon as his army should pass the borders.

Argyle, in the mean time continued to be extremely jealous of the royal party, who were for restoring the king upon his own terms. This he knew was inconsistent with his own safety, and the civil and religious liberties of his country. He endeavoured to give Charles right notions both with regard to government and his own interest; but the heart of the young king was already debauched, and his prejudices against the covenanters, had taught him to consider them only as a company of mad enthusiasts. The king was indeed charmed with the politeness of Argyle's behaviour, his elegant manners, and instructive conversation; but he could not digest his confinement; nor did Argyle think it prudent to trust him with the management of himself. But the mortifications he met with from Argyle were nothing when compared to those he was obliged to suffer from the zealots. The general assembly, and afterwards the committee of estates together with the army, who were entirely governed by the assembly, published a declaration, in which they protested, "That they did not espouse any malignant quarrel or party, but fought merely on their former grounds or principles; that they disclaimed all the sins and guilt of the king and his house; nor would they own him or his interest, otherwise than with a subordination to God, and so far as he owned and prosecuted the cause of God; and acknowledged the sins of his house, and of his former ways."

This declaration wanted no comment. The king knew he was entirely at their mercy, and must submit to every thing they proposed. He issued a declaration in the very terms they required; he gave thanks for the merciful dispensations of providence, by which he was recovered from the snare of evil councils, had attained a full persuasion of the righteousness of the covenant, and was induced to cast both himself and his interest wholly upon God. He desired to be deeply humbled and afflicted in spirit, because of his father's following evil councils, opposing the covenant, and the work of reformation, and shedding the blood of God's people in every part of his dominions. He lamented the idolatry of his mother, and the toleration of it in his father's house: a matter of great offence, he said, to all the protestant churches, and a great provocation to him who is a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children. He professed that he would have no enemies but the enemies of the covenant; and that he detested all popery, superstition, prelacy, heresy, schism and profaneness; and was resolved not to tolerate, much less to countenance, any of them in any part of his dominions. He declared that he would neither love nor favour any who have so little conscience as to follow his interests, in preference to the gospel and kingdom of Jesus Christ. And he expressed his hope, that whatever ill success his former guilt might have drawn upon his cause, yet having now obtained mercy to be on God's side, and to acknowledge his own cause subordinate to that of God, the divine providence would crown his arms with victory.

Having obtained this victory over the king, and placed the crown in subordination to the altar, the Scottish clergy pointed their spiritual instruments against the invaders of their country. They represented Cromwell as an incarnate devil, and his soldiers as so many monsters of blood and cruelty, who were ordered to put all the Scots to the sword without any regard to age, condition, or sex. This had the desired effect. The southern parts of Scotland were in an instant depopulated, the inhabitants flying to the northward for shelter and protection. Cromwell was astonished when he passed the borders to find he was going to enter a desolate wilderness, where it would be impossible to procure provisions for his army. He was, indeed, attended by a fleet, but supplies from them were difficult and precarious. The only method that seemed to offer success was to publish a declaration, that he was not come to desolate the country, but to support them in their civil and religious rights and privileges. He also was very careful to treat all the Scots that fell into his hands with unusual kindness. But all his attempts to gain the favour of the inhabitants were in vain: they fled from him, as from a pestilence, and he advanced towards Dunbar under infinite difficulties. For by this time a considerable derable party of Scots, had put themselves between his fleet and army, so that he saw himself in danger of perishing by famine.

The English army consisted of about eighteen thousand men; and that of the Scots, which was commanded by general Lesley, of about twenty thousand, besides a vast multitude of irregulars. But Cromwell's were the best troops in the world, while the Scottish army was composed of men differing in their principles, awkward in their exercises, their arms neither well formed for offence or defence, yet full of presumption, partly from an idea of their own valour, but chiefly from the enthusiastic assurances of their preachers.

The Scots were possessed of Edinburgh castle, and their army posted so advantageously near that city, that it could not be attacked. Cromwell saw this and was fearful for the event; he perceived only but a dismal prospect of famine; for the stormy weather prevented him from receiving any provisions from his ships. He still endeavoured by acts of humanity to the Scots who fell into hands, and by doing justice to his own soldiers, who were fond of plundering the country, to make a party among the enemy; but without success; and their preachers began already to triumph from the pulpits, that the English army was on the point of being destroyed.

Finding all his attempts abortive Cromwell advanced towards the Scottish camp, and endeavoured, by every expedient, to provoke Lesley to a battle; but the Scotchman well knew, that though his army was much superior in numbers, his forces were far inferior to the English in discipline and experience; and therefore carefully kept himself within the intrenchments of his camp. He, however, endeavoured to confirm the spirits of his soldiers by small skirmishes with the enemy, and was generally successful. His army increased daily both in numbers and courage. The king came to the camp, and having exerted himself in one of these rencounters, gained extremely on the affections of the soldiery, who were far more desirous of serving under a young prince of spirit, than a committee of preaching gownsmen. This produced a fatal effect, they caused the king to leave the camp; and at the same time purged the army of near four thousand malignants, whose zeal for the royal cause had led them to attend their prince, and were all of them soldiers of credit and experience. They said they had no need of the assistance of the ungodly, their army being entirely composed of saints, who could not be conquered by the arm of flesh.

Cromwell despairing of being able to bring the cautious Lesley to a battle, retired to Dunbar. Lesley followed him, and encamped on the heights of Lammermure, which overlook that town. The English general hoped he should now be able to accomplish his purpose of forcing the Scots to leave the heights; but he soon perceived, that this was impossible; and that Lesley had taken possession of all the difficult passes between Dunbar and Berwick. These discoveries almost drove Cromwell to despair. His army was in the utmost distress for want of provisions, and he was on the point of forming a resolution of embarking all his foot and artillery, and of breaking through with his horse, the different posts possessed by the enemy in his route to Berwick. The madness of the Scottish ministers prevented him from putting this resolution into practice; and of losing at once all the honours he had acquired in so many glorious campaigns.

The enthusiastical ministers in Scotland had been, according to their expression, wrestling day and night with the Lord in prayer, and now fancied they had obtained the victory. Revelations, they said, had been made them from heaven, that the sectarian and heretical army, together with Agag their leader, would be delivered into their hands. The soldiers caught the flame of enthusiasm, and forced their general, notwithstanding all his remonstrances, to descend into the plain, and gather the laurels of victory promised their ministers by the voice of heaven. Cromwell could hardly believe his eyes when he first perceived the Scottish camp in motion, and ventured to forestel, without any revelation from above, that the Lord had delivered his enemies into his hand.

The engagement began in the morning of the third of September, and soon became general, but the dispute was unequal. The Scots, though more than double the number of the English, were so far from standing the shock of Cromwell's veterans, that they suffered themselves to be cut to pieces, almost without resistance. One regiment of Highlanders only made a proper resistance; they were very little affected with the enthusiasm of their brethren, and did not rely on the miraculous interposition of heaven for assistance. They exerted their whole power, and for some time stopped the career of the English. But being abandoned by their friends, they were obliged to submit to superior force, and leave the field of battle to the enemy.

Cromwell's victory was complete; upwards of four thousand Scots were slain on the field of battle, and ten thousand taken prisoners; together with all their colours, arms, ammunition, tents and baggage. The English general pursued his advantage, and took possession of Edinburgh and Leith; while the remnant of the Scottish army fled to Stirling. The approach of winter, and an intermitting fever, with which he was seized, prevented Cromwell from advancing farther into the kingdom.

He now boldly attacked the Scottish divines with their own weapons, and published several letters in which he openly defended the independent principles; and asked them, with an air of triumph, whether the Lord had not declared against them? They replied, that the Lord had only hid his face for a time from Jacob; but would soon arise to vindicate the cause of his people. Cromwell retorted their arguments with great force, and was certainly more than a match for them in the argument. "You say," said this artful leader, "you have not so learned Christ, as to hang the equity of your cause upon events. We could wish that blindness had not been upon your eyes to all those marvellous dispensations which God hath lately wrought in England. But did not you solemnly appeal and pray? Did not we do so too? And ought not we and you to think, with fear and trembling, of the hand of the great God, in this mighty and strange appearance of his, instead of lightly calling it an event? Were not both your and our expectations renewed from time to time, while we waited upon God, to see which way he would manifest himself upon our appeals? And shall we, after all our prayers, fastings, tears, expectations, and solemn appeals, call these mere events? The Lord pity you. Surely we fear, because it hath been a merciful and gracious deliverance to us.

"I beseech you in the bowels of Christ, search after the mind of the Lord in it towards you, and we shall help you by our prayers, that ye may find it. For yet, if we know our heart at all, our bowels do in Christ yearn towards the godly in Scotland."

Such were the triumphal expressions of this arch-hypocrite, over a fallen fanatical enemy. But the Scottish ministers supported their own tenets with the strongest perseverance. They imputed the late defeat to the manifold provocations of the king's house, of which they feared he had not thoroughly repented; to the secret intrusion of malignants into the king's family; and to the leaving a most malignant and profane guard of horse, who being sent for to be purged, arrived only two days before the defeat, and were suffered to fight among the godly. To such wretched evasions were these ministers reduced to ward off the blow of ridicule for their late promises of victory.

While Charles was at the head of an army in Scotland, land, his servants and ambassadors abroad were treated with respect; and all the language of foreign courts, especially that of France and Spain, expressed their detestation of the English rebels and regicides. But in reality, these two courts neither wished nor endeavoured his restoration. The grand duke of Muscovy, at once more barbarous and more generous, received Colepepper as an agent from Charles, and supplied him with a large sum of money. The duke of Lorrain, though he had not a foot of land he could call his own, supplied Charles and his family with considerable sums. The prince of Orange continued to be his faithful and useful friend, and a few of the German princes threw their mites into his treasury. The king of Denmark assisted him to the utmost of his power, but his kingdom was poor, and being insulted by the Swedes, he was obliged to live in a precarious dependence on the Dutch. Christina, queen of Sweden, who cherished the most extraordinary passion for every thing that was extraordinary either in war or literature, was now so charmed with the exploits of Cromwell, that she entertained a kind of Platonic passion for his person, and recommended it to her council, and to the prince she intended for her successor, to avail themselves of the friendship of England.

A.D. 1651. Blake, Deane, and Popham, still continued to command the English fleet, which was now increased to more than double its former number; but the parliament was very uneasy that prince Rupert and his squadron had found a kind reception in the harbours of Portugal. The truth is, the Portuguese had at this time several very rich ships coming from the Brazils, which they were afraid might be intercepted by the fleets of the English parliament. The ships under the command of prince Rupert therefore promised to be of signal service to the Portuguese, and he had actually been invited thither before he left Ireland. In his passage, he lost two or three of his best ships in a storm; but he took a great many rich prizes, which he sold, and generously remitted the money to Charles. Vane, who resided at the court of Portugal, as agent from the English parliament, made vigorous remonstrances on this subject; but they were not much regarded, and, at last, the court of Portugal declared itself a friend to Charles. Upon this the parliament ordered Blake to sail immediately, with a strong squadron, to the coast of Portugal, and demand that the fleet of prince Rupert should be given up, as they were nothing better than rebels and pirates, and consequently entitled neither to protection nor neutrality. If this was denied, Blake had instructions to destroy them wherever he could find them. On his arrival at the mouth of the river of Lisbon, he demanded the fleet of prince Rupert; but the court of Portugal was so far from complying, that the king declared he would suffer no more English ships to enter his ports or harbours, and Blake found himself in no condition to force his entrance. He was soon after joined by Popham; and the Portuguese finding themselves unable to support the prince any longer, orders were sent to him for quitting the Tagus, and he was fortunate enough to make his escape. Blake revenged this disappointment on the king of Portugal, by taking twenty ships of his Brazil fleet; and it was not without great difficulty, and making many submissions, that he obtained a peace with the English republic.

The dreadful defeat at Dunbar, and the ridicule thrown on the Scottish ministers by Cromwell, was far from curing them of their fanatical madness. They had been very open in declaring, that they had taken up arms in defence of the covenant, not for the crown, and were therefore equally hated by the royalists and independents. Those jarring dispositions had fatal effects on the royal service. It was now sufficiently evident, that the covenanters neither could nor would restore the king; and the best officers he had to depend upon were royalists, who disdaining the meanness and self-sufficiency of the Scotch presbyterians, refused to submit to their discipline. The marquis of Argyle, would he have trusted the royalists, might have retrieved the late defeat; but the longer he conversed with Charles, the more reason he saw to distrust him; and to keep a very watchful eye over his conduct. Charles had in his conversation something bewitchingly soft: he talked to the Scots in their own language: his address was easy and insinuating; his person beautiful; and his understanding far superior to what Argyle expected. But the marquis was convinced that he both despised and hated the covenanters; that all he did was from convenience or necessity; that he was tinctured with arbitrary principles; and that the misfortunes of his family had only taught him the art of dissimulation, in order to re-establish his power. Argyle could not avail himself of the assistance of either the episcopal or presbyterian royalists: his bloody proceedings against Montrose and his friends, who acted under the king's commission, had struck all mankind with horror. He saw the consequences of his conduct, and trembled for the event, whenever the king was intrusted with the powers of royalty. He therefore treated Charles with more condescension, and removed several particulars which had rendered him very uneasy.

Charles was not ignorant of the causes that produced this relaxation, and began to exert some power with regard to his own affairs. His principal resource lay in the affections of his friends: for when the revenues of the kingdom of Scotland were stated, they amounted to no more than seventeen thousand six hundred and ten pounds, eighteen shillings and eight-pence sterling, to defray all the charges of his court and government. This poverty was owing to the rapaciousness of the Scots themselves, who, ever since the accession of the Stuart family to the crown of England, had been in a manner quartered on the royal revenues, and had raised both fortunes and families from what they had extorted from the crown. But this was no time for resumption; and Charles, at present, enjoyed a decent state, and had about him the proper officers of the Scottish court. Charles now ventured to propose, at the council-board, proper persons for commissions in his army; and several of the counsellors, knowing the king's inclinations, resumed courage sufficient to second him, even without applying to Argyle for leave. At last the royalists joining with the more moderate presbyterians, Lesley was charged, in direct terms, with treachery at the battle of Dunbar, and required by the royal council assembled at Perth to deliver in to the board a circumstantial account of his behaviour that day.

This coalition between the protestants and moderate presbyterians rendered the conquest of Scotland a work of more difficulty than Cromwell before imagined, considering the complete victory he had obtained at Dunbar. The castle of Edinburgh still held out. Charles was in possession of the pass at Stirling, and behind him lay the most populous and best affected counties in Scotland; while the country where Cromwell lay had been eaten up, and the inhabitants looked upon his men as infernal demons. The king's levies were going on with great success, and there was no doubt but he would soon be at the head of a much stronger army than that which had been defeated at Dunbar. These circumstances, and the increasing aversion of the country towards his army, gave Cromwell infinite uneasiness. He endeavoured to reconcile the people to his person, by treating them with uncommon humanity in his marches. He sent a messenger to the governor of Edinburgh castle, inviting the preachers to take again possession of their pulpits, provided they meddled not with the civil affairs of the kingdom in their sermons. This invitation was rejected with disdain; and they treated his offers with the most contumelious language.

In the mean time, the independent faction at West ministers were extremely careful to make every success, either of their arms or councils, a kind of test for discovering their enemies. They ordered a thanksgiving to be observed for the advantages gained over the Scots at Dunbar. Many of the presbyterians refused to observe it, and were persecuted on that account with great severity; but they were unfortunate in their prosecutions; hardly a jury could be found that would bring in their verdict, guilty. Another high court of justice was therefore established for the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Lincoln, and the Isle of Ely. Orders were also issued, by Cromwell's direction, for raising new bodies of horse and foot in every part of the kingdom; the pay of the officers and soldiers, both by sea and land, was augmented; and the greatest industry and punctuality observed in procuring supplies, both for the fleet and army.

As these augmentations rendered it necessary for the parliament to increase the revenues of the kingdom, the contributions on the public were raised to one hundred thousand pounds a month. They encouraged the importation of bullion; they imposed a test, called An Engagement, upon all the people who lived under their government; by which they were obliged to swear fidelity to the commonwealth, as constituted without a king or house of lords. They also passed several other acts, all of them tending to encourage their friends, and terrify their enemies. The truth is, the presbyterians had lost the majority in the house. There were, however, still several men of too great abilities to pay any attention to the mere forms of religion: these were republicans; and though they hated Cromwell, they joined the independents; because they thought their principles better adapted to the establishment of a commonwealth.

But notwithstanding these acquisitions gained by the parliament, Cromwell was still in a very indifferent state in Scotland. He was unable to attack Charles, whose army lay beyond the Forth, and who still continued to keep possession of Stirling. Cromwell's men began to be sickly, he himself was in a very indifferent state of health, the country round him was a desert, and he had no opportunity of performing any remarkable action, that might revive the drooping courage of his soldiers. Charles and the royalists had now attained a great ascendancy in Scotland, and he had been crowned at Scone, with as much magnificence as the temper of the times and the impoverished state of the revenues would admit. The marquis of Argyll still shewed great respect to his person, and had assisted at his coronation, where the king was obliged again to take the covenant, and to listen to many long speeches and prayers from the pulpit. The duke of Hamilton was, however, now admitted to court; and both the parliament and general assembly declared, that in a time of such imminent danger, there should be no exception of persons. This gave encouragement to the royalists, who now flocked from all quarters to the English standard. The duke of Hamilton commanded under Charles, Lesley was lieutenant-general, Middleton major-general of the horse, and Massie general of the English.

The royal army still increasing, Cromwell ordered colonel Overton to cross the Forth, at the head of sixteen hundred foot, and three hundred horse: these were followed by major-general Lambert, and colonel Okey, with another body of fifteen hundred foot, and eight hundred horse; while he himself marched towards Stirling, in order either to bring the Scots to a battle, or force them to divide their army. But when he came in sight of the Scottish camp, he found it too strong to be attacked, and their officers too cautious to be drawn from their post.

While both the main armies lay thus in sight of each other, an engagement happened in Fife between the forces that had passed the Forth under Lambert, and a strong detachment of the royalists, greatly to the disadvantage of the latter, five of their regiments of foot, and the same number of horse, being cut to pieces, and fifteen hundred taken prisoners. Cromwell had foreseen great advantages from Lambert's passing the Forth: it was, indeed, one of the most masterly actions he ever performed; for he had imperceptibly strengthened Lambert's party to seven thousand men, by which he not only secured all the passes on the Forth, but put himself between the king and the northern provinces, on which the royalists chiefly depended.

Charles had now no choice, but that of fighting Cromwell, or marching into England. The army of the parliament had been weakened greatly by detachments; but the mouths of the violent covenanting preachers, since the defeat at Fife, were opened against Charles and all his adherents, whom they accused of being the authors of that dreadful misfortune. Charles therefore thought proper to march into England, where he hoped to be strongly supported by the friends to monarchy, who were still very numerous.

The march of the royal army left Cromwell, as it were, master of Scotland, and accordingly his conquests in that kingdom were rapid and important. He made himself master of Perth, with all the adjacent country, and detached Lambert to hang on the rear of the king's army. But he thought the march of the royalists into England of too much importance to trust the management of the war to any but himself; and accordingly, leaving general Monk to command in Scotland, he began his march in pursuit of the king, at the head of the main body of his army.

The best officers about Charles entertained very melancholy presages of the consequences that would probably attend this march; and, from an excellent letter wrote by the duke of Hamilton to his niece, it appears to have been considered as a desperate step, and that the royalists daily deserted from the army. But the presbyterian party at Westminster either considered, or affected to consider, this matter in a very different light. The conduct of Cromwell was blamed; he was accused of forcing an enemy into the bowels of England, and of having trifled away his advantages in Scotland, till it was too late to retrieve them. Cromwell paid little regard to these calumnies; he left his actions to speak for themselves. His absence, however, gave some advantage to his enemies; and they made great interest to save Love, a presbyterian preacher, who had for some time continued under sentence of death for being engaged in the service of the king. But Cromwell, who well knew that one instance of severity would have more effect upon the presbyterians than twenty of lenity, refused their request, and Love was accordingly executed. This severity increased the hatred of the presbyterians against Cromwell, and several warm speeches were made against him in parliament, for suffering the royal army to enter England. Ignorant of the effect these prepossessions might have on the parliament, Cromwell, in his letters, very freely owned, that he had suffered the king to march into England, from a persuasion, that if the parliament did their parts in defending the most tenable passes, his whole army must be ruined; whereas a winter campaign in Scotland might have ruined that of the parliament.

The king, who expected great reinforcements on his entering England, found himself greatly disappointed. Terrified at so dangerous an enterprise, the Scots lost their usual courage, and deserted in great numbers; while the English presbyterians, having received no intelligence of the king's approach, were not prepared to join him. This measure was full as unexpected to the royalists; nor were they very desirous of joining the royal standard, as the Scottish ministers, even in this desperate extremity, had issued orders not to admit any who refused refused to take the covenant. The earl of Derby had exerted all his interest to raise troops for the king's service; but before he was in a condition to march, his recruits were dispersed by a party of the parliamentary forces; so that when Charles reached Worcester, he found his army was not more numerous than when he began his march for England.

Cromwell followed the king with the utmost expedition; and being joined by the militia of the different counties through which he passed, he invested Worcester with an army of forty thousand men. On the third of September, he attacked the royalists, and the engagement soon became general, and very bloody. Charles led on his men in person, with an intrepidity which amazed even Cromwell himself; while the Scottish infantry behaved so gallantly, that they obliterated the mean opinion that usurper had always entertained of their courage. By this time Cromwell had brought up some field-pieces, to make good the passes he had gained; but these were attacked with so much impetuosity by the duke of Hamilton's regiment, that the artillery was, for some time, in the power of the royalists. Charles endeavoured to improve this advantage, and charged, at the head of some of his battalions, with so much spirit, that Cromwell was obliged to bring up his veterans, whom he had hitherto spared. The dispute was now no longer equal; for Lesley, the Scottish general, remained in the city with his horse, as if they had been unconcerned spectators of the engagement. The parliamentary army now made a general attack on all the posts of the royalists, and were every where successful. The brave duke of Hamilton was mortally wounded. General Massey was also wounded, and taken prisoner. Charles, however, still made a noble defence: he had two horses killed under him, but he was always foremost in every post of danger. Had Lesley done his duty, Cromwell must have purchased his victory very dear; but he continued totally inactive, notwithstanding the dreadful carnage of his countrymen. The king made another effort to lead his broken troops to the charge; but neither his actions, his words, nor his presence, could prevail. The tide of victory became irresistible; and Cromwell entered Worcester sword in hand; nor could Charles prevail on the Scottish cavalry, who were still unbroken, to make one attempt to retrieve the fortune of the day. The king must now have fallen into the enemy's hand, had not the brave colonel Drummond, and a few battalions of foot, stopped the victors at Sudburygate, while Charles made his escape through the gate of St. Martin's in the dusk of the evening. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Shrewsbury, Cleveland and Derby, and about sixty horse. This defeat was fatal to the Scottish army, the greater number being either killed or taken prisoners; and many of the parties that escaped were put to death by the country people.

Distress is a powerful advocate for fallen majesty; and the loss which Charles sustained by this total defeat was amply compensated by the pity, the love, the esteem, and the tenderness which now touched the hearts of the people. The English seemed to be ashamed of their own triumphs; and some who had been remarkably forward in opposing his progress, were now the first in commiserating his misfortunes. His unmerited sufferings, his courage, his constancy, were the general topics of discourse; while his escapes from the unremitted vigilance of his inveterate enemies, were considered as so many miraculous indications that he was destined to sway the sceptre of England.

It could not be expected that Charles, attended by so many of his friends, could ever escape from his pursuers; and it was therefore thought prudent that the king should seek for that protection alone which was despaired of with his companions. On their arrival at Kidderminster, the king, pursuant to the advice of the earl of Derby, retired to Boscobel, a lonely house on the borders of Staffordshire, inhabited by one Penderell, a farmer. This man was an unshaken friend to the royal party; and though death was denounced against all who concealed the king, and a large reward promised to any who should betray him, Penderell preserved an incorruptible integrity. He had, indeed, a dignity of sentiment far superior to his condition; and was more pleased with having it in his power to conceal his royal master, than to have enjoyed all the advantages Cromwell was able to bestow. He had four brothers equally loyal with himself, and these all joined in assisting their distressed sovereign. The king was clothed in the dress of a peasant, and carried into the woods with a bill in his hand, where they pretended to be employed in making faggots. Colonel Careless only, of all his attendants, was now his companion, except the five faithful Penderells. He sometimes lay on straw in the house, and sometimes in the fields. But even this manner of life was exposed to the utmost danger. Two strangers continuing some time at Boscobel, could not be concealed from the servants, and parties of the parliament's army were dispersed all over the neighbourhood, in search of his majesty. It was therefore thought prudent that the king and Careless should continue constantly in the woods; and, for the better security, they mounted upon a large oak, the leaves and branches of which sheltered them from the sight of the enemy. While they continued in this retreat, they saw several soldiers pass by in search of the king; and some of them expressed, in their hearing, their earnest desire of seizing him. This tree was, for many years after, held in great veneration; and, for having concealed his majesty from the sight of his enemies, was called, The Royal Oak.

But notwithstanding all their precautions, it was found impossible to conceal the king any longer at Boscobel; and it was proposed by lord Wilmot, who had now joined him, to repair to the house of Mr. Whitegrave, a catholic gentleman, who lived at some distance from Boscobel, and where lord Wilmot had, before he joined his royal master, been concealed. They accordingly passed thither with the five Penderells, and met with a very kind reception. During the whole time, the parliament's officers were very assiduous in their inquiries after all strangers that were lately arrived in these parts; and, perhaps, all the fidelity of his friends would not have been sufficient to have saved him, had not the houses, whither he retired, generally belonged to Roman catholics, and contained several secret hiding-places in the walls and wainscot, where they concealed their persecuted priests, when their houses were searched by the officers of justice.

Colonel Lane, a zealous loyalist, who resided at Bentley, not many miles distant from Whitegrave's house, was now made acquainted with the king's distress, and the necessary precautions were taken for carrying him thither. But his majesty's feet were so hurt by walking about in heavy boots, or countrymen's shoes, which did not fit him, that he was forced to mount on horseback; and in this manner he travelled to Bentley, still attended by the five Penderells, his faithful companions. After some consultation, it was resolved that the king should repair to Bristol, where it was hoped a ship might be found to carry him over to the continent: and, in order to prevent any discovery being made during the journey, it was proposed to make use of a pals that had been procured for Mrs. Jane Lane, the colonel's sister, for herself and servant to visit Mrs. Norton, a near relation, who lived within three miles of Bristol. Charles was accordingly dressed in the habit of a servant, and rode before the lady, lord Wilmot, with a hawk on his hand, passing for a stranger who had joined them by accident.

Nothing remarkable happened during their journey; but on their arrival at Norton's house, Mrs. Lane pretended that her servant had been taken ill on the road, and desired that he might have a private room, room, where he might be quiet. In this chamber Charles kept himself concealed; but he was known by one Pope, the butler, at his first entering the house. He, however, prudently concealed the discovery, but took the first opportunity of throwing himself on his knees before the king, and praying for his life and preservation. Charles was greatly alarmed at this incident, but made the butler promise that he would keep the secret inviolably, and he scrupulously performed the engagement.

After continuing some days at Norton's house, they were informed that no ship was expected to sail from Bristol either to France or Spain in less than a month. This rendered their scheme abortive; and it was agreed that the king should intrust his person to colonel Windham of Dorsetshire, a gentleman who had always been a zealous partizan of the royal family. Before he received the king, Windham asked leave to intrust the secret to his mother, his wife, and four servants, on whose fidelity he could depend; and not one of them proved wanting either in honour or discretion. Here the king continued nineteen days, and all his friends in every part of Europe were held in the most anxious suspense with regard to his safety. It was indeed generally imagined that he was dead, and this notion prevailing strongly among his enemies, operated greatly in his favour, by relaxing their diligence. After leaving Windham's house he repaired to Charmouth, where he was in the utmost danger of being discovered by the sagacity of a blacksmith, who declared that the horse on which his majesty rode had been shod in the north, and not, as he pretended, in the west of England. This intelligence of the smith rendered it necessary for Charles to leave the place immediately, and he was fortunate enough to reach Windham's house, before the neighbourhood was informed of the discovery.

It was now determined that he should pass into Suffex, where it was hoped a vessel might be found to carry him over to the continent. He accordingly went to Hale near Salisbury, and thence to Bright-helmstone, where he continued till a ship could be provided for his passage. This was at last accomplished, and on the fifteenth of October he embarked in a small vessel at Shoreham, and was landed at Feschamp, in Normandy, after having been concealed no less than two and forty days in England. His escape was truly wonderful, some of the royalists have termed it miraculous. But the most extraordinary part of the whole is, the inviolable attachment which all, who either discovered him, or to whom he discovered himself, expressed for his person. Tho' no less than forty persons of both sexes were intrusted with the secret, and though every method was used by Cromwell for discovering where he was concealed, yet not one of them ever wavered in their affection, though their vanity sometimes got so much the better of their loyalty, that all his party in the neighbourhood knew the house where he was sheltered.

The success of Monk in Scotland completed the destruction of the royal party, and rendered the triumph of the parliament complete. He took the strong castle of Stirling, where he found forty pieces of cannon, five thousand stands of arms, the regalia and records of Scotland, and other rich booty. He afterwards surprized and made prisoners the earls of Leven and Crawford, with the principal nobility and gentry, whom he either knew or supposed to be enemies to the English parliament. He stormed Dundee, and put the governor and garrison to the sword. The plunder of this town was very considerable, Whitlock says the common soldiers had five hundred pounds to their share; fifty sail of ships were taken in the harbour, and thirty pieces of ordnance in the town. All the Lowlands of Scotland now submitted; but the Highlands, where the bravest and most warlike part of the inhabitants resided, still supported themselves under two rival chiefs, the marquiss of Huntley and Argyre.

This success in Scotland added to the victory

Cromwell had gained at Worcester, rendered him absolutely master of the kingdom. He called the destruction of the royal army at Worcester, his "crowning mercy;" and was so elated with his success in that decisive battle, that he intended to have conferred the honour of knighthood on two of his generals, Lambert and Fleetwood, in the field; and it was not without great difficulty that his friends dissuaded him from exercising that act of legal authority. His power and ambition were both too great to brook submission to the empty name of a republic, which subsisted merely by his influence, and was supported by his victories. According to Whitlock, he now communicated to his most intimate friends the views he had formed on the crown itself; and expressed a desire of assuming the regal power, which he had so long and so effectually laboured to abolish. He well knew that the members in parliament, who at present governed the nation, were despised by the people, and their views too much confined to qualify them for legislators. Their whole attention was engrossed by selfish aims and fanatical bigotry. Their rigid austerity was carried to the greatest height; and they had hardly made any progress in the important work of fixing a new plan of government, and settling a juster model of representation.

All these particulars were favourable to Cromwell's scheme of power; the army was at his devotion, and he had no competitor in authority. The only person that seemed capable of making any opposition to his ambitious scheme was Ireton, who commanded the troops in Ireland, but he soon after died of the plague, and left Cromwell at full liberty to prosecute the plan he had formed. Ireton was famous for his vigilance, industry, capacity, and even for the strict execution of justice in that unlimited command he possessed in Ireland. He was observed to be inflexible in all his purposes; and it was believed by many, that he was animated with a sincere and passionate love of liberty, and could never have been induced, by any motive whatever, to submit to the smallest appearance of regal government.

A. D. 1652. No farther opposition being apprehended either in England, Scotland, or Ireland, the parliament turned their thoughts towards the affairs of the continent; and the Dutch were the first who felt the vigour of their arms. The states had observed an exact neutrality with regard to the civil wars of England; during the life of Frederic Henry, prince of Orange; but after his death, when his son William, who married an English princess, succeeded him in power, they were accused of betraying an inveterate prejudice against the English parliament, and of assisting the royal party. After the death of William, which was attended with the depression of his party, it was hoped that a kind of a coalition might be effected between the two republics, and St. John, lord chief-justice, was sent to the Hague for that purpose. But he soon perceived that the states entertained a contemptible idea of a government whose measures were so obnoxious to the people. They offered indeed to renew the former alliances with England, but refused any nearer connection. Disgusted with this refusal, and incensed at many affronts offered him with impunity, the haughty St. John returned to England, and exerted all his interest to excite a war between the two republics.

St. John, who had a great ascendancy over Cromwell, soon accomplished his designs. He represented to the parliament, that the Dutch sought nothing so much, as to dispute with England the government of the seas; that in all their papers they mentioned Charles II. which was a tacit recognition of his authority; that in all their professions they were insincere, and that it was necessary for the English to depress those, whose friendship they could not gain. These representations had the desired effect, and under pretence of providing for the interest of commerce, the parliament embraced such measures as they knew would sufficiently disgust the states. They formed the famous famous act of navigation; which prohibited all-nations from importing into England in their own bottoms, any commodity not the growth and manufacture of their own country. Though the terms in which this statute was conceived were general, yet the Dutch were principally injured; because their country produced few commodities, and they subsisted chiefly on being the general factors and carriers of the world. Several merchants complaining of injuries, they pretended to have received, obtained letters of reprisal against the states, and about eighty of their merchant ships were taken. About thirty years before the Dutch had practised the most horrid cruelties on the English merchants in Amboyna; these were now complained of, and even satisfaction demanded.

Alarmed at these proceedings which indicated an approaching rupture, the states sent ambassadors to London in order to renew, if possible, the treaty of alliance that had been broken off by the abrupt departure of St. John. They represented that famous republican as a person whom it was impossible to please; and that they either granted, or were willing to grant every thing that he asked. But the parliament believed St. John rather than the Dutch, and all the preparations for an approaching war were made with great vigour and alacrity.

Soon after an English man of war falling in with a fleet of Dutch fishermen, demanded the usual acknowledgement. This being refused the captain sunk one of the Dutch vessels with all her crew. All negotiations were now suspended. The Dutch following the example of the English in issuing letters of reprisal, and in a few days appeared before Portsmouth with a fleet of forty-five sail. The English marine was not immediately in a condition to resent this insult, but their motions were watched by commodore Brown till Blake's squadron was in a condition of meeting them on the open sea. This required no great length of time; such dispatch was used in the different departments, that in less than six weeks Blake was sailed with a considerable fleet. About the middle of May, he discovered the Dutch squadron commanded by their celebrated admiral Van Tromp, and immediately made a signal for his paying respect to the English flag. The signal being disregarded, Blake, though his squadron consisted only of twenty-six ships, formed the line of battle, and advanced towards the enemy. Before he came within gun shot he was joined by eight ships, and soon after the action began with great fury, and lasted till night put an end to the battle. Blake's ship being considerably a-head of the rest, was exposed, for some time, to the whole fire of the enemy, but his other ships coming up the attention of the Dutch was divided. One of the Dutch ships was taken, and another sunk by the English, who lost only fifteen men in the engagement. The next morning the Dutch fleet was perceived at four leagues distance, steering towards the coast of France. The truth is, neither of the admirals were desirous of renewing the engagement, as they had received no orders to fight but in case of necessity.

The Dutch pretended that Van Tromp had exceeded his commission, and that he had been forced upon the English coast by stress of weather. But the English parliament affected to disbelieve their most solemn assurances, and voted a letter of thanks to Blake for his behaviour. Cromwell himself repaired to Dover to encourage Blake and the seamen to do their duty, and to assure them that they should want for nothing.

The Dutch soon perceived they had been mistaken in the notions they had formed with regard to the English commonwealth; and Paw, their ambassador extraordinary at London, received orders to exert all his power, for putting a stop to hostilities; but all his endeavours were in vain. The parliament indeed behaved with politeness both towards Paw and his masters; but at the same time redoubled their applications to increase the power of their navy. Sir George Ascue received a commission independent of that of Blake, and soon after destroyed about thirty sail of the St. Ube's fleet; while Blake, in less than a month sent upwards of forty sail of rich prizes into the Thames. He now stood to the northward, in order to assert the right of his country to the British fishery. This service he nobly performed; he took their whole convoy of twelve men of war, one only excepted that was fortunate enough to escape. He might also have destroyed all their fishing vessels, but suffered them to continue their occupation on their promising never to return to the English coast without leave, and on their paying the tenth herring.

This expedition of Blake, though attended with the greatest success, had nearly proved fatal to the squadron of Sir George Ascue, who was left in the Downs. For Van Tromp, whose fleet was far superior to that of Ascue, was then at sea, and attempted to take advantage of Blake's absence. He stood accordingly towards the English coasts, but was overtaken by so dreadful a storm, that he was obliged to return to Holland to repair the damages his ships had received. His fleet was now increased to one hundred and fifty sail, and his appearance was so formidable, that it was thought necessary to erect a platform and mount it with cannon, between Deal and Sandown-castle, and to line the shore with militia. Ascue lay as near as possible to the strand, but his whole squadron, which consisted only of fifteen ships, must have been destroyed had not the wind immediately changed, and prevented the Dutch from reaching the English shore; and the Dutch merchant ships being impatient for a convoy to the northward, Van Tromp took them under his protection, hoping he should be fortunate enough to meet with Blake in the north sea. He was, however, disappointed, but greatly distressed the English trade to Newcastle, while Blake took two of the Dutch East-India ships. The weather proving extremely tempestuous, Tromp found it impossible to keep the sea, and accordingly returned once more to Holland with no more than forty ships, some being lost, and the remainder not arriving in the Texel till some weeks after.

In the mean time Ascue sent some of his ships to convoy home a rich East India fleet, while he himself cruised between Dover and Calais, where he took ten Flemish ships, and forced twenty to run ashore. The famous de Ruyter was now appointed to command a squadron of about fifty Dutch men of war, and sent to convoy home a large fleet of merchantmen. Ascue, whose squadron amounted only to thirty-eight ships, fell in with this convoy on the sixteenth of August; and though his force was so far unequal, he attacked de Ruyter, and destroyed several of the Dutch ships; but some of his captains not seconding the attack of their leaders, he was obliged to abandon the enterprize, after the fight had continued with the utmost fury near four hours. Captain Peck, who acted as rear-admiral was mortally wounded, and most of the ships that charged the enemy were greatly shattered. Ascue, however, renewed the attack in the morning, but with no better success. He made another attempt on the third day, but his ships were now so shattered in their rigging that he was again obliged to desist, and return to Plymouth to refit, and the Dutch continued their course to Holland.

The jealousy which always attends a true republican spirit appeared eminently on this occasion. Ascue had done the public more eminent services at sea, than even Blake himself had hitherto performed; but he had acted as a true Englishman; and when he reduced Barbadoes under the government of the commonwealth, he granted such advantageous terms to lord Willoughby, colonel Waldron, and other royalists in that island, that the council of state suspected his principles. And notwithstanding his eminent services, he was now laid aside. He was, however, presented with three hundred pounds in money, and three hundred pounds a year landed estate in Ireland.

The English parliament, though they parted with this able officer, were not ignorant that the Dutch were soliciting all the princes in Europe to join them against the English. At the same time, they knew the Dutch had above an hundred sail of ships ready for the sea, and reason to think the French would soon assist them; yet the imperious parliament would hearken to no reasons for putting an end to hostilities. Elated with the numerous successes they had obtained over their domestic enemies, they were persuaded that nothing could stand before their victorious arms. Blake, who was now returned from the north, carried his fleet into different harbours to refit; and as soon as every thing could be got ready, he was ordered to put to sea, and take or destroy all the Dutch or French vessels he met with in his cruize.

The whole naval power of the Dutch was now at sea, under the command of de Wit and de Ruyter, and Blake did all in his power to bring them to a decisive engagement. But the Dutch admirals having a rich fleet of merchantmen under their convoy, avoided a battle, which they knew must be fatal to some of their ships. They had, however, no sooner secured their convoy, than they stood towards the English, drawn up in a line of battle. Blake, though his fleet was greatly inferior in number to that of the enemy, advanced to engage them. He divided his ships into three squadrons; the first commanded by himself, in the Sovereign, the largest ship in the English navy; the second by Penn, and the third by Bourn. He began the battle himself; but there being a sand-bank between the two fleets, the Sovereign, the Resolution, and the St. Andrew, all first rates, struck upon the shoal. Persuaded that these three ships were now rendered unserviceable, the Dutch admirals stood farther off to sea, in order to bring on a closer engagement. The three ships got off the sand with very little damage, and a furious battle ensued. The largest ship in the Dutch fleet, followed by two more, bore down upon the Sovereign, on board of which Blake's flag was hoisted, and attacked her with the utmost fury. But they had soon cause to repent of their temerity. The first broadside of the Sovereign sent the headmost ship to the bottom; and the others, intimidated by the dreadful incident, retreated back to their fleet. Night at last put an end to the engagement, but not before the Dutch rear-admiral was taken. De Wit took the advantage of the night to bear away from the English, whose ships were so shattered in their rigging, that they could not follow him.

The same success did not attend the English in the Mediterranean, where commodore Badily was stationed, with a small squadron, to protect the English trade. Van Galen, the Dutch admiral, who was much superior in force, defeated him; but he purchased the victory with the loss of his life. Badily retired under the cannon of Porto Longone, where his ships were protected by the governor.

Sea-fights are hardly ever so decisive, as to disable the vanquished from being, in a short time, in a condition to face the victors. Van Tromp failed with a fleet sufficiently numerous to recover the honour the Dutch had lost in the late engagement. It consisted of one hundred and ten sail of men of war, besides seventeen which joined him; a few days after, from Zealand. It seems as if the English had placed too much confidence in the divisions among the states, with regard to Van Tromp, who had been laid aside since his engagement with Blake, and it was thought would not be any more employed during the war, and that it would be impossible for the Dutch to fit out a fleet of any great strength that season. In consequence of this opinion, Blake had detached twenty sail of his ships to convoy the colliers from Newcastle; twelve were laid up at Plymouth, and fifteen sent up the river Medway to refit. The admiral had, therefore, only thirty-seven sail of ships with him in the Downs when Tromp appeared in the English channel. He had under his convoy three, some say five, hundred sail of merchantmen. But he had no sooner conducted them to a place of safety, than he stood directly for the Downs, with a fleet of eighty sail of men of war. Blake perceived the Dutch admiral advancing towards him in the morning of the twenty-ninth of November; and though his squadron was so far inferior to that of the enemy, he determined not to refuse the engagement. The fight accordingly began about eleven in the morning, and lasted till six in the evening, but with infinite disadvantage to the English. The great force of the engagement fell upon Blake's own ship, the Triumph, and two others, the Victory and the Vanguard, which were attacked by twenty of the Dutch ships, and fought them all for a considerable time before any other ships could come to their assistance. Towards the evening, the Garland, commanded by captain Batton, and the Bonadventure, commanded by captain Hookston, attacked Van Tromp's own ship, and would have taken her, had not several of the Dutch fleet come to her assistance. They, however, paid dear for their temerity; they were both killed, and their ships taken. Blake, desirous of saving these two ships, pushed forward, and by that means brought himself into so desperate a situation, that it was with the utmost difficulty he was saved by the assistance of the Vanguard and the Sapphire. Fortunately for the English, night soon after put an end to the engagement: two hours longer of day-light would have proved the destruction of their whole fleet. Blake retired first to Dover, and then to the mouth of the Thames, having lost, besides the two ships already mentioned, the Hercules, and two merchantmen. Blake himself was dangerously wounded; and a great number of his men, and several of his officers, killed. Tromp was so elated with this victory, that he fixed a broom at his main-top-mast-head, intimating, that he intended to sweep the sea entirely of all English vessels.

A.D. 1653. This defeat only tended to animate the English to wipe off the disgrace. The utmost efforts were made to fit out a fleet sufficient to recover the losses sustained in the late engagement. Among other encouragements, the pay of the seamen was increased; a larger share of the prizes taken from the enemy was allotted them; and Monk, at Blake's particular request, was sent for from Scotland to assist him in the command. The true reason for this seems to have been the death of Popham, who was buried with a profusion of honours, and the necessity of having a land officer on board the fleet to command the soldiers in time of action, but without any separate command at other times. So much expedition was used, that by the eleventh of February, Blake was at sea, with a fleet of sixty sail of men of war. Several of his ships were new, and all of them much better manned than before. That nothing might be wanting to encourage the seamen and soldiers, hospitals for the reception of their sick and wounded were erected all along the coasts; and Blake's fleet was so stationed off Portland, that Tromp, who had above one hundred and fifty merchantmen under his convoy, could not avoid an engagement on the eighteenth of February.

The fight was begun about eight in the morning, by Blake, in the Triumph, seconded with about twelve other ships; among which was the Fairfax, commanded by captain Lawfon, and the Vanguard, by captain Mildmay. The impetuous courage of Blake had its usual consequence; it exposed him to the most imminent danger: for this small squadron bore the whole fire and fury of the Dutch till the rest of the fleet could come up to their assistance, which was not till some time after. This battle far exceeded all that had been hitherto fought between the two republics. Amazed and confounded with the strength, the order, and the discipline of the English, the Dutch exerted all their force to destroy Blake's fleet; while Blake, stung with his late misfortune, collected all his force to be revenged on the Dutch.

Dutch. The sea was covered with wrecks, and the fire from the ships so quick and violent, that, for some time, there was a dead calm. In the mean time, the fury of the combatants was astonishing; they bore down close to one another, and received the whole of every broadside: it seemed as if the dispute had not been victory, but which should first go to the bottom. The Triumph bore the whole fury of this dreadful fire; and must have been either sunk or taken, had the not been relieved by Lawton. Blake was wounded in the thigh; Mildmay in the Vanguard, and Ball in the Triumph, were killed. The admiral's secretary was killed by his side. The Prosperous, a forty-four gun ship, was boarded by the Dutch, but saved by the Merlin frigate. The Assistance and the Advice were both disabled, and obliged to put into Portsmouth. The Fairfax lost a hundred men, the Triumph as many; and captain Batten, in the Samphon, after sinking one of the enemy's ships, found it impossible to keep his own above water; and was obliged to go, with his crew, on board other ships. But this was far from being equal to the loss sustained by the Dutch. Three days was the battle continued, with the utmost rage and obstinacy; and Blake, who was victor, obtained not more honour than Tromp, who was vanquished. He made so skilful a retreat, that he saved the greater part of his convoy, which was very large, thirty only of his merchantmen falling into the hands of the English. He, however, lost eleven ships of war, had two thousand men killed, and near fifteen hundred taken prisoners. The English, though many of their ships were dreadfully shattered, lost only one. Their slain were not much inferior to that of the enemy; but they gained the immortal honour of filling their rival republic with the terrors of their power and valour.

This success of the English was, in a great measure, owing to the size of their ships; an advantage which all the skill and bravery of the Dutch admirals could not compensate. But the misfortunes which the Dutch met with in battle, were small in comparison of those which their trade suffered from the English. Their whole commerce by the channel was cut off; even that with the Baltic suffered greatly by the English privateers. Their fisheries were totally suspended. Above sixteen hundred of their ships had fallen into the hands of the enemy. Nor was this distress suffered from any national interest or necessity, but from vain points of honour and national resentments, of which it was difficult to give a satisfactory account to the people.

Cromwell was filled with sentiments very different from those of the public at these triumphs of the parliament. The remembrance of his exploits was now but faint, and one farther step to glory must have placed the republicans superior to every thing but envy. He knew not how soon his soldiers, infected with a passion for increasing the glory of their country, might declare for the parliament; and should that happen, one single vote would be sufficient to destroy at once his greatness and his power. No time had yet been fixed for the dissolution of the parliament; and while he was a subject, and consequently accountable, it was the same to him whether the presiding power was a monarchy or a commonwealth. He indeed commanded the army, and the troops were at present at his devotion; but these triumphs at sea seemed greatly to lessen their regard for their favourite general; they desired to share in the honours of their countrymen. On the other hand, the zealous republicans set up the fleet in opposition to the army, and celebrated, with uncommon demonstrations of joy, the successes of their naval armaments. They even ventured to urge the necessity of diminishing the number of the land forces, which they represented as no longer necessary to support the domestic peace of the nation. Cromwell plainly perceived that they entertained a jealousy of his power and ambitious designs, and were resolved to render him subordinate to their authority. This he resolved to prevent; and the only method of effecting it, was by dissolving the parliament. He accordingly summoned a general council of officers, and soon found that they were ready to join him in any attempt he might think necessary. Most of them were indeed his creatures, owed their advancement entirely to his favour, and depended upon him for their future preferment. Some of them indeed were men of principle, but guided by notions so fanatically extravagant, that they were easily deluded into the most violent and most criminal measures.

Their first step was to vote a remonstrance to the parliament. It began with complaining of the arrears due to the army; and after applauding the parliament for their zeal and enterprise, represented to them, that it was now time to resign their seats, and leave to other members of the commonwealth the cares of government; and that they would now, by establishing a free and equal administration, perform the promise they had long since made to the people. The parliament was at once alarmed and exasperated at the temerity of the army; and after a violent debate, a sharp reply was returned to their remonstrance.

Cromwell now found no difficulty to inspire the council of officers with the sentiments he desired: they were sufficiently exasperated by the harsh answer returned by the parliament. Harrison having assured the council, that the general's design was only to pave the way for the government of Jesus and his saints, major Street replied, that it was necessary for Jesus to come quickly; for if he delayed it till after Christmas, he would find the seat of power occupied by another. While the officers were engaged in such debates, colonel Ingoldsby entered, and informed Cromwell, that the parliament had just voted not to dissolve themselves, but to fill up the house by new elections; and that the manner of carrying this expedient into execution was the subject on which they were then deliberating. Exasperated at this intelligence, Cromwell left the council of officers; and taking with him three hundred soldiers, repaired to the house, leaving some of his men at the foot of the stairs, some at the entrance of the lobby, and some at the door. He advanced to his seat, and told his friend St. John, that he was come to do an act which grieved his very soul, and had besought the Lord, with prayers and tears, not to impose it upon him, but that the glory of God, and the good of the nation, rendered it absolutely necessary. He, however, sat still, and listened to the debates for some time; and then told colonel Harrison, that he thought the parliament was now sufficiently ripe for a dissolution. Harrison warned him of the danger that might attend a step of that nature, and desired him to consider the consequences before he attempted it. Cromwell accordingly sat still for some time longer; but when the speaker was just going to put the question, he started from his seat, accused the parliament, in the most opprobrious language, of tyranny, ambition, rapine, and injustice. Then stamping violently with his foot, the signal he had given the soldiers for entering the house, he cried out, "Get you gone for shame; give place to honest men; to those who will more faithfully discharge their trust. You are no longer a parliament: I tell you, you are no longer a parliament; the Lord hath cast you off; he hath chosen other instruments for carrying on his work." Then taking Martin by the cloak, "Thou art a whoremaster," said he. To a second, "Thou art an adulterer." To a third, "Thou art a drunkard and a glutton." And to a fourth, "Thou art an extortioner." The speaker, fond of his power and dignity, seemed unwilling to leave the chair, and kept his seat till he was in a manner pulled out of it by Harrison. Cromwell, pointing to the mace that lay on the table, said to one of the soldiers, "Take away that fool's bauble." Then turning himself to the house, he said, "It is you that have forced me upon this. I have fought the Lord,

"night and day, with strong prayers and tears, that he would rather slay me than put me upon this work; but he would not hear me." The soldiers soon cleared the house, and it was sufficiently evident, from the furious manner in which Cromwell behaved, that he would, in case of opposition, have put every man of them to death. Sir Peter Wentworth and Sir Henry Vane, were the only members that had the courage to upbraid him with his conduct, which they did in the severest terms, accusing him of ingratitude and treachery. He took no notice of what was said by the former, but interrupted the latter, by crying out with a terrible voice, "O! Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" As soon as the soldiers had cleared the house, Cromwell seized all the journals and public papers, ordered the doors to be locked, and carried the keys with him to Whitehall.

No circumstance in the life of this remarkable man, conveys a juster idea of his true character, than this memorable incident. It demonstrates that he was a person of the profoundest subtilty blended with the most fiery intrepidity. Incapable of moderation, he often passed from the excesses of debauchery to those of enthusiasm and religious austerity. When at war with the king he made no scruple of saying, that if he met him in battle he would put him to death with the same facility as a common soldier; and there was no doubt but he would have carried his threat into execution, had an opportunity offered. But this sudden dissolution of the parliament exceeded all the rest of his actions. He alone was capable of forming and executing so bold a design.

Persuaded that heaven had invested him with the sole administration of government, he at first intended to be the only dispenser of justice, and not to share his power with another: but upon more mature reflection he determined to satisfy the expectations of the people by governing them under the appearance of a republic. Accordingly he summoned one hundred and twenty-eight Englishmen, six Irish and five Scots to meet at London, and delegated to them, during fifteen months, the legislative authority, and which they were afterwards to transfer to one hundred and thirty-four others, chosen by themselves.

This assembly, selected from the fanatical dregs of the people, considered themselves as a true parliament, and acted accordingly. They began "by seeking God in prayer." Some particular enthusiasts were charged with this office, and declared, "That never in their usual transports of favour had they known the communication of the holy spirit in such abundance." Cromwell's first speech to this remarkable assembly is singular for that ridiculous mystery, under which he always concealed his hypocrisy. "I own, said he, that I never presumed to expect, nor you, perhaps, to see a day like unto this; when Jesus Christ is made known unto us even as at this day. Jesus Christ is at this day made known by your vocation, and you make him known by your zeal to appear for him, and do manifest, as much as it is in the power of frail creatures, that this day is the day of the power of Jesus Christ. I know you well remember, that scripture, he maketh his people willing in the day of his power. God manifests it to be the day of the power of Christ, having through so much blood and so much trial, as has been upon this nation, he maketh this one of the greatest mercies, next to his own son, to have his people called to the supreme authority. God hath owned his son, and hath owned you, and hath made you to own him. I confess, I never looked to have seen such a day: I did not."

Animated by this speech of the general, they thought themselves under an absolute necessity of proceeding to a thorough reformation, both in civil and religious affairs; and accordingly began in a manner worthy of such an assembly, and of the spirit with which it was acted. They took into consideration the abolition of the ecclesiastical function, which they said was a relief of popery; and of taking away tythes, which they termed a judiacal practice. They declared sciences and universities to be heathenish institutions, unworthy of protection in a christian country. The common law of England they called the badge of Norman slavery: and formed a design of establishing the law of Moses, as the only system of English jurisprudence. In a word, a general reformation was projected; but, for want of time, the whole was reduced to the single article of performing the marriage ceremony by the civil power without the intervention of the clergy.

The Dutch flattered themselves that they should now be able to succeed in their negotiations for a peace, as the haughty republican parliament was no more. And it must be owned that Cromwell was far from being averse to put a period to hostilities. But several reasons prevented him from carrying his design into execution. He knew that nothing could render him more popular than that of carrying on the Dutch war with vigour; the English being now more capable of disputing the empire of the sea with the enemy, than they had ever been before. This was, in a great measure owing to the friendship of Sweden, by which, notwithstanding all the opposition of the Dutch and Danes, the English had been furnished with materials for ship-building. On the other hand, the populace of Holland, who saw only the surface of things, were full of the highest expectations, that the dissolution of the parliament must occasion a civil war in England.

In the beginning of June a strong fleet was assembled and sailed from Holland under the command of Van Tromp, de Wit, and de Ruyter, and manned with the best seamen of their country. Blake with his division of eighteen sail of ships, had stood to the northward, and had not yet joined the fleet commanded by Monk and Dean. But his absence did not prevent the English from advancing against the enemy. Their fleet consisted of ninety-five men of war, and five fire-ships; and the Dutch of ninety-eight men of war, and seven fire-ships. The engagement began in the morning of the second of June, and almost the first broadside received from the enemy, Dean, one of the English admirals, was killed. Monk, with great prudence and presence of mind, concealed this misfortune from the seamen, by immediately dropping his cloak over the dead body of that able officer. The fury of the contending fleets seemed to be increased in proportion as the officers had learned experience. Lawson, the English rear-admiral, charged with the blue squadron, consisting of forty ships, through the whole Dutch fleet, with amazing execution, and would have taken de Ruyter's ship, had he not been relieved by Van Tromp, who, in his turn, was charged by Monk, and the battle continued to rage with the most violent fury till three in the afternoon, each party ignorant of the loss they had sustained, both fleets being involved in an impracticable cloud of smoke. At last the Dutch fury gave way to the well directed courage of the English. The faintness of their fire gave the first intimation of their loss, and the wind being favourable they withdrew from the engagement; but were cannonaded in their retreat by the lighter ships of the English. Van Tromp performed all that could be expected from the bravest and most experienced commander. He endeavoured to keep his ships in a line of battle; but three or four of them being sunk, and one of his flag-ships blown up, his whole fleet was thrown into confusion, and he was obliged to retire from the English. This engagement happened off the north Foreland, and during the night Blake joined Monk with his division. The next morning the attack was renewed; but the Dutch were so disheartened by the preceding engagement, that it was with the utmost difficulty their admirals could prevail upon their men to fight. But the contest was now unequal. Tromp was twice boarded by vice-admiral Penn, but disengaged by de Ruyter and and de Wit. Six capital Dutch ships were sunk, two blown up by fire-ships, and eleven taken. The whole was now a disorderly flight; nor could the Dutch captains, either by persuasions or menaces, be brought to face the English; and their whole fleet must inevitably have been destroyed, had they not taken shelter on the flats between Dunkirk and Calais, where it was dangerous for the English to follow them. The latter lost not a single ship in this desperate engagement.

It is impossible to describe the consternation into which the Dutch were thrown when the news of this defeat reached their country. They now saw that fleet, which, but a few days before, they thought invincible, blocked up in their harbours by a victorious enemy, which was every moment ruining their trade, on which their very being, as a maritime power, depended. Tromp, in his letters to the states, complained bitterly that his ships were not sufficiently supplied with powder and ball, and that his whole misfortune ought to be imputed to his want of ammunition. The common people, from whom these complaints were not long a secret, were enraged to the highest pitch of fury. They said, that a design had been formed to betray their fleet into the hands of the enemy, that the republic might be under a necessity of making peace upon their own terms. The states were alarmed, and pursued the only method in their power to silence the clamours of the people; they used the utmost diligence and expedition in repairing and refitting their fleet; they recalled their ships from their different stations, in order, if possible, to wipe off the disgrace of the late defeat.

The spirits of the English were raised to such a height by the late victory, that they would hear of no peace, unless the Dutch would agree to disarm their ships, pay all the expences of the war, and make full satisfaction for the damages the English merchants had sustained. Cromwell, however, hinted to the Dutch ambassadors, that peace might be concluded on much easier terms, but did not think it prudent to explain himself farther at present on so delicate a subject. He was, however, persuaded, that if the Dutch were totally ruined, he should never be able to obtain the summit of his wishes, the supreme power in England, which, perhaps, he would have been glad to purchase even by a defeat at sea. To this persuasion the Dutch owed their safety. The late victory, however complete, was not prosecuted with all the vigour that might have been expected. The enemy were incapable of sending five men of war to sea, their best admirals refused to act, and a rich East-India fleet was every day expected. Yet no advantages were taken of this distressed state of the enemy. Blake, indeed, continued cruising on the coast of Holland; but he made no attempt on their harbours, and the East-India fleet arrived in safety.

While the English admiral triumphed in his superiority, and continued the undisputed master of the ocean, the Dutch were exerting all their efforts to repair and increase their navy. Nor were their attempts in vain; their fleet was soon in a better condition than ever, both with regard to the largeness of the ships and the number of seamen. Van Tromp, de Ruyter, and other famous admirals, had now no longer the least pretence for abandoning the public service. Young Tromp, who had taken an English man of war in the Straights, was ordered home with his squadron, and some very large East-India ships were converted into men of war; so that about the latter end of July, Van Tromp's squadron consisted of ninety stout ships, manned with able seamen, and well provided with ammunition and stores.

On the thirtieth of July, that celebrated admiral failed to the Texel, and joined de Ruyter and de Wit; and by this junction the whole fleet amounted to one hundred and twenty sail. The English fleet, which was commanded by Monk, Lawson, and Penn, amounted only to ninety sail; but they were determined to give the enemy battle. The engagement accordingly began on the thirty-first of July, in the morning, with the utmost fury. The Dutch had now obviated all the disadvantages under which they laboured in their former engagements: they worked their ships with wonderful address; and fought with the most surprising resolution. Monk, on the other hand, gave his orders with that calmness and precision which characterizes the consummate commander. The battle continued to rage with the utmost violence till near noon, when the brave admiral Van Tromp was killed with a musquet-ball, as he was encouraging his men. As soon as his death was known, the Dutch retired towards their own coasts with great precipitation. They lost in this engagement twenty-four of their men of war, about four thousand of their men were killed, and a thousand taken prisoners. The English lost three men of war, six captains, and five hundred seamen. Eight hundred were dangerously wounded, and their whole fleet so dreadfully shattered, that they were obliged to leave the coast of Holland.

By this time Cromwell himself was ashamed of his parliament, which had, for some time, been exposed to the ridicule of the public. Among the fanatics that composed this motley assembly, was a very active member, remarkable for long prayers, sermons, and harangues. He was a leather-seller in London, and known by the name of "Praise-God Barebone," a ridiculous appellation formed by some poet to express the meagre figure of so strange a person. The populace were pleased with the thought, and gave the assembly itself the name of Barebone's parliament. Though this assembly had received all their authority from Cromwell, they now began to pretend they had been favoured with power from the Lord, and to insist on their divine commission. The friends of the general perceived that they were on the point of acting contrary to his interest, and determined to put a period to this ridiculous parliament. Accordingly they met early at the house; and one of them moved, that the sitting of this parliament any longer would be of no service to the nation. The motion was carried, and they hastened to Cromwell, with Rouse, their speaker, at their head; and by a formal deed, resigned back into his hands that authority which they had so lately received from him. This resolution was taken and carried into execution before many of the members came to the house; and that they might prevent the reign of the saints from coming to an untimely end, they placed one Moyer in the chair, and began to draw up a protest against all that had been done in their absence; but before they had finished their design, colonel White came to the house with a party of soldiers, and put an end to their labours. On his entrance, he asked them what they did there? "We are seeking the Lord," said they. "Then you must go elsewhere," replied the colonel; "for, to my certain knowledge, he has not been here these several years."

This resignation once more stopped the machine of government; and it was now proposed, in a council of officers, to introduce a new scheme of administration, and to temper the liberty of a commonwealth by the authority of a single person, who should be known under the appellation of Protector. Lambert accordingly produced the instrument of government, containing the plan of this new legislature; and as it was supposed to be agreeable to the general, it was immediately agreed to by the council. Cromwell was now installed, with great solemnity, in that high office. The ceremony was performed in the court of chancery, the commissioners of the great seal, the barons of the exchequer, the judges, the council of state, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, attending.

The chief articles in this instrument of government were the following: A council of state was appointed, which was not to consist of more than twenty-one, nor less than thirteen persons. These were to enjoy their office during life, or good behaviour; and in case of a vacancy, the remaining members were to name three, out of whom the protector was to chuse one. The protector was appointed the supreme magistrate of the commonwealth: in his name all justice was administered; from him all magistracy and all honours were derived; he had the power of pardoning all crimes, except murder and treason; and to him the benefit of all forfeitures devolved. The right of peace, war and alliance, was vested in him; but with regard to these particulars, he was to act entirely by the consent and with the advice of his council. The power of the sword was vested in the protector, jointly with the parliament, while it was sitting, or with the council of state in the intervals. He was obliged to summon a parliament every three years, and to allow them to sit five months, without adjournment, prorogation, or dissolution. The bills they passed were to be presented to the protector for his consent; but if within twenty days it was not obtained, they were to have the force of laws by the authority of the parliament only. A standing army for England and Ireland was established, consisting of twenty thousand foot and ten thousand horse; and funds were established for their support. These were not to be diminished without the consent of the protector, and in this article alone he assumed a negative voice. During the intervals of parliament, the protector and council had the power of enacting laws, which were to be valid till the first meeting of the parliament. The chancellor, treasurer, admiral, chief governors of Ireland and Scotland, and the chief justices of both benches, were to be chosen with the approbation of parliament; and in the intervals with the approbation of the council, to be afterwards ratified by parliament. The protector was to enjoy his office during life; and on his death, the place was to be filled by the council. Such was the instrument of government enacted by the council of officers, and sworn to by Cromwell. Fifteen persons were named in the instrument, as the first council of state; these were all of them persons entirely devoted to the protector; and, at the same time, so very opposite in their opinions with regard to the principles of civil and religious liberty, that there was not the least danger of their uniting against the protector's power.

The government being thus settled, the following proclamation was published in the streets of London and Westminster. "Whereas the late parliament dissolved themselves, and resigned their powers and authority; the government of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland in a lord protector, and successive triennial parliaments, is now established. And whereas Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of all the forces of this commonwealth, is declared lord-protector of the said nations, and hath accepted thereof: we have therefore thought it necessary (as we hereby do) to make publication of the premises, and strictly to charge and command, all and every person or persons, of what quality or condition soever, in any of the said three nations to take notice hereof, and to conform and submit themselves to the government so established. And all sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. are required to publish this proclamation, to the end that none may have cause to pretend ignorance in this behalf."

The situation of Cromwell, notwithstanding the high office he had attained, was not to be envied. He was at once both hated and feared by all Europe; and on the latter was his seat of power established. Cardinal Mazarine began, when it was too late, to dread his ambition, which he had hitherto considered as nothing more than the wild fever of an enthusiastical brain; and which his civil policy, if ever he attained any, would render all his schemes and attempts abortive. Spain had been particularly cautious to afford neither assistance nor protection to the exiled royalists; and this had procured her the liberty of raising and transporting several battalions of Irish soldiers, who proved as fine troops as any in Europe. Perceiving that the princes of the Stuart family still resided in France, the Spanish ministry falsely imagined, that no government in England would enter into a treaty of peace with a power that protected the pretenders to the English crown. Hence they thought themselves secure of Cromwell's friendship, especially as the affairs of England were so much embarrassed, that some foreign alliance would not only be convenient but even necessary to his preservation. The two northern nations were still more confident of the importance of their friendship to any government that could be established in England. Both of them were at this time considerable maritime powers. The king of Denmark, ever since the rupture between England and the United Provinces, had been greatly cherished by the Dutch, and was in arrears to England for the cargoes of twenty-five ships that had been stopped in his harbours, and their lading confiscated to his own use. He concluded, however, that while he was closely united with the Dutch, it would be impossible for England to have any power in the Baltic, and that the states-general never would make a peace without concluding him in the treaty. The queen of Sweden was still fantastically fond of Cromwell's person and government; her romantic sentiments corresponded exactly with the actions of that extraordinary man; but she had a wise ministry, who endeavoured to take all advantages of his situation with regard to the Dutch and Danes, in order to acquire every possible emolument, with regard to commerce. They plainly perceived that as affairs were then situated, the friendship of Sweden was absolutely necessary to England; a truth of which both Cromwell, and the late republican parliament were sufficiently persuaded. The lord viscount Lisle had been sent by the republicans as their ambassador to the Swedish court; but Cromwell, either to remove Whitlock from the government, or from an opinion of his superior abilities, recalled Lisle and sent Whitlock in his room. He was charged to exert all his power to conclude an alliance offensive and defensive with that crown. The English court had sent but few ambassadors of late to foreign princes. Every court of Europe was, however, full of their residents, agents, or spies.

Overwhelmed with the expences of the war, terrified by their losses, and mortified by their defeats, the Dutch now pushed the negotiations for a peace with the utmost assiduity. It was known that the greatest obstacle to a pacification consisted not in any animosity conceived by the English against the Dutch, but in a desire of a close union and confederacy. Cromwell had formed the chimerical scheme of a coalition with the United Provinces; a total conjunction of government, privileges, interests and councils. It is no wonder that a scheme built on so delusive a foundation should appear absurd to the states-general: they were astonished that any man in his senses should entertain such romantic notions, and absolutely refused to enter into any negotiations on so impracticable a scheme of accommodation. At last, however, the peace was signed by Cromwell, and a defensive league made between the two republics.

A. D. 1654. Cromwell had no respect of persons, with regard to public justice; not even the intercession of monarchs was sufficient to divert the blow. Don Pantaleon Sa, brother of the Portuguese ambassador, and joined with him in the same commission, thinking himself affronted in the streets of London, repaired the next day to the Exchange; and seeing a merchant, whom he thought resembled the author of the injury, he immediately killed him, and took shelter in the house of his brother, who had connived at this base action. Cromwell paid no regard to his asylum; he sent a company of soldiers, who took Don Pantaleon from his brother's house, and committed mitted him to prison. He was soon after tried, and executed on Tower-hill, notwithstanding the opposition of the ambassador, who pleaded the privileges of his office. Foreign nations could not help applauding this vigorous exertion of justice, notwithstanding the laws of nations were violated in the person of the ambassador.

But with whatever firmness Cromwell proceeded in the government, and whatever awe his undaunted behaviour might have occasioned in the English, his usurpation excited a general discontent. The people, so jealous of their liberties, were exasperated at finding the chains forged for them much heavier than those they had broken. The protector saw that these complaints had affected even the army, and therefore thought it highly prudent to assemble a parliament, in order to establish his authority on the basis of law. They met on the third of September, and as the people were allowed an entire freedom in the election, it is no wonder that many members of principles very different from those of the protector, were returned from several parts of England. They were no sooner assembled, than they gave sufficient indications of their refractory spirit. Cromwell was soon alarmed, and ordered the house to attend him in the painted chamber. There he made an elaborate speech, delivered in his dark, perplexed manner. He began with observing, that the most shameful abuses had been introduced into civil and religious liberty by the levellers, anabaptists, and fifth-monarchy-men, whose principles tended to sap the foundation of all government, civil and religious. He pathetically enlarged on the miseries which had flowed from these absurd notions, during the late domestic and foreign wars; and enumerated the methods he had taken to cure these disorders in the state. He recommended to their care the settlement of the nation, and promised to join them in so important and necessary a work.

The protector was undoubtedly persuaded, that his power, and the success that had constantly attended him, would be abundantly sufficient to establish his government, and induce the assembly to add the legislative sanction to the power he had usurped. He was mistaken: many of the members insisted on the illegality of dissolving the long parliament; and some even proposed, that the present assembly should declare themselves the same parliament continued. They then entered on a discussion of the pretended instrument of government, and of that authority which Cromwell, under the title of protector, assumed over the nation. The greatest liberties were taken in arraigning this new dignity. Even the protector himself escaped not without censure. The utmost that could be done by the court party, was to protract the debate by arguments and long speeches, and prevent the decision of a question, which they were abundantly convinced would be carried against them by a great majority.

Surprized and enraged at this refractory spirit in the parliament, the protector commanded their attendance in the painted chamber, and inveighed in the most bitter terms against their conduct. He told them, and indeed very justly, that nothing could be more absurd than for them to dispute his authority, because the same instrument of government that had constituted them a parliament, had made him protector; and consequently, that the power of both must either stand or fall together: that some points of the new constitution were supposed to be fundamentals, and were not, on any account, to be altered or disputed: that among these were the government of the nation by one person and a parliament; their joint authority over the army and militia, the succession of new parliaments, and liberty of conscience; and that with regard to these particulars, there was reserved to him a negative voice, to which, in the other circumstances of government, he confessed himself no-wise entitled.

But unwilling to depend wholly upon the effect he imagined his speech had made on the members, he obliged them to sign a recognition of his authority, and an engagement not to propose or consent to any alteration of the government as it was settled in a single person and a parliament. Had he exacted this promise from all the members before he opened the session, it would have prevented him this trouble and mortification; for as many of the members did not attend him in the painted chamber, he was obliged to have recourse to the unconstitutional method of placing guards at the door of the house, with orders to suffer none to enter but those who had subscribed the protector's recognition. Many of them submitted to this arbitrary condition, but thought themselves still at liberty to pursue the same course in their proceedings: they retained the same refractory spirit they had discovered in their first debates. The instrument of government was examined, article by article, with the most scrupulous accuracy. The general approbation of the house was given those who advanced the freest topics; and during their whole transactions, they neither took any notice of the protector, nor sent him a single bill for his approbation.

A. D. 1655. Cromwell was highly disgusted at this behaviour; and being informed that many of the members had joined in a conspiracy with the discontented officers of the army, he determined to dissolve an assembly so dangerous to his power. According to the instrument of government, five months were allowed every parliament to sit before it could be dissolved; but Cromwell pretended that a month contained only twenty-eight days; and the full time, according to this method of reckoning, being elapsed, they were again ordered to attend the protector in the painted chamber, where, after a long and angry harangue, he dismissed the assembly.

If the nation was discontented before the meeting of this parliament, the abrupt dissolution of that assembly tended not to give them a better opinion of the government. The members returning to their respective counties and seats, propagated among the people that refractory and mutinous spirit, they had exerted in the house. The old republicans, with Sir Harry Vane at their head, who maintained the indissoluble authority of the long parliament, took every method in their power to encourage the murmurs of the people against the present usurpation, but at the same time were so cautious in the methods they pursued for this purpose, that the protector could find nothing sufficient to found a prosecution against them. Elated with this opposition to the protector's authority the royalists could be no longer retained in subjection. They were persuaded that every one who was dissatisfied with the present government, would join them in overthrowing an establishment they detested. They never considered that the old parliamentary party, however exasperated they might be at the protector's usurpation, they were still more prejudiced against the royal cause. They had only lost their power by the former: should the latter gain the ascendant, they would be obnoxious to the severest punishments, for their former behaviour.

This delusion proved fatal to many of the royal party. A conspiracy was formed in various parts of England, and a day for a general rising was appointed. In an undertaking so widely extended, it is almost impossible to keep the secret. Cromwell was informed of the design. Thurloe, his secretary, had spies in every quarter of the kingdom; and the protector's government was extremely vigilant. Many of the royalists were seized and thrown into prison. Others, as the day appointed approached, were seized with terror, and abandoned the project. In one place only the conspiracy broke out into action. Penruddock, Groves, Jones, and other gentlemen in the west, entered Salisbury with about two hundred horse, at the very time when the sheriff and judges were holding the assizes. These they made prisoners and proclaimed the king. But contrary to their expectations they they received no accession of force; the dread of Cromwell's power prevented the people from joining in an undertaking they wished might succeed;

Confounded at this disappointment, the men that had hitherto followed their standard, deserted by degrees, till a single troop of horse was sufficient to put an end to the insurrection. The leaders were most of them taken and put to death; and the rest sold for slaves, and transported to Barbadoes.

The bad success of this attempt of the royalists tended only to establish the power of the protector; the people were fearful of opposing a man, who was so constantly attended with success. Cromwell even regarded the insurrection itself as a fortunate event; because it demonstrated the reality of these conspiracies, which his enemies always represented as mere fictions, invented solely to varnish over his severities. It served another purpose; it enabled him to extort large sums from the royalists, under pretence of making them pay the expences incurred by their mutinous dispositions. He issued an edict for exacting the tenth penny on all their estates; and in order to collect an imposition at once so oppressive and iniquitous, he instituted ten major-generals, and divided the whole kingdom into so many military jurisdictions. These men, assisted by commissioners, were empowered to lay every person they pleased under the tax of decimation, to level all the imposts settled by the protector and his council, and to imprison any person whom they should suspect to be enemies to the government. Nor was there any appeal from their arbitrary judgment but to the protector himself in council. Despotism now appeared openly to preside over the English; the very mask of liberty was thrown aside. The people bewailed in secret the miseries of their country; they saw the iron rod of Eastern tyranny held by the person who had seized the seat of power.

While England was thus obliged to submit to the will of an illegal usurper, the royal family suffered the utmost distress at Paris. The queen had, indeed, a moderate pension assigned her; but it was so ill paid, and her credit so low in that capital, that she complained one morning to cardinal de Retz, that her daughter, the princess Henrietta, was obliged to be a-bed for want of a fire to warm her. Cromwell, desirous of humbling the pride and power of France, pretended to resent the protection which the royal family received in that kingdom, though surely such treatment deserved not his anger: it must have excited pity in an ingenuous breast. Cromwell, however, thought otherwise; and the merchants having complained that some of their ships had been stopped and searched by the French, he issued letters of reprisal; and Blake seized a whole fleet of merchant ships, loaded with provisions and stores for Dunkirk, then besieged by the Spaniards.

These hostile proceedings sufficiently alarmed the court of France; and in order to remove every cause of complaint, they treated Charles with such neglect, that he thought it prudent to withdraw, in order to prevent the indignity of being desired to leave the kingdom. He first retired to Spaw, and afterwards to Cologne, where he resided two years on a small pension paid him by the king of France, and a few subscriptions sent him by his friends in England. His chief friends and confidants were Sir Edward Hyde, created lord chancellor, and the marquis of Ormond. This pusillanimous behaviour in the court of France produced at last the desired effect, and the protector signed a peace with that kingdom.

The court of Spain had paid every submission to the English government, and even endeavoured to form an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the protector; but failing in the attempt, endeavours were used to make a breach between England and France. Cromwell was no stranger to these intrigues, but made no complaints to Cardenas, the Spanish minister. A powerful fleet was, however, fitted out, and all Europe were held in suspense with regard to its destination. The Spaniards seemed not the least alarmed; they never suspected that it was intended to attack their settlements in the New World. At last two strong squadrons sailed from England, one commanded by Penn, and the other by Blake. The former was destined to the West-Indies, the latter to act in the Mediterranean. And what is still more remarkable, Blake had orders to assist the Spaniards in Europe, and Penn to distress them in America.

Blake, on his arrival in the bay of Cadiz, undertook to serve the Spaniards against the duke of Guise, who then threatened to make a descent on Naples, and was fortunate enough to escape the English fleet. Blake now directed his course towards Africa, in order to demand satisfaction from the pyratral states of Barbary for the insults and depredations they had committed on the English. On his arrival at Trepiano, he detached several frigates to block up the Tunisine ships at Porto Farino. Terrified at the appearance of Blake, the Dey of Algiers desired to make a peace with the protector, and agreed to restrain his pyratral subjects from committing any farther violence on the English. But he was treated in a very different manner by the Dey of Tunis. On presenting himself before that port, and making the same demands, the Dey, pointing to the castles of Porto Farino and Goletto, dared him to do his worst. The courage of Blake needed not this bravado to rouse it into action: he laid the broadsides of his ships almost close to the castles, and soon tore them in pieces with his artillery. While this furious attack was carrying on, he sent a strong detachment of seamen in their long boats up the harbour, and burnt every ship that lay there. Terrified and astonished at an action hitherto considered as impossible, the Tunisines were convinced that they had acted very imprudently; they agreed to make the required satisfaction, and courted the friendship of a man whose valour had filled the African states with wonder and astonishment.

The expedition under Penn was less successful. The fleet consisted of thirty ships of war, and a great number of transports, on board of which were five thousand land forces, under the command of colonel Venables. They were joined by about five thousand more at Barbadoes and St. Christopher's. But the two commanders, though they both favoured monarchy, were of very different tempers. The troops were ill provided with arms, ammunition, and provisions: they were the refuse of the whole army, and those enlisted in the West-Indies the most profligate of mankind. Before the fleet and army sailed from St. Christopher's, a proclamation was published, by which it was declared, that neither the soldiers nor sailors were to have any share of the plunder; but, as an equivalent, to receive a fortnight's pay. Perhaps a more imprudent measure could not have been taken: the men were deprived of the only incentive to valour among such people.

On the twentieth of April, the fleet arrived at the island of Hispaniola; and it was determined by the admiral and general to attack St. Domingo, the capital, and indeed the only place of strength in the island; but this was over-ruled by the commissioners whom the protector had sent on board the fleet, to regulate its operations, and act as spies on the conduct of both commanders. This opposition of the commissioners proved the ruin of the expedition. A small part of the fleet was ordered to lie before the capital, to amuse the enemy, while the main body of the forces were landed at Bassado-bay, where the proclamation against plundering was again renewed. This threw such a damp upon the spirits of the soldiers, that all the courage and intrepidity of their officers could not remove. In the mean time, colonel Buller had landed about ten miles from St. Domingo, at the head of the troops that had been left on board the ships to amuse the enemy. It had been agreed, that that Buller should wait till he was joined by Venables, in order to attack a fort situated between them and the capital. But the enemy abandoning the fortrefs at the appearance of the English, Buller pursued his march towards St. Domingo, and encamped at some distance from a strong fort, which formed the principal defence of the place. While Buller continued in his camp, Venables was obliged, during four days, to pursue a very fatiguing and discouraging march of near forty miles through an unknown and desert country, where his men were every moment fainting with heat and thirst.

During this delay, the Spaniards recovered from their consternation; and having drawn together a considerable body of forces, lined the woods with strong ambuscades, by whom great numbers of the English were cut off in their march. Notwithstanding this, the English attacked them with such intrepidity, that they were driven from their fastnesses into the fort; and had not the English, through thirst and faintness, been obliged to defer the attack of the fort, both that and the town itself must have fallen that very night into their hands. Nor could they continue on the spot where Buller was encamped for want of water; but were obliged to march to the place where that commander landed, where they continued till the twenty-fifth of August, under inexpressible hardships. Captain Cox, their principal guide, was slain; their bread was mouldy and scarce; their provisions salt and rotten; their arms in very bad condition; one of their regiments gave evident signs of mutiny; no harmony subsisted between their two principal commanders; and a pestilential disease raged both in their fleet and camp. They, however, marched, on the twenty-sixth of April, to attack the fort. Captain Jackson, who commanded the van, led his men, either incautiously or treacherously, into a defile, lined on each side by the enemy's troops. The English had advanced so far before they perceived their danger, that they were exposed to the whole fire of the Spaniards, without being able to return it with any effect; and every man of them must have been cut off, had not colonel Haynes, at the head of a detachment of his regiment, pushed into the wood, and dislodged the enemy, by attacking them in flank. Haynes himself was killed, after displaying amazing efforts of valour, together with most of the officers, and five hundred soldiers. The diversion of Haynes enabled Venables to attack the enemy with advantage, and drive them into the fort. But the next morning it was found, that the only mortar-piece in the army was unfit for service, and without a bombardment there were no hopes of success. It was therefore determined to abandon the enterprize, and re-embark the forces.

In order to atone, if possible, for this miscarriage, it was proposed to make an attempt upon Jamaica, which surrendered to the English without making the least resistance. On their return, both the commanders were sent to the Tower; though they had made a conquest of much greater importance to their country than that of Hispaniola itself. The protector immediately issued orders for sending both men and money to his new conquest, and that island has ever since continued in the hands of the English.

The whole government being at this time vested in the hands of the protector, whose designation and authority were entirely unknown in the English constitution, such disputes happened every day in the courts at Westminster, concerning the foundation of his power, that they seemed to threaten to put a final stop to the course of justice itself: nor would the complicated affairs of government allow sufficient leisure for Cromwell to study a plan of civil government that might supply these defects. Conscious that his present power rested wholly on a military foundation, he determined to set up the military over the civil power: but before he could accomplish his design, his attention was diverted from domestic to foreign affairs.

A. D. 1656. The Spaniards were no sooner informed of the proceedings of Penin and Venables in the West-Indies, than they declared war against the protector; and seized all the goods and shipping belonging to the English merchants in the territories of Spain. The commerce with that kingdom, so advantageous to the nation, was entirely at an end, and near fifteen hundred merchantmen fell into the hands of the enemy. Blake received orders to begin hostilities against the Spaniards, and exert all his abilities to intercept their Plate fleet. But many of his officers, persuaded that the war carried on against Spain was unjust, and contrary to the principles of the law of nature, threw up their commissions, returned to their country, and lived retired.

This, however, did not dispirit Blake; he resolved to do his duty as an honest man. He cruized, for some time, off Cadiz, in expectation of falling in with the Plate fleet; but being at last distressed for want of water, he was obliged to sail towards Portugal, in order to procure a supply. Soon after his departure, captain Stayner, whom he had left on the Spanish coast with a squadron of seven ships, came in sight of the galleons, and crowded all the sail he could carry, in order to come up with them; but before this could be effected, the Spanish admiral ran his ship ashore, and was followed by two others. The rest were following the example, but were taken by the English, and valued at near two million of pieces of eight. The two galleons on shore were set on fire; and the marquis of Bajadox, viceroy of Peru, with his wife and daughter, perished in the flames.

This success added some share of popularity to Cromwell's government; and he took care to display all the advantages of this acquisition, by ordering the treasure taken in the galleons to be brought up from Portsmouth to London by land. Before this welcome supply arrived, Cromwell had been reduced to the utmost distress for want of money, and severely lashed in several pamphlets by some of the members of the long parliament. He had, indeed, laid excessive impositions on the royalists, and published several rigorous edicts for collecting the public taxes; but all these resources were not sufficient to defray the expences of government.

The next action that happened between the English and the Spaniards acquired much greater glory to the English arms, though far from being attended with such emoluments to the nation. Blake had not been long returned from the coast of Portugal, before he received advice that a Spanish fleet of sixteen ships, much richer than the former, had taken shelter in the bay of Santa Cruz, in one of the Canary islands. Blake immediately sailed thither, and soon found that his intelligence had not deceived him; but he perceived that every precaution had been taken to render any attempt upon the galleons abortive. Their smaller ships were moored close to the shore, under the numerous cannon of a strong castle, and seven smaller batteries well mounted with artillery, and a line of communication running between them all. Six large galleons lay near the entrance of the harbour, a strong boom being drawn across its mouth, fitted up like floating batteries, with their broadsides towards the English.

Blake surveyed these batteries with the closest attention, but was rather animated than daunted by the danger. He called a council of war, and it was unanimously determined to burn the Spanish galleons. Blake himself undertook the attack of the large ships and forts, while Stayner attempted to force his way into the harbour. Accordingly, as soon as the morning appeared, Stayner, in the Speaker frigate, stood into the bay with his squadron, while Blake attacked the forts and galleons. The dreadful scene that followed is easier imagined than described. The Spaniards themselves believed it to be the effect of fiends rather than of men, and thanked heaven they could lose no part of their honour in the action, as they were born to fight with men, and not with devils. Every circumstance tended to confirm them in that delusion. The thundering of Blake's cannon; the fury of his sailors, who rushed amidst the thickest of the enemy's fire, as if they had been invulnerable, and seemed to seek their safety in the mouth of danger; the shouts of the assailants, and the groans of the wounded, heard in the short intervals between the roaring of the artillery; and, at last, the flames of their own ships, bursting through the clouds of smoke, and lighting up the dreadful scene of death and ruin, convinced the Spaniards that all opposition was in vain; they thought it would be madness to oppose force and courage to a supernatural power. The fire from their forts abated; their troops were driven from their intrenchments; their harbour was in the possession of the English, and their ships totally abandoned; so that not one of them escaped the flames, except two which had been sunk in the action.

This battle astonished all Europe. It seemed beyond the power of a few ships to attack and silence a strong castle, numerous forts, and a large fleet, well furnished with men and artillery, and assisted by every requisite, either for offence or defence, that human prudence could devise. A greater danger still attended the English; the wind blew right into the bay; and their eagerness had carried them so near the shore, that their ships must have been destroyed, had not the wind, by suddenly shifting, removed all their fears, and carried them beyond the reach of danger. Though this action was remarkably severe, and though the English exposed themselves to the thickest of the enemy's fire, they had only forty-eight men killed, and one hundred and twenty wounded. The loss of the Spaniards, both in men and ships, was very great; and the latter, for some time, irreparable. A very considerable part of the rich lading of the galleons, being too bulky to be carried off, perished in the flames.

This was at once the greatest and last action of the intrepid Blake. His health had been, for some time, declining, and he now obtained permission to return; but he lived not to land in his native country. He died in his passage, and has always been considered as one of the greatest men this country has ever produced. Though a strict republican in principles, he always enjoyed the confidence of Cromwell. "We should fight for our country," said he, "into whatever hands the government may fall." The strongest proof of his merit is, that, in the midst of so many jarring, and even hostile factions, he was esteemed by them all.

If Cromwell was at once both loved and respected abroad, his administration was not less calculated to maintain his authority at home. A strict observer of justice and the laws, as far as his usurped authority would admit, he supported both with equal vigour. He had quelled a late insurrection of the royalists, but he refused, with indignation, the counsel of his officers to massacre all the insurgents. The army continued faithful to him, notwithstanding the dangerous enthusiasm that still prevailed among the officers and soldiers. The militia, kept up and exercised with care in the several counties, was always ready, on the first signal, to lend him very powerful assistance. As religion, or rather fanaticism directed the multitude, one of his principal cares was to manage the fiery presbyterians, by gaining over their adversaries, which he accomplished by means of a general toleration, from which none but papists and the partizans of episcopacy were excluded. Attentive to the smallest particular, he had spies in almost every place, where any intelligence was likely to be procured; it is said that these cost him sixty thousand pounds a year. He was apprehensive of nothing but assassination, against which neither prudence nor vigilance could avail. Colonel Titus, under the name of Allen, wrote a very spirited pamphlet, exhorting every one who wished well to his country, to embrace this method of vengeance, the only one in their power to put a period to the usurpation of a tyrant. This publication alarmed Cromwell: he knew that the minds of the royal party were sufficiently inflamed to put so obvious a method in practice. He therefore declared openly, that he looked upon all attempts of that kind as base and odious, and would never begin hostilities by so shameful an expedient; but if the first attempt came from them he would retaliate the injury by every method in his power; that he did not want agents sufficient to execute his purpose, and that he would employ them to the utter extinction of the royal family. This menace probably saved him from the dagger of the assassin.

A.D. 1657 Cromwell had always been desirous of giving the power he had usurped the sanction of a legal establishment, and now determined to make another attempt to effect it. He accordingly assembled a parliament composed of the representatives of the three kingdoms. Ireland and Scotland, reduced to a state of slavery, nominated such members as were conformable to his wishes. But the spirit of the English was not yet sufficiently subdued to submit to his arbitrary directions. He soon perceived that many of the dissatisfied members in the last parliament were again returned, and began to fear they would be too powerful for his friends. In order therefore to secure a majority, he excluded a hundred suspected members, and thus made himself master of the parliament. This being effected, every thing followed of course; for though there was still a strong opposition, the majority was on the side of the protector's friends. They began with abrogating all the titles of Charles Stuart and his family. This being effected it was moved that the protector should have the title of king; and after a very warm debate it was carried that a bill should be brought in for that purpose. It was urged that the English constitution necessarily supposed a royal authority; that the laws admitted not of a protector except during a minority, and had not fixed the prerogatives of the functions of that office; that to remove all appearance of arbitrary power, the only method was to have recourse to a title which the nation had always respected; and that this was the more practicable, as an express law of Henry VII. had provided for the security of those who defended the reigning prince; a sufficient proof that the legislation depended more on the form of government, than on the birthright of the supreme magistrate. The bill was violently opposed by Lambert, the major-generals, and all the republican party. But being unable to answer the above arguments, they had recourse to a very tumultuous behaviour, which sufficiently convinced Cromwell, that unless he could prevail with the officers of the army to join with the majority in parliament, he must renounce the honour he so ardently wished to obtain. No arts were left untried to bring Lambert over to his purpose, but in vain. Fleetwood and Desborough were also averse to his accepting the title of king; and declared, if the bill passed, and received the assent of the protector, they would immediately resign their commissions, though they would make no efforts to disturb the government.

The house, however, proceeded in their design; and at last, after a long and violent debate, it was voted, "That his highness will be pleased to assume the name, stile, title, dignity, and office of king of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the respective dominions thereunto belonging, and to exercise the same according to the laws of these nations." A committee was now appointed to reason with the protector, and, if possible, overcome those scruples, which he pretended he entertained against accepting so liberal an offer.

Cromwell strongly opposed all their reasons, which were urged with great strength and eloquence. But his opposition proceeded not from the reasonableness of his accepting the offer. He was well convinced of the solidity of their arguments; and his inclination, tion, as well as judgment, was entirely on the side of the committee. But the opposition of his friends, and that of the army, terrified him. He knew the office of king had been painted in such horrid colours, that there were no hopes of reconciling the soldiers to it suddenly, even though bestowed upon their general, to whom they were so remarkably devoted. He knew that the transition between coldness and aversion was very small; that they who had loved with the greatest affection, hated with the most deadly rancour; and it was impossible to foresee what disappointment and despair might occasion. Some already talked of dividing England into a new heptarchy, to be governed by the chief officers of the army. Even this strange design the republicans would rather have adopted, than agree to Cromwell's accepting of the royal dignity. He was also fearful, that when the question regarded only persons, not forms of government, no one would any longer balance between the ancient royal family and an ignoble person, who had waded to the throne through a torrent of blood. Suspended between these fears and his own ardent desires, Cromwell protracted the time, and seemed still to oppose the reasons of the committee, hoping that he might be able, by artifice, to reconcile the minds of the soldiers to his new dignity. His elocution was always confused; but now, when he reasoned in contradiction to his own judgment and inclination, it was involved in tenfold darkness; it was destitute both of reason and common sense.

At last, after an agony of perplexity, occasioned by a long and tedious series of doubts, the protector was obliged to refuse that crown which he so ardently wished to receive, and which the representatives of the nation had tendered him in the most solemn manner. Upon this refusal, the parliament found it necessary to retain the name of Commonwealth and Protector; but as the government had hitherto been a manifest usurpation, it was thought necessary to give it a parliamentary sanction.

In order to this, it was proper to set aside the instrument of government, which had been drawn up by the general officers only, and substitute another in its room. This was accordingly done, and a new instrument of government was framed, and offered to the protector by the parliament, under the title of "An humble petition and advice." This act of the legislature formed the basis of the republican government; by it the powers of each member of the constitution was regulated and limited, in order to place the liberty of the people on a more solid foundation. In some particulars, the authority of the protector was enlarged, and in others diminished, by this deed. He had the power of naming his successor; he had a perpetual revenue assigned him, a million a year for the fleet and the army, and three hundred thousand pounds for the civil government. He had the power of establishing another house of parliament, the members of which were to hold their seats during life, and to exercise many of the functions of the former house of peers. On the other hand, his power of framing laws with the consent of his council, during the recess of parliament, was abrogated; and it was established, that no member of either house should be excluded, but by the consent of that house of which he was a member. The other articles received very little alteration, remaining the same in substance as in the first instrument of government. This parliamentary sanction being obtained, Cromwell was again inaugurated, with the utmost pomp and ceremony, in Westminster-hall; and on the twenty-sixth of June, he put an end to the session of parliament.

The situation of the protector was now very critical in England. He had indeed obtained the disposal of a very large revenue, but great difficulties attended it. His acceptance of the office and title of protector, had not lessened them, and the force he had put upon the parliament by excluding so many of the members was universally condemned. Even those who were most desirous of a settlement, upon almost any terms, and would have been contented, for the sake of a permanent government, to have submitted to his authority, either as king or protector, entertained many scruples with regard to the legality of the proceedings of a parliament, which sat under a visible force. Cromwell found that these scruples were invincible; and his enemies having already felt his severity, he was now determined they should taste his clemency. Lambert was allowed a pension of four thousand pounds a year. Ludlow was suffered to reside in his own house, Sir Harry Vane was released from his confinement in Carisbrook-castle, and he determined to suffer the secluded members to take their seats the next session of parliament. In the mean time Cromwell applied himself closely to the formation of his upper house of parliament, which was to consist of sixty members, among whom were five or six ancient peers, and several gentlemen of fortune and distinction; the rest were officers of the army, who had risen from the dregs of the people. All the ancient peers, however, refused to accept a seat, which they must share with such companions as were assigned them.

A. D. 1658. On the twentieth of January the parliament met, pursuant to their prorogation, and the protector, in order to maintain the appearance of a legal magistrate, removed the guards from the doors of both houses. The first subject of deliberation among the commons was the illegality of excluding so many of their members during the last session of parliament. In this debate it was confidently affirmed, that there could be no free parliament under such a force, and therefore, that the humble petition and advice, together with all that had been done in consequence of it, were invalid; nor were they obliged to take any notice of the other house. Cromwell, by taking so many of his friends and adherents from the lower house, in order to form the upper, had lost the majority among the national representatives. The enemies of the protector were soon sensible of their power; they made and carried a motion not to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the other house which Cromwell had established.

While the commons were thus opposing the arbitrary proceedings of the government, a petition was preparing in the city for taking the power of the militia out of the protector's hands. Exasperated at these measures, Cromwell sent a very sharp message to the commons, acquainting them that he expected they would give the same appellation, and pay the same attention to the lords, as had been given or paid to any house of peers in England. But the commons, instigated by Lambert and Haslerigg within doors, and by Harrison and the fifth monarchy-men without, paid no regard to his threat, or his authority. Cromwell was now sufficiently exasperated, and without consulting any person, flung himself into a common coach, and with no more than four or five of his guards, and attended by his nephew and a lieutenant-colonel, hurried to the house of peers, where he whispered Fleetwood, that he was come to dissolve the parliament. Fleetwood, who seems to have acted in concert with the malecontents, used every argument in his power to dissuade Cromwell from his purpose. He desired him to reflect a moment on the dreadful consequences that had generally attended a hasty dissolution of the parliament. But Cromwell, without paying any attention to his arguments, laid his hand upon his breast, and swore by the living God they should not sit a moment longer. He accordingly sent a message to the commons commanding their attendance in the house of peers, where, after a very reproachful speech, he dissolved the parliament.

This precipitate action, which in any other person, would have been considered as an indication of madness, was in this extraordinary man, a measure at once both bold and necessary, and prompted by that genius which seldom or never forsook him. But notwithstanding withstanding all his power, his abilities, and the terror of his name, he was now surrounded with dangers both open and secret. The fifth monarchy-men had long been his avowed enemies. They pretended to abolish all taxes, customs, tythes, and every other burthen laid upon the people. They held their meetings at Mile-end, and though they were in general persons of the lowest condition, they were bold, bloody and desperate. They depended greatly upon major-general Harrison, admiral Lawton, and the colonels Rich, Danvers and Okey to head them. They had even their cabals and correspondents in every part of the kingdom. But Cromwell's intrepidity, and Thurloe's excellent intelligence, rendered all their schemes abortive; and about ten of the most desperate among them were seized in the midst of their consultations, together with the standard they intended to erect, as the signal of the commencement of the reign of the saints upon earth.

This well-timed action did not, however, put an end to their cabals. Cromwell perceived that the poison had reached much farther than he expected. Several of the officers of the army, and even some of them who served about his person, became sullen and gloomy; a sure indication that they were forming some dangerous design. The protector therefore assembled all the officers near London, among whom major Packer, and most of the captains of his own regiment were chiefly suspected. Cromwell repaired to the meeting, and in a very authoritative tone of voice, demanded whether they were willing to serve him against his enemies? Over-awed by the presence of their general, they continued silent for some time; at last they said, they were ready to serve him upon the footing of "the good old cause." Cromwell treated that expression with great contempt, and after asking what they meant by using it now, he immediately dismissed them from their posts in the army, and gave their commissions to others whom he knew he could trust. This instance of firmness and severity produced the desired effect; the rest of the officers promising to obey him with great alacrity.

The daring spirit of Cromwell only was capable of discharging men, who had been the principal instruments of his greatness. But it seems to have given him no disquiet. He was persuaded they could never join with the royalists, from whom alone he was apprehensive of danger: He did not indeed think it prudent to treat the chief officers, who were equally discontented, in so despotic a manner: he endeavoured to regain their favour by caresses; but was never able to remove the hatred they had conceived against the government. The wisest and richest of the royalists, lived upon their estates, pleased with observing the despotism which Cromwell had exercised over a parliament, who had treated them in so tyrannical a manner. They saw with delight the perpetual commotions of the public, from a persuasion that out of confusion order must at last arise. Their retirements, their studies, their reflections, tended happily to promote the good of their country. They had now sufficient leisure to reflect on the errors of the late king, and comparing them with the distractions of the government that succeeded. These they saw evidently were the extremes of legislation, and that in the mean between them true liberty was to be found.

The Spaniards, desirous of distressing the English government, had invited Charles to Bruges, where he appeared at the head of four thousand men, chiefly English, formed into four regiments. This revived the hopes of the royalists, and a general insurrection was projected. Ormond was secretly dispatched to England, in order to concert measures for the execution of this design. Lord Fairfax, Sir William Waller, and several more of the leaders of the presbyterian party had secretly entered into the engagement. The army was still infected with the general spirit of discontent; and, after the protector's violent breach with the late parliament, no hopes remained of founding his power on the basis of legislative authority. His administration, so expensive both in military enterprizes and secret intelligence, had exhausted his treasury, and involved him in a considerable debt. All his arts of policy were exhausted; and having so often deceived every party by proud and false pretences, he could no longer hope that the same arts would be attended with the same success.

But notwithstanding all these promising circumstances, the conspiracy of the royalists was rendered abortive. Cromwell was informed of their design before it was ripe for execution. The marquis of Ormond was obliged to fly to the continent; and great numbers of the royalists were thrown into prison. Sir Henry Slingsby, and Dr. Huet, were condemned and beheaded; and Mordant, brother to the earl of Peterborough, escaped the same fate merely by the accident of colonel Pride's being absent, till the sentence was pronounced in his favour. For the numbers were equal, and Pride, who was his declared enemy, entered the court just as the president had finished his determination.

Nor was the protector free from the fears of assassination; Sindercombe, one of the fifth monarchy-men, had undertaken to murder him, and it was only by the intervention of the most unaccountable accidents that he was prevented from executing his bloody purpose. His design was at last discovered; but though the clearest proof of his guilt was apparent to the jury, and though every man held the crime of which he was accused in the utmost detestation, it was not without the greatest difficulty they could be prevailed upon to find him guilty; so greatly were they dissatisfied with the protector's right of supreme government of the nation. This incident could not fail of giving Cromwell the utmost uneasiness; and which was greatly increased by the firmness of Sindercombe, who refused to discover any of his accomplices.

Mrs. Claypole, Cromwell's beloved daughter, a lady endued with every humane virtue, and the most amiable accomplishments, had entertained the highest regard for Dr. Huet, and made the most pressing instances to her father to save his life; but being refused his pardon, her temper, which was always enclined to melancholy, preyed upon her health; and after using the most pressing remonstrances to awaken the protector into a compunction for the heinous crimes into which his ambition had betrayed him, she paid the debt of nature amidst the tears of all who were friends to virtue. Her death greatly affected Cromwell. And her words now obtained their full force; they embittered the small remainder of his life. His old friend, the earl of Warwick died also about the same time, which greatly affected him, and he began to perceive, when it was too late, that the pursuits of ambition are not the pursuits of peace.

His composure and tranquillity of mind were now fled for ever. He saw that all his nearest and most beloved friends, Fleetwood, Desborough, Claypole, and Falconbridge, abhorred his principles; and he who had so lately the whole army at his call, could now hardly find five men in the whole nation to second his favourite designs. He was become a bankrupt both in his government and his private fortune; and notwithstanding all the mighty things he had done, he found himself no better than a splendid wretch surrounded with misfortunes, which the smallest grain of genuine virtue in his former career of glory, might either have prevented or removed. His dissimulation was at once so gross and odious, that had he now actually returned to the paths of virtue, not a man in England would have thought him sincere; even his professing it must only have tended to have increased the public detestation of his hypocrisy.

Amidst all these distresses of mind, he was seized, on the twenty-fourth of August, with a slow fever, which soon after changed into a tertian ague. No dangerous dangerous symptoms, however, appeared for some time, and he was even able to walk abroad during the intervals between the fits. But the fever, as well as the force of the paroxysm of the disease, increasing at every return, Cromwell himself began to be apprehensive that his end was approaching. His thoughts were now turned towards a future state, which had formerly been the constant subject of his contemplations; but which the continual wars and affairs of government, had for some time totally interrupted. Goodwin, one of his enthusiastic preachers, constantly attended him, and endeavoured to remove from his mind that dependency in which he was now involved. One day, when he was closely engaged in this pious conversation, Cromwell asked him, with great emotion, "whether it was possible for the elect to fall, or suffer a final reprobation?" "It is impossible," replied the preacher. "Then," cried Cromwell, with an air of satisfaction, "I am safe; for I am sure I was once in a state of grace."

Fully sensible of the dangerous condition of the protector, the physicians were continually intimating to those about him, and even often to himself, that they thought it highly prudent to settle the affairs of government. On the other hand, his chaplains, by their prayers, visions, and revelations, inspired him with such hopes, that he believed he was no longer in danger. "I shall not die of this distemper," said he one day to his physicians; "I am well assured of my recovery. My supplications have prevailed; I am promised it from the Lord." Those strange enthusiastic notions seem to have prevailed among all his friends. "The Lord," said Fleetwood, in a letter to Henry Cromwell, "will soon restore him; and bring him forth with more vigour, life and zeal." His highness has himself had very great discoveries from the Lord. He hath received assurances of his being restored, and of being farther serviceable in the great work he hath begun." Goodwin was so thoroughly convinced of his being in no danger of death, that he used the following expression in his prayer: "Lord we beg not for his recovery, for that thou hast already granted and assured us of, but for his speedy recovery." Even when the physicians absolutely despaired of his being able to support the next fit of his disease, Thurloe has the following expression in his dispatch to Henry Cromwell, "That which is some ground of hope is, that the Lord has, as on some former occasions, given to himself a particular assurance, that he shall yet live to serve him, and to carry on the great work he hath put into his hands."

At last the physicians were obliged to declare that all hopes were over. The council was now sufficiently alarmed; and a deputation was sent to know his pleasure with regard to a succession. But before they reached his apartment, he was speechless and almost insensible. They asked whether he did not intend that his eldest son Richard should succeed him; and a simple affirmation was, or seemed to be, extorted from him. He lived only a few minutes after, paying the debt of nature on the third of September, in the sixtieth year of his age, amidst a storm so dreadful all over Europe, that it seemed a general wreck of nature. This tempest happening at so critical a moment, gave occasion to many reflections both of his friends and enemies. The day on which he died was also much taken notice of, it being the anniversary of his most glorious successes at Dunbar and Worcester, which he always considered as the most fortunate events of his whole life.

The character of Cromwell has been often drawn both by his friends and enemies. The former seems dictated by panegyric, and the latter by invective. It must be owned, however, that both carry the strongest air of probability, because they are supported by striking circumstances in his conduct and fortune. "What, say his friends, can be more extraordinary, than that a person, of private birth and education, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body, which have sometimes, nor shining talents of mind, which have often raised men to the highest dignities, should have the courage to attempt, and the abilities to execute so extraordinary a design as the subverting one of the most ancient and best established monarchies in the world? That he should have the power and boldness to put his prince and master to an open and infamous death? Should banish that numerous and strongly allied family? Cover all these temerities under a seeming obedience to a parliament, in whose service he pretended to be retained? Trample too upon that parliament in their turn, and scornfully expel them as soon as they gave him ground for dissatisfaction? Erect in their place the dominion of the saints, and give reality to the most visionary idea, which the heated imagination of any fanatic was ever able to entertain? Suppress that monster in its infancy, and openly set up himself above all that ever attained the appellation of sovereign in England? Overcome first his enemies by arms, and afterwards all his friends by artifice? Served all parties patiently for a while, and command them victoriously at last? Over-run each corner of the three nations, and subdue with equal facility, both the riches of the south and the poverty of the north? Be feared and courted by all foreign princes, and adopted a brother to gods upon earth? Call together parliaments with a word of his pen; and scatter them again with the breath of his mouth? Reduce to subjection a warlike and discontented nation, by means of a mutinous army? Command a mutinous army, by means of seditious and factious officers? Be humbly and daily petitioned, that he would be pleased, at the rate of millions a year, to be hired as master of those who had hired him before to be their servant? Have the estates and lives of three nations as much at his disposal as was once the little inheritance of his father, and be as noble and liberal in the spending of them? And lastly (for there is no end of enumerating his glory) with one word bequeath all his power and splendor to his posterity? Die possessed of peace at home and triumph abroad? Be buried among kings, and with more than regal solemnity? And leave a name behind him not to be extinguished but with the whole world; which, as it was too little for his praise, so it might have stretched out to the extent of his immortal designs?"

On the other hand his enemies have placed the actions of this extraordinary man in the most odious point of light. "What, say they, can be more superlatively wicked than for a person to endeavour not only to exalt himself above, but to trample upon all his equals and superiors? To pretend freedom for all men, and under the cloak of that pretence, to make all men his servants? To take up arms against taxes amounting to scarce two hundred thousand pounds a year, and to lay himself upon the nation the enormous load of above two millions? To quarrel for the loss of three or four ears, and strike off three or four thousand heads? To fight against an imaginary suspicion of two thousand guards for the king to be fetched from no body knew where, and keep up for himself no less than forty thousand? To pretend the defence of parliaments, and violently to dissolve all, even those of his own calling, and almost of his own chusing? To undertake the reformation of religion, and on that pretence to strip to the skin, and then to expose it naked to the rage of every sect? To establish councils of rapine and courts of murder? To fight against the king under a commission for him? To take him out of the hands of those for whom he had conquered him? To deceive him by protestations and vows of fidelity and when he had effected his purpose, to put him to death, in the face of the world? To receive a commission from the king and parliament, and murder the one and destroy the other? To fight against monarchy, when he declared for it, and to declare against it, when he wished to acquire it in his own person? To defame perfidiously, and supplant ungratefully his own general, and afterwards most of those officers, who with the loss of their honour, had raised him to the summit of his unreasonable ambition? To break his faith equally with his enemies and with his friends? To make as frequent use of the most solemn perjuries, as the common people of customary oaths? To usurp three kingdoms without the least shadow of pretensions, and govern them as unjustly as they were acquired? To set himself up as an idol, and make the streets of London resemble the valley of Hinnom, by burning the bowels of men, as a sacrifice to himself? To endeavour to entail this usurpation upon posterity, and with it an endless war upon the nation? And lastly, by the severest judgment of the Almighty, to die hardened, mad, and without repentance, with the curses of the present, and the detestation of all succeeding ages?"

Such are the different characters given of Cromwell, and both are founded on facts and circumstances that cannot be controverted. But from the whole we may safely conclude, that he wanted nothing but honesty, to make him one of the greatest men in the world.

Cromwell was married to Elizabeth, daughter to Sir James Bouchier, by whom he had two sons, Richard who succeeded him, and Henry, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and four daughters, Bridget, married to general Fleetwood; Elizabeth, to John Claypole, of Northamptonshire, esq; Mary, to lord Falconbridge; and Frances, to lord Rich.

The powerful, the dreaded Cromwell being now no more, some sudden revolution in the state, which must destroy the present ill-constructed fabric of government, was immediately expected. But this was not the case. The council, the army, the navy, even the whole country at once, acknowledged Richard Cromwell protector of the commonwealth. He was a plain, indolent, good-natured young man, brought up in the country, at a distance from business and intrigue, and neither formed by inclination, injured by habit, nor assisted by talents sufficient to enable him to supply the place of his father. Henry Cromwell, who governed Ireland with great popularity and applause, insured to his brother the obedience of that kingdom. General Monk, whose authority was well established in Scotland, proclaimed the new protector in the principal towns of that kingdom. Addresses flowed from every part of the kingdom, and Richard was treated with the same respect as his father.

But this external complaisance among the fanatical leaders of the different parties, was nothing better than a deceitful calm which suited the views of all, as a breathing time for concerting plans to promote their own interests. No person could have been found more unexceptionable for this purpose than Richard. The republicans did not fear him, nor the royalists hate him; and his advancement was of the utmost consequence to those who were in the present possession of the government. But a question was soon started in the council, whether Richard, according to the tenor of the humble petition and advice, was to be considered as general of the army. This was striking at the very basis of all his power, and the secret cabals against him were indefatigable in forming plans for his ruin.

A.D. 1659. But as supplies were wanting for the affairs of government it was thought necessary to call a parliament. The upper house, or house of peers, consisted of the same persons who had been nominated by Oliver himself, and thence considered as friends to his family. And in order to insure a majority in the commons, it was thought necessary to restore to the old boroughs their former right of sending members to parliament; while the counties were allowed no more than their accustomed members. By this means the ministry procured a majority in the lower as well as in the upper house; and all the members signed, without hesitation, an engagement not to alter the present government.

On the first of February, secretary Thurloe presented to the commons, "An act of recognition of his highness's right and title to be protector and chief magistrate of the commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging." This act was very artfully drawn, the recognitory part being expressed in general terms, but it contained a very particular and ample abjuration of the royal family. A small debate only ensued on the first reading, but the republicans determined to oppose it with all their power when it came to be read a second time. They saw that it virtually contained a recognition of the petition and advice, which they were determined, if possible, to set aside, and consequently destroy the basis of the protector's government. Besides the republican and ministerial parties, there were two others in the house, who had views of their own, and though directly opposite to each other, agreed in one point, that of embarrassing both the others. The first was composed of men of desperate fortunes, and who wished to see Fleetwood commander in chief of the army, hoping that the government would once more fall into the hands of the military, and both king and protector be excluded. The ministerial party had, however, still a majority in the house. But the proceedings of this parliament afford a memorable instance, that a dead majority in an English house of commons, may carry their questions, and yet lose their purposes. The republicans were much bolder and far better speakers than their antagonists. In opposing this bill, they founded their arguments on the constitution settled immediately after the death of the late king, and Sir Harry Vane very pertinently observed, that if the government founded at that period was illegal, they were guilty of the blood of their late prince. The ministerial party, on the other hand, went no farther back than the instrument of petition and advice, which they contended to be the last, and only legal constitution of government. But even admitting that position, they found themselves embarrassed with another difficulty, that of proving that the privileges and authority granted by that instrument to the protector were not personal, and terminated with his life. Even if they did not, the republicans contended, that a free parliament ought to have no regard to the whole, or any part of that instrument, because it was voted by a power destructive of that constitution, which gave their assembly an existence as a parliament. Their arguments had great effect upon the people, especially as the answers given to them by the ministerial party were far from being thought sufficient.

Fleetwood, who had concealed his ambition under the veil of an obsequious behaviour to the new protector, could not help observing, that the army, by joining the republicans, might retrieve at once their power and popularity. But the greatest art was necessary to form this connection, as the protector's influence among the troops was very powerful. It was therefore contrived between him and Desborough, to introduce Lambert once more on the stage. That general ever since he had been deprived of his commission, had lived retired at Wimbledon in Surry; but he no sooner saw a prospect of regaining his former authority, than he resumed all his ambitious prospects. Many of the principal officers in the army thought he had been ungenerously treated by the late protector, and his sufferings had, in some measure, rendered him popular. Fleetwood therefore secretly made use of Lambert to strengthen the discontented party among the officers, while Desborough declared openly and violently for a republic. The meetings for carrying on their destructive schemes were held at Wallingford-house, where Fleetwood resided, and hence the assembly was called the cabal of Wallingford-house.

While the officers of the army were employed in these consultations, the debates in parliament were carried on with great vehemence by both parties. The republicans exerted all their power to have the militia and negative voice settled in the representatives of the people, while the ministerial party strenuously insisted on recognizing the protector. Many expedients were proposed for reconciling the two parties, but in vain; both continued firm to their principles. After the question had been debated for several days, with the utmost warmth and freedom, the ministerial party carried their point, by a majority of one hundred and ninety-one, against one hundred and sixty-eight. The republicans were not, however, discouraged. They procured the following resolution to be taken by the house, viz. "That before the bill of recognition be committed, this house doth declare such additional clause to be part of the bill, as may limit the power of the chief magistrate, and fully secure the right and privileges of parliament, and the liberties and rights of the people; and that neither this, nor any other previous vote, that is, or shall be passed, in order to this bill, shall be of force or binding to the people, till the whole bill is passed."

The carrying this resolution ruined the republicans: they fancied they were now a match for their opponents, and had recourse to methods that lessened their interest. They resumed the design of presenting a petition in favour of a republic, which was in great forwardness when Oliver Cromwell dissolved the parliament; and accordingly it was brought to the house a few days after, by a formidable body of citizens. Fleetwood's party had hitherto joined the republicans, in order to distress the government, being no friends to this petition, they joined the ministerial party; and it was voted by a great majority that no notice should be taken of it. The petitioners were told, that it was expected they should acquiesce quietly in whatever was done by the parliament.

By this time Fleetwood had so far reconciled the differences that subsisted between Lambert and Desborough, that it was resolved to present a remonstrance to the protector, on the present state of affairs. The instrument was accordingly presented under the title of "The humble representation and petition of the general council of officers of the armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland." Richard referred it immediately to the commons, who seemed not to regard it with the attention the officers expected. In this remonstrance the army complained "that large arrears of pay were due to the soldiers, by which they were reduced to necessity; that they who had borne the burden of the war, and undergone all the difficulties and dangers attending it, were now disregarded, divided and laid aside. That the good old cause was treated with contempt, and traduced by malignant and disaffected persons, who grew every day more insolent, because their numbers were every moment increasing, by the return of their friends from foreign parts, and had now several meetings in the city of London: that the names of all those who sat as judges upon the late king, had been printed and scattered in different parts of the kingdom, intimating that they were all consigned to destruction: that many suits were commenced at common law against honest men, for what they had transacted in the wars as soldiers: that those famous acts which had been performed by the long parliament, and the late protector, were censured, railed at, and vilified. By these means, they said, the good old cause, which they were resolved to support, was visibly declined. And therefore they besought his highness to represent their complaints to the parliament, and to require proper and speedy remedies."

The commons affected to treat this petition with great contempt. They imagined that while they continued united with the protector, their joint interest in the army would be abundantly sufficient to silence the factious officers; but the pusillanimity of Richard rendered all their hopes abortive. For some time they took no notice of the petition; but upon receiving repeated accounts that the officers continued their meetings, and that it had been proposed to separate the military from the civil power, the commons voted "that during the sitting of parliament, there shall be no general council or meeting of the officers of the army, without the direction, leave and authority of his highness the lord protector, and both houses of parliament. That no person shall have or continue any command or trust in any of the armies or navies of England, Scotland or Ireland, or any of the dominions and territories thereto belonging, who shall refuse to subscribe, that he will not disturb or interrupt the free meetings of parliament, of any of the members of either house, or their freedom in their debates or councils."

This resolution of the commons excited the resentment of the cabal at Wallingford-house, and they seemed determined to carry things to extremity. Lord Broghill, aware of the consequence, prevailed upon Richard to repair to one of their meetings, and command them to dissolve. Surprized at this unexpected exertion of power in Richard, they immediately withdrew, but did not dissolve. Fleetwood and Desborough were now sufficiently alarmed; and upbraided lord Broghill with his conduct in the house of peers, and even threatened him with an impeachment. This threat did not in the least intimidate Broghill; he threatened to move the house to know who had consented to the calling of a council of war, without the knowledge and consent of parliament. His speech was so well received by the house, that the officers despaired of carrying any thing in parliament, and renewed their secret consultations.

Their designs were, however, known to those officers who were attached to the protector; and they offered, if Richard would promise to support them, to answer with their heads for the success; and to bring before him Fleetwood, Desborough, Vane, and other leaders of the opposition, dead or alive. Howard, who was one of Oliver's distinguished favourites, was among the foremost to push Richard to take this vigorous resolution, which might have been easily effected. But he declined the offer, and chose rather to pursue peaceable than violent measures. Nor did he possess any of those arts which were necessary to gain the love of an enthusiastic army. Some disgust being taken at the promotions he had made, he answered, "Would you have me prefer none but the godly? Here is Dick Ingoldsbey, who can neither pray nor preach, yet I will trust him before you all." The pretended saints were highly offended at this imprudent speech, and vowed the protector's destruction.

The council of officers assembled, repaired to the protector in a tumultuous manner, and demanded the dissolution of the parliament. Richard wanted fortitude to deny, nor had he indeed the ability to resist. The parliament was dissolved, and by the same act the protector was effectually dethroned. A few days after, he signed his dismissal in form. His brother Henry, governor of Ireland, a man of much better parts, but not greater ambition, resigned his power at the same time. Such was the fate of Cromwell's family! That edifice of grandeur, erected at the expence of so much guilt and labour, disappeared in a moment. Richard retired into the country, where he possessed a small estate, and where he remained unmolested: his peaceable disposition defended him against the malignancy of every party. After the restoration of monarchy, Richard travelled for some years. The prince of Conti, governor of Languedoc, saw him at Prezenaz, without knowing him. They were speaking of English affairs, and the prince highly extolled the courage and talents of Oliver Cromwell. "But the poor, weak Richard," added he, "what is become of him? How could he be so great a blockhead as not to profit more by the crimes and fortunes of his father?" The poor, weak Richard, however, lived happy in a middle station, to a good old age: and surely a man of common sense would hardly hesitate which state to chuse, his calm condition, or his father's harassed and hated fortunes. He died about the latter end of queen Anne's reign.

The military council being thus possessed of the supreme command, applied themselves to the establishment of some form of government; and, after many deliberations, it was determined to recall the long parliament, which had dethroned Charles, and was afterwards dismissed, with disgrace, by Oliver Cromwell. That assembly, it was asserted, could only be dissolved by their own consent; and though violence had interrupted, it could not destroy their rights to government. This parliament now consisted of no more than forty members, who, with their old speaker Lenthall at their head, proceeded immediately to business. The officers were persuaded that this parliament would govern wholly by their directions, and act in subordination to the general council of the army. They were mistaken; their first votes sufficiently shewed that they were resolved to exert themselves the supreme authority. They were, however, held in the highest contempt, both by the royalists and presbyterians, and stiled the Rump, by way of reproach. A secret reconciliation therefore took place between the rival parties; and it was agreed, that, laying aside former enmities, every effort should be used for the overthrow of the Rump parliament. The presbyterians, notwithstanding their religious prejudices, repented of that violent zeal by which they had been hurried away. They saw, that by carrying the love of liberty too far, they were brought into slavery; and were now as desirous as others to restore that crown to the royal family, which they had snatched from it, without increasing their own happiness. The nobility and gentry concurred in the same design; and a general conspiracy was formed in the nation, the success of which seemed infallible, had not Sir Richard Willis betrayed the common interest before the design was ripe for execution. The republican parliament was no sooner informed of the design, than they ordered Lambert to prevent its execution. He was remarkably active in obeying their commands, and the gaols were soon filled with prisoners of birth and fortune.

But this success proved the ruin of the parliament. The officers, at the instigation of Lambert, presented a petition concerning wounded soldiers, and the widows of those who had perished in the service. They also complained that they themselves were greatly neglected, notwithstanding the services they had done their country; and desired that Fleetwood should be made commander in chief, Lambert major-general, Desborough lieutenant-general of the horse, and Monk major-general of the foot. They likewise pressed for the punishment of those who had been concerned in the late insurrection; and that no officer should be dismissed from his employment but by the sentence of a court-martial.

Alarmed at these proceedings, the republicans determined to make one bold attempt in support of their power: they voted that Lambert, Desborough, Berry, Clarke, Barrow, Kelsey, and Corbet, should be cashiered; that Fleetwood's commission should be vacated, and the command of the army vested in seven persons, viz. Fleetwood, Ludlow, Monk, Haslerigg, Walton, Morley, and Overton, with powers to dispose of the forces in such a manner, that they might preserve the peace of the commonwealth, and the safety of the parliament. They also declared it high-treason to levy any money without consent of parliament. Sir Arthur Haslerigg moved, that Lambert should be impeached, but his motion was not seconded.

It was now evident, that either the power of the parliament or army must fall; and it required no great degree of penetration to foretel which would obtain the victory. Lambert led a party of his soldiers into the streets of Westminster, leading to the parliament-house; and when the speaker came in his coach, they very civilly turned his horses; and conducted him back to his home. The other members were intercepted in the same manner, and the Rump parliament dissolved with as much ease by Lambert, as it had been before by Cromwell.

The dissolution of the parliament destroyed all government in England; and there was now a necessity of settling a new one, though it was not easy to determine of what species it should be. The consequence of this unsettled state was an universal anarchy over all England: both the magistrates and officers of the revenue refused to act; and the soldiers were under a necessity of returning to their former occupations, or procuring themselves subsistence by their swords. In this distressful situation, the eyes of the whole kingdom were directed to Monk, who, it was now foreseen, must be the arbiter of the fate of England.

That general, at first attached to the royal party, afterwards employed by Cromwell, and appointed governor of Scotland, had now, by his politeness, his integrity, and other virtues, obtained the love of the soldiers, and the confidence of the people. Whether he meant only to oppose the views of the ambitious Lambert, or secretly meditated the restoration of the king, is not known; but he declared in favour of the parliament against those who had dismissed it. His prudence, however, kept his intentions an impenetrable secret; but deeper designs, either in the king's favour or his own, were, from the beginning, suspected to be the motive of his actions.

In the mean time, the council of officers, in order to preserve some appearance of government, elected a committee of twenty-three persons, of whom seven were officers. These they pretended to invest with the supreme authority, and called them a committee of safety. They promised to summon a free parliament, but took no steps to carry it into execution. On the contrary, they made some progress towards assembling a military parliament, composed wholly of officers, elected from every regiment in the service. Nothing but a dreadful prospect of ruin and slavery presented itself to the people. They were sufficiently convinced that the divisions or union of these sanctified robbers tended equally to extirpate from the British dominions all private morality, as well as civil law and justice.

The late suppression of the conspiracy seemed to have put a final period to all the hopes and expectations of Charles. Destitute of resources from his friends, he sought to interest foreign powers in his favour. He repaired to Fontarabia, where Mazarine was carrying on the negotiations for a peace with Spain. The cardinal even refused to see him; and Don Louis de Haro, the Spanish ambassador, shewed him barely common civilities. This was not a time, from a mere motive of generosity, to arm a powerful monarch in the cause of a prince who had been unfortunate. The treaty of the Pyrannees was concluded without the least mention of Charles. But fortune is always capricious; Charles passed, soon after, from this abject state, to the possession of a throne.

Desirous of discovering the real sentiments of Monk, whose designs were still impenetrable, Charles sent Dr. Monk, that general's brother, to solicit his services. The general asked him if he had trusted any person with the secret of his commission. "No body," replied the doctor, "but Brice your chaplain, in whom I know you confide." Brice was worthy of the highest confidence; and a zealous loyalist. But Monk thought proper to break off the conversation, and dismissed his brother, without discovering his intentions; persuaded, that in an affair of such importance, a secret intrusted to a third person is no longer a secret.

His conduct in every other particular was directed by the same prudence and reserve. Corbet, who had been sent by the committee of safety, under pretence of communicating their resolutions to Monk; but in reality to debauch his army, was put under arrest; and all the officers who seemed inclined to favour Lambert and his party were cashiered.

It was no sooner known that the governor of Scotland had declared for the parliament, than many of the English followed the example. Whole regiments revolted. Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Walton and Morley, seized Portsmouth for the parliament. These circumstances served only to increase the public distractions, and confirm the anarchy in which the whole kingdom was involved. Fleetwood, the general, a man equally weak and enthusiastic, sought those resources in prayer, which his poverty of genius could not afford him. He would frequently fall on his knees in the midst of a council of war; and when he was exhorted to vigorous measures, he answered, that the Lord had spit in his face, and would no longer hear him. He became jealous of Lambert; he could not trust either Haslerigg or Vane; and would willingly have joined Monk, had not Ludlow, Whitlock, and others of great parts and experience, prevented him; by laying before him the danger that might attend so precipitate a step. They observed, that the unaccountable manner in which Monk had left Scotland, as well as his subsequent conduct, strongly indicated that his real intention was to re-establish monarchy. In this hour of dreadful perplexity, Lambert offered to march against Monk, and put the whole to the decision of a general engagement; and could Lambert have been trusted, Monk might possibly have been defeated. But the republican party, who formed the majority of the committee of safety, chose rather to be subdued by Monk than saved by Lambert. Under the specious pretence, therefore, of an accommodation, they procured letters from the city of London, the officers of the navy and army in England and Ireland, persuading Monk to join with the committee of safety in their endeavours to restore at once the parliament and the peace of the kingdom. Monk was pleased with these invitations: he knew that a negotiation, however short, must be the ruin of Lambert, who was destitute of money for the payment of his forces. Clerges was accordingly dispatched to Monk with proposals from the committee of safety. Monk, to gain time, agreed to send three of his colonels, Wilks, Cloberry, and Knight, to treat of an accommodation. The two latter employed this opportunity in forming connections with the royalists, particularly with Redman, one of the ablest officers in the army; and by that means secured the Irish regiments, who had received orders to serve under Lambert against Monk. Wilks, therefore, was chiefly intrusted with the negotiation. A treaty was soon concluded, but Monk refused to ratify it, declaring his officers had exceeded their commission. He desired, however, to enter into a new negotiation at Newcastle; and the committee readily accepted his fallacious offer.

While Monk amused the committee of safety with the hopes of an agreement, these military sovereigns were surrounded with distress. Anarchy prevailed in every part of the nation; and the people having refused the payment of all taxes, there was no money to pay the soldiers. Lambert had lost his time and his credit, both with the committee of safety and his own soldiers. Whitlock saw their danger, and proposed to Fleetwood two expedients; either to draw together all his forces, take possession of the Tower, and join with the city of London in their declaration for a free parliament; or to restore the king upon the best terms he could procure. Fleetwood would willingly have embraced the latter, but he was weak enough, even after he had given his consent, to be dissuaded from it by Sir Harry Vane, Desborough and Berry, all of them implacable enemies to the royal family.

These different cabals placed the settlement of government, which was considered as an indispensable preliminary to whatever resolution should be taken, at a greater distance than ever. Vane had employed all his abilities in a noble scheme for reforming the practice of the law; and was so earnest in the cause, that he insisted on its being adopted in the new plan of government. He was obstinately opposed in this design by Whitlock, St. John, and all the lawyers whom they consulted. For Vane, Lambert, and other leaders of the independents, proposed a coalition with the papists, and hence they considered a general liberty of conscience as an indispensable preliminary to the new settlement. All the presbyterian clergy violently opposed this comprehension, and thus all the deep schemes of Vane were rendered abortive. These debates were carried on with so much acrimony and personal invective, were so generally known, and so generally condemned, that the committee of safety found it absolutely necessary to release the imprisoned royalists, to screen them from the fury of the people. This did not; however, prevent fresh plots and fresh insurrections of the royalists from breaking out almost every night in the city. They were, indeed, generally discovered and quelled by the army, before they arrived at any alarming height; but they sufficiently shewed that the people seemed determined to free themselves from the yoke of a military committee, whom they detested. Colonel Hewson, who, from the profession of a cobbler, had risen to a high rank in the army, was very active in this service, and had more than once entered London at the head of his regiment. In one of these expeditions, he fired upon and killed several of the city apprentices, who had assembled in a tumultuous manner, and declared for a free parliament. The magistrates of London were not, however, intimidated; they established a separate government, and assumed the supreme authority within the city. Admiral Lawson brought his fleet up the river, and declared for a free parliament. Haslerigg and Morley, informed of this important event, left Portsmouth, and advanced towards London. The regiments near the capital, being solicited by their old officers who had been cashiered by the committee of safety, revolted to the parliament. Desborough's regiment, being sent by Lambert to support his friends, no sooner reached St. Alban's, than they declared for the same assembly.

These events, the dissensions among the members of the cabal at Wallingford-house, and particularly the want of money, threw such a damp upon Lambert's army, that from being far superior, in all respects, to that of Monk, it was dwindled into a mere handful of men, when a resolution was taken to restore the parliament.

A.D. 1660: Lenthall, the speaker, being invited by the officers, again assumed his former authority, and summoned the parliament, which met on the sixth of January. The authority of Fleetwood was now so entirely lost, that not a single company or troop would obey his orders. His hand was too weak to support this ill-founded fabric of government, which was now every where falling into ruins. Lenthall, on this occasion, acted as general of the army; and both officers and soldiers were so submissive to his orders, that he discharged Fleetwood's lieutenant of the Tower, and put Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper in his room. He also ordered a general rendezvous of all the troops in and about London to be held in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, where they gave him all the military honours due to a general.

The first act of the parliament was to repeal the bill against the payment of excise and customs. They appointed commissioners for assigning quarters to the army; and, without taking the least notice of Lambert himself, they sent orders to his troops to repair immediately to the quarters assigned them. This had the desired effect. His soldiers obeyed the orders of the parliament, and he was left without more than an hundred horse about him. He himself was soon after seized, and sent prisoner to the Tower. Sir Harry Vane, and the other members who had concurred with the committee of safety, were confined to their own houses; and the officers who had joined in subduing the parliament, were cashiered, and ordered into a like confinement. By these exertions of authority, the power of the parliament seemed built on a firmer foundation than ever.

The restoration of the Rump parliament did not, however, satisfy Monk, who still kept his army on the borders of England. Lord Fairfax had taken arms, and declared for a free parliament. This was going a step farther than Monk had yet proposed, notwithstanding he had made all the necessary dispositions for marching to the capital before contrary orders should be sent from the parliament. Though the reasons he gave for this march were very plausible, yet it tended to confirm the suspicions of the public, that he really intended to restore the king. He left major-general Morgan to command the troops necessary to preserve the peace of Scotland; and was received with open arms by lord Fairfax and his friends, who had actually taken possession of York for the use of a free parliament. The Rump parliament was now held in greater detestation than ever: and the general received, as he advanced to the southward, continual accounts of some fresh declaration or association of the counties for a free parliament.

Alarmed at these declarations, and desirous of keeping the power they had obtained, the parliament made some attempts to bring about a reconciliation between themselves and the cabal of Wallingford-house. They passed a vote, "That all officers who were in commission on the eleventh of October 1659, and all other officers and soldiers in the late defection and rebellion, who have already submitted, or may hereafter submit themselves, and return to their duty and obedience to the parliament, shall be pardoned, and indemnified for life and estate." Lambert was comprehended in this resolution; and both he, and all his officers, among whom was colonel Hewson, who had been so active against the city of London, made their submissions; but were ordered to be confined in their own houses.

The next business of the parliament was to pass a vote to justify Monk's marching into England. They also voted, that one thousand pounds a year should be settled on him; and that Scot and Robinson should be sent to compliment him on his arrival. These emissaries were soon convinced, from the universal wishes of the people for a free parliament, that the present assembly could not long subsist. Their discoveries occasioned great uneasiness to the heads of the faction.

Monk's army did not amount to more than six thousand men; but this force was sufficient to destroy a faction divided against itself; and the city of London was so confident of his declaring for a free parliament, that they sent a committee of the council to congratulate him on his approach to the capital. On his arrival at St. Albans, he was informed that near nine thousand soldiers were then in London, disposed in different regiments; but that most of their officers were confined by the parliament. He therefore imagined there would be no great difficulty in removing these troops; and accordingly wrote a very pressing letter to the house, that room might be made for his regiments. Had the members of parliament been united among themselves, or dared to trust the experienced officers that served under them, they would not, probably, have submitted to Monk's request; but their power was so precarious by their divisions, that they made no difficulty of complying, and orders were given for their own regiments to retire. Four of them, however, scrupled to obey: a mutiny ensued; and it was with the utmost difficulty they were prevented, either from joining with the royalists in the city, or marching out against the army of Monk. This mutiny being considered as a fresh insult upon their authority, the parliament pressed Monk to hasten his march, and he accordingly entered London on the fourth of February.

Two days after the general was introduced to the house, and thanks were given him by Lenthall, for the eminent services he had done his country. Monk who was a prudent, though not an elegant speaker answered with great modesty. He told the house; that the services he had performed merited not such encomiums, he had done no more than his duty: that among many persons of greater worth who bore their commission, he had been employed as the instrument of Providence for effecting their restoration; but he considered their service only as a step to more important ones, which it was their part to render to the nation: that as he marched along he observed all ranks of men, in all places, to be in earnest expectations of a settlement after the violent convulsions to which they had been exposed; and to have no prospect of such a blessing but from the dissolution of the present parliament, and the summoning a new one, free and full, who, meeting without oaths or engagements, might finally give contentment to the nation: that applications had been made to him for that purpose; but that he, sensible of his duty, had always told the petitioners, that the parliament itself, which was now free, and would soon be full, was the best judge of all those measures, and that the whole community ought to acquiesce in their determination: that though he expressed himself in this manner to the people, he must now freely inform the house, that the fewer engagements were exacted, the more comprehensive their plan would prove, and the more satisfaction it would give to the nation: and that it was sufficient for the public security, if the fanatical party and the royalists were excluded: since the principles of these factions were destructive either of government or of liberty.

The parliament were now convinced that some measures must be pursued in order to settle the tranquillity of the nation. It was indeed impossible that things could continue any length of time in their present situation. Every thing tended to bring on a crisis, which must be decisive. The people paid so very little regard to the orders of the parliament, that a small part only of the revenues could be collected. The common council of London absolutely refused to pay any obedience to their commands, and openly declared they would pay no assessment till it should be imposed by a free and lawful parliament, and then they should think it their duty to submit.

Determined to make at least one effort for supporting their power, the parliament sent orders to Monk to march immediately into the city and seize twelve of the magistrates whom they supposed to have been the cause of this alarming resolution, to remove the posts and chains from all the streets, and to demolish both the portcullises and gates of the city. Monk, to the astonishment of all men, obeyed the order. He apprehended many of the obnoxious persons and sent them to the tower: and notwithstanding the interposition of his friends, the remonstrances of his officers, and the cries of the people, he broke down the gates and portcullises of the city, and returned to his lodgings at Westminster in triumph.

A moment's reflection convinced him he had gone too far. Instead of supporting that cautious ambiguity he had hitherto maintained, his late conduct had sufficiently indicated that he had joined the parliamentary party, and that his design was to subject the whole nation to the arbitrary decisions of that contemptible assembly. These considerations determined him to alter his conduct, and to recover the good opinion of the citizens, which he seemed to have forfeited by his late precipitate conduct. He could not bear the thought of being considered as the minister of violence and usurpation. He repaired to the house and complained in the bitterest terms of the odious service he had been obliged to execute in obedience to their orders. But this was only part of the plan he had formed for retrieving his character. He wrote a letter to the parliament, in which he reproached them in the severest terms of tyranny and oppression; of their forming new cabals with Lambert and Vane; and of giving encouragement to a fanatical petition presented by Barebone. He concluded with requiring them, in the name of the citizens, soldiers, and people, to issue writs immediately for filling up their house, and to fix the time for their own dissolution, that a new and free parliament might be assembled.

Monk waited not for an answer to this letter: he marched immediately into the city, at the head of his army, and ordered Allen, the lord-mayor, to summon a common-council to meet at Guildhall. As soon as the citizens were assembled, he repaired thither, and assured them that he was extremely sorry for the indignity he had so lately put upon the city, in complying with the orders of the parliament, and was now come to make them all the reparation in his power. He declared that he would always persevere in the measures he had adopted; and wished a firm union might be established between the city and army for their mutual defence, and for promoting the happiness and settlement of the kingdom.

It is impossible to express the applause and exultation with which this speech of the general was received. The news of this happy event was soon spread through the whole city, and excited the most extravagant demonstrations of joy. Every individual promised himself that the dreadful scenes of horror and confusion were over, and those of happiness and tranquillity would soon succeed. Even the rage of party was forgotten; the royalists and the presbyterians joined in the common joy. The populace, who in the gratification of their passions regard neither honour nor decency, roasted rumps at every bonfire, and where these could not be procured, pieces of flesh cut into the same shape were used as substitutes; in order, as the people expressed it, to celebrate by those symbols of hatred and derision, the funeral of the rump parliament.

The dispirited parliament exerted all their power to reconcile themselves to Monk and his officers; but he refused to trust them. He formed, in conjunction with his new friends in the city, a well-regulated militia, which were intrusted to men whose fidelity could be relied on; and the most proper measures were pursued for settling the nation. Several persons, equally desperate from guilt and fanaticism, offered to invest him with the dignity of supreme magistrate, and to support his government; but he rejected their offers with contempt.

A declaration of the general's desire that the secluded members should resume their seats being published, they repaired in such numbers to the house, that they soon became the majority. Upon which most of the independent members retired. They immediately repealed all the votes that had been passed for their exclusion; released the royalists from their confinement, and restored them to their estates; renewed and enlarged the general's commission; and fixed an assent necessary for the support of the fleet and army. These votes being passed, they ordered writs to be issued for the immediate assembling a new, full, and free parliament, and then dissolved themselves. These proceedings gave the highest satisfaction. The long parliament had for some time been the general object of detestation, and their dissolution occasioned a general joy throughout the kingdom.

A new council of state was chosen and obtained the approbation of the people, as it consisted of men of dignity, moderation, and virtue. Their credit was so well established, that the city of London immediately advanced them sixty thousand pounds for the use of the army. Though every person of the least penetration perceived that the restoration of the king must be the consequence of a free parliament, yet no declaration of that kind had hitherto been made; the general's intentions were still impenetrable. But in the private meetings of the royalists, a question was started with regard to the concessions that ought to be made by the king; and the treaty entered into with his late majesty during his residence in the Isle of Wight was proposed as a proper basis for the negotiation. This question would certainly have been carried could the persons have agreed with regard to the limitations; but that was far from being the case; and Monk still continuing to declare only for a free parliament, none had the courage to offer any thing upon that head to the public. The limitations were, therefore, neglected, and several writers have been very severe upon the memory of Monk, and other leaders of the royalists, on account of that omission. But when we consider the constitution of the English monarchy, the little regard paid by either party to concessions, when it is in their power to revoke them, the difficulties attending such limitations, the salutary authority of parliament when virtuous, its pernicious power when corrupted, and that it was in the breast of the members to bind the prerogative even after the king was restored, we shall perhaps be inclined to think that these clamours have no foundation. The wife and the virtuous part of the nation were placed between the two extremes of frenzy; that of fanaticism, which disclaimed even the shadow of monarchy, on one hand, and that of loyalty, which adopted all the absurdities of government, on the other. No terms could be invented rigorous enough to please the former, nor any mild enough to content the latter. And thus the design of the restoration, by an obstinate persistence in limitations, might have miscarried.

Unmoved by all the offers of faction, Monk pursued the plan he had formed with equal prudence and firmness. Among the friends of that prudent general, was Mr. Morrice, a gentleman of Devonshire, remarkable for a sedentary, studious disposition, and a sound judgment. With this friend only Monk deliberated concerning the great enterprize he had formed, and hitherto conducted with so much success. Sir John Granville, who was sent with a commission from the king to Monk, applied to Morrice, in order to obtain access to the general. He was desired to communicate his business to Morrice; but Granville refused every importunity, refusing to communicate his business to any one whatever, but the general himself in person. Monk was now convinced that Granville might be trusted, and therefore not only admitted him to his presence, but also communicated to him his whole design. But he still refused to commit any thing to writing: he only charged Granville with a verbal message, assuring his majesty of his services, and exhorting him immediately to quit the Spanish territories, and retire into Holland. Charles fortunately took his advice: had he staid a few hours longer he had certainly been detained under pretence of honour and respect, by the Spaniards, who would not have released him till the English had agreed to deliver up Jamaica.

The English in general were now so well cured of their jealousy against the prerogatives of the crown, that the new parliament was entirely composed of members devoted to it. The rage of the republicans, however, grew more violent, and Lambert, having found means to escape out of the tower, soon collected troops. No time was to be lost to reduce this active general. Colonel Ingoldsby was accordingly dispatched after him and overtook him at Daventry, where he had only assembled four troops of horse, one of which immediately deserted from him. Another quickly followed the example, and he himself, endeavouring to escape, was seized by Ingoldsby, to whom he made submissions not suitable to his former character and valour.

When the parliament met, they chose Sir Harbottle Grimstone their speaker, and the members chiefly exerted themselves in bewailing the late troubles, and in expressing their hatred of the memory of Cromwell. In the midst of these speeches Monk acquainted the house, that Granville was at the door with dispatches from the prince. The whole house was in an extasy of joy. Granville was introduced. He presented a letter and a declaration from Charles. The declaration was well calculated to support the satisfaction inspired by the prospect of a public settlement. It offered a general amnesty to all persons whatever, and that without any exceptions, but such as should afterwards be made by parliament. It promised a liberty of conscience, and a concurrence in any act of parliament, which, upon mature deliberation, should be offered for securing that indulgence. It submitted the inquiry into all grants, purchases, and alienations, to the arbitration of that assembly; and it assured the soldiers that their arrears should be paid, and that they should, for the future, receive the same pay they had hitherto enjoyed. Every one was satisfied. The concessions of the late king had limited the prerogatives too much, to give the real friends of liberty any uneasiness.

The two houses (for the peers had resumed their seats without opposition) assisted in proclaiming the king by the title of Charles II. A present of fifty thousand pounds was conferred on the king, ten thousand on the duke of York, and five thousand on the duke of Gloucester. And so universal a joy appeared throughout the nation, that the king said, it was surely his own fault that he had not sooner taken possession of the throne, since he found every body so zealous for promoting his restoration.

Monk repaired to Dover to receive the prince, whom he had the glory of placing on the throne. No revolution was ever more rapid, more advantageous, or less violent. So many evils, occasioned by civil contentions, had taught the people, that a legal government was the only support of the liberty and happiness of the subject.

The king was proclaimed on the seventh of May, and the intermediate time between that and the twenty-ninth, the day appointed for his entering London, was spent in preparing every thing for his reception. Magnificent beds, linen, chairs, robes, yachts, &c. were voted to his majesty. Every precaution was taken to prevent any farther waste of the lands, either of the king or royalists; and great care was exerted in securing the persons of the regicides, and the most criminal persons during the late government.

The public rejoicings were boundless, after the king was invited by the two houses of parliament to resume the regal function. The peers who were deputed to receive him were the earls of Oxford, Warwick, and Middlesex; the lord viscount Hereford, the lord Berkley of Berkley-castle, and the lord Brook.

The king, on his disembarking at Dover, embraced the general in the most cordial manner, and, perhaps, never subject deserved better of his king and country. Charles made his public entry into London on his birth-day, being the twenty-ninth of May; where he was received with such demonstrations of joy, and such display of magnificence, as shewed that the whole nation partook of the general satisfaction.

It will be proper to stop here for a moment, to survey the period we have finished. We have seen fanaticism lighting the flames that involved the state. That epidemical scourge visited the three kingdoms. England in particular was over-run with infatuated sectaries, determined to support their absurdities without law or controul. The republicans were so much the more terrible, as their religious principles enjoined a severity of manners too refined for human nature. Perhaps nothing contributed more to their triumph over the royalists, whom they called cavaliers, the greater part of them being men of pleasure, either in consequence of their birth and fortunes, or because, from a dislike of the fanatics, they fell into the contrary extreme of immorality. A parliamentarian saying one day to a royalist, "Your friends, the cavaliers, are very dissolute:" "Yes," (replied the other) they have the infirmities of men; but your friends, the round-heads, have the vices of devils, tyranny, rebellion, and spiritual pride." The latter carried their severities so far, that they prohibited every kind of diversion.

Among the great variety of sectaries, the Quakers stand eminently distinguished. Their founder was George Fox, a shoemaker's apprentice: but though enthusiasts in the highest degree, they made no figure in the general commotions, because their principles forbade the use of arms. They thought the practice of civility a worldly refinement unworthy of christianity. They addressed themselves to every body by the monosyllables thee and thou; and gave no title but that of Friend, even to people of rank and fortune. Their dress was similar to their manners: they rejected all superfluities, not excepting plaits to their clothes, and buttons to their sleeves and hats, which they thought unnecessary. Their religious system consisted in following the letter of the gospel: they thought an oath blasphemy, even when taken in a court of justice. They allowed no sacraments, no church ceremonies, no churches, no priests. Every one affected inspiration, and made strange efforts to receive the Holy Spirit; and, from these trembling convulsions, they acquired the name of Quakers. These enthusiasts would sometimes rush into churches, disturb the service, and insult the ministers. They were sentenced to be whipped and pilloried; but in this they triumphed, and their obstinate patience appeared supernatural to the people. Some of them undertook to fast forty days, in imitation of the Saviour of the world, and actually perished in the attempt. All made a point of offering their cheek to them that would smite them, and never to return an injury. The consequence was, that by carrying their religious duties to the most extravagant height, they exposed their virtues to ridicule. Strange surely it is, that the gospel, calculated to inspire every social virtue, should have afforded so many pretences to folly and frenzy, to break the sacred bonds of society! But such is the weakness of the human mind; while men affect to quit the path marked out by the Author of reason, they wander through wildness and obscurity, till they lose themselves and their way together.

The different follies of these fanatical sects contributed greatly to multiply deists, men of rash and superficial minds, who attributing to religion the excesses of fanaticism, fall into the contrary extreme of incredulity. Cromwell called them heathens; but when in their company, laughed with them at the fanatics.

Under the commonwealth, the taxes amounted, one year with another, to more than two millions: the late king's revenues amounted to less than half that sum. In 1650, commissioners of excise and customs were appointed; but in 1657, Cromwell settled them according to the ancient usage, and eleven hundred thousand pounds a year were offered for them. They were of less value under the regulation of commissioners. The protector, notwithstanding all his vigilance and œconomy, left two millions of debts. The commonwealth, in 1652, had more than fifty thousand men in arms, whose ordinary pay was a shilling a day for the foot, and two shillings for the horse. It is not, therefore, surprising, that the army opposed the re-establishment of the civil government, because it must totally supersede so lucrative an employment. The parliamentary forces at the battle of Worcester, including the militia, amounted to eighty thousand men. The commerce of England had been greatly advanced under Charles I. before the civil wars. The East-India and Guinea trades were very advantageous. The annual return was seven hundred thousand pounds, and twenty thousand pieces of cloth were sent yearly into Turkey. The commonwealth restored this source of wealth, which had been lost in the civil wars. One of the chief things that made commerce flourish, was, that the principles of a democratical government had had weakened the prejudices of vanity. People of fashion put their children apprentices to merchants, and that useful profession became honourable. In 1650, the interest of money was reduced to six per cent. Before the reign of Elizabeth, it had been at fourteen. This shews a great increase of specie, and a better system of policy. The colony of New-England increased by means of the puritans, who fled thither in order to free themselves from the constraint which Laud and the church-party had imposed upon them; and before the commencement of the civil wars, it was supposed to contain twenty-five thousand souls. For a similar reason the catholics, afterwards, who found themselves exposed to many hardships, and dreaded still worse treatment, went over to America in great numbers, and settled the colony of Maryland.

Learning, before the civil wars broke out, began to flourish in England. Shakespeare will ever be ranked in the first class of our English poets. His beauties are his own, and, in the strictest sense, original. The faults found in him are chiefly, those of the age in which he lived, his transcribers, and his editors. He not only excelled in copying nature, but his imagination carried him beyond it. He had all the creative powers of fancy to form new characters, and was more an original genius than any other writer. Like other great poets, he has had the felicity of having his faults admired for the sake of his beauties. He died in 1616.

Ben Johnson, poet-laureat to James I. and Charles I. was one of the greatest dramatic writers of his age. He was familiarly acquainted with the best ancient authors, from whom he has borrowed freely; and was the first that brought critical learning into repute. He was as defective in tragedy as he was excellent in comedy, and that excellence is confined to a few of his works. In Shakespeare we see the force of genius; in Johnson, the power of industry. He is frequently deficient in the harmony, and sometimes in the measure of his verses. What appears to be facility in his compositions, is generally the effect of uncommon labour. He died in 1637.

Edmund Waller, sometimes stiled the English Tibullus, excelled all his predecessors in harmonious versification. His love verses have all the tenderness and politeness of the Roman poet; and his panegyric on Cromwell has ever been esteemed a masterpiece of its kind. His vein is never redundant; we frequently wish he had said more, but never that he had said less. His personal qualities were as amiable as his poetical, and he was equally formed to please the witty and the fair. He not only enjoyed all his faculties, but retained much of his youthful vivacity at eighty years of age. He died in 1687.

The great Milton flourished also in this age. His Paradise Lost, though defective in its plan, though stiffened with foreign idioms, technical terms, and uncouth expressions, exhibits such a stupendous force of genius, as amazes, confounds, and transports the reader; and it is with justice considered as equal to the first epic poem of antiquity. What is most astonishing is, that the author wrote it under the united oppressions of misfortune, blindness, poverty, and contempt. Nor is it much less surprising, that this sublime poem should remain for many years unknown in a bookseller's shop.

At the head of the philosophers who flourished during this period, is justly placed Sir Francis Bacon, lord Verulam, one of the greatest geniuses the world ever saw. If we consider the just and extensive views of this prodigious man, the infinite number of his objects, the nervousness of his style, his sublime imagination, and his rigorous exactness, we shall, perhaps, esteem him one of the greatest and most eloquent of philosophers. This penetrating genius discovered the emptiness of the visionary systems of philosophy, which had, for many ages, amused mankind, and taught the world, that the only method of discovering truth was by experiment. He had the glory of being the first adventurer in the new world of science, and of discovering such mines of knowledge as will never be exhausted.

Thomas Hobbs acquired a reputation for writings equally unphilosophical and irreligious. He despised learning; and said, if he had read as much as other men of letters, he should have been as ignorant. Man, according to Hobbs, is naturally wicked; a principle which certainly does him very little honour. He is also reproached with favouring arbitrary power. He died in 1679.

William Harvey, M.D. acquired immortal honour for his discovery of the circulation of the blood. He enjoyed the happiness, in his life-time, to find the clamours of ignorance, envy and prejudice, against his doctrine, totally silenced, and his discovery universally established. He died in 1657.

The polite arts flourished in England during the reign of Charles I. especially painting and sculpture. He was the patron of Rubens, Vandyke, Inigo Jones, and other eminent artists; so that, had it not been for the civil wars, he would probably have converted his court into a second Athens; and the collections he made for that purpose, considering the difficulties under which he laboured, were amazing. His favourite, the duke of Buckingham, imitated him in that respect, and laid out the amazing sum of four hundred thousand pounds upon his cabinet of paintings and curiosities. The earl of Arundel was, however, the great Mæcenas of that age; and, by the immense acquisition he made of antiquities, especially his famous marble inscriptions, he may stand on a footing, with regard to the encouragement and utility of literature, with the greatest of the Medicean princes. But during the civil wars, and the government of Cromwell, the polite arts were totally eclipsed, though, it is said, the protector himself was not an enemy to learning.

From the Restoration of Charles II. to the Revolution.

C H A R L E S II.

A.D. 1660. THE universal joy that spread over the nation at the restoration of the king, seemed to promise a happy reign both with regard to the king and his people. The ancient order and discipline, both in church and state, were restored with the monarchy, and a round of magnificence and pleasures succeeded the gloomy ferocity which had so long taken possession of the minds of the English people. Charles introduced the spirit of gallantry into a palace yet stained with the blood of his father. The independents were hardly heard of, and the puritans retired from the fear of government. The manners of the English underwent so total a change, that the late civil war became a subject of ridicule: the austere and gloomy sectarists, who had filled the kingdom with their enthusiastic notions, were now the subjects of raillery to the gay licentious courtiers.

Charles II. was about thirty years of age, nursed in the school of adversity, acquainted with men and courts, a man of genius, acute, sensible, good natured, polite, never out of temper, and perfectly unaffected; but immoderately addicted to pleasure. It is easy to judge of the wisdom of a prince from the choice of those he honours with favour or his confidence. The council was at first composed of respectable persons, chosen indifferently from among the presbyterians and the royalists. Monk, created duke of Albemarle, proved that Charles was not tainted with that vice of courts, ingratitude. Sir Edward Hyde, created earl of Clarendon, and appointed lord chancellor and prime minister, had few equals either in virtue or knowledge.

The duke of York, the king's brother, was of a vindictive temper, active, and violent, and so confirmed a bigot to the popish religion, that he thought nothing too much, to promote its establishment. He therefore laboured to extend the prerogative, that he might be able at last to establish an arbitrary government. This, joined with the indolence of the king, enabled the duke to extend the schemes he had formed, and which gave rise to all the troubles and animosities that distracted the close of this reign.

The two houses of parliament having met without a summons from the king, they were at first distinguished by the title of convention; nor did they assume the name of the parliament, till Charles had passed an act for that purpose.

The first object that engaged their attention was the amnesty, which had been promised by the king before he landed in England. The upper house, animated partly by repentment and partly by zeal, were for excluding many persons from the benefit of this act of oblivion. But Charles desired them to remember the sacred promise he had made, and to which he thought himself in some measure indebted for his good fortune. He therefore recommended clemency to them in the most pressing manner; an instance of the tenderness of his disposition, and which gained him universal applause. This interposition had the desired effect, and only the regicides, and the furious republicans, Lambert and Vane, were excluded. Some others were indeed rendered incapable of the benefit of this act, in case of their accepting public employments, and some were rendered incapable of holding them. It would have been difficult to shew greater moderation, where there were so many criminals.

The act of amnesty being settled, the two houses took into consideration the royal revenue, and it was settled at twelve hundred thousand pounds a year; a sum greatly superior to that of any former king. But it must be remembered, that the expences of the crown were prodigiously increased, after the courts of Europe had adopted the example of Lewis XIV. in keeping up large standing armies. The maintenance of the navy, with some other articles, which formerly amounted to no more than eighty thousand pounds per annum, now required at least eight hundred thousand. It is not easy to imagine what advantage could be proposed by so great an augmentation of the forces. The people were more heavily taxed, and the prince not at all the more powerful. A handful of men formerly did what an hundred thousand were employed to do at present.

The people had been long so highly exasperated against the regicides, that their trial occasioned a general joy. But they firmly defended the cause for which they suffered: the terrors of death lost all their force. Harrison told his judges, that the pretended crime of which he was accused, far from loading him with guilt, was an act enjoined by heaven, that in his doubts he had implored the Lord with tears, to enlighten him, and that he had received incontestible assurances of his will; that human judgments were but darkness in comparison of divine illumination; that being determined not to injure the lowest man in the world for the greatest advantage in it, he was satisfied he had acted from a good conscience; that neither ambition nor fear had ever extorted from him the smallest token of approbation in behalf of the tyranny of Cromwell; that he had always been found firm in his principles of religion and integrity; and that this was not the character of a murderer and a villain. All the rest, who were ten in number, that were executed, shewed the same firmness and courage to the last. They considered themselves as martyrs to what they styled the cause of religion. The great lenity of the king respited the rest, and they were retained in different prisons. Lambert was sent to the island of Guernsey. The bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and Pride, were taken up and suspended during a whole day at Tyburn, and then cut down and buried under the gallows.

When the king passed the act of amnesty, he also gave the royal assent to an act for a perpetual thanksgiving on the twenty-ninth of May, the day of his arrival in England. In the mean time the parliament applied themselves to the necessary work of disbanding the army. It would have been an act of the highest imprudence to keep together a body of men so formidable by their numbers and valour, and so accustomed to outrage and violence. An assessment of seventy thousand pounds a month was therefore imposed imposed, in order to enable his majesty to disband these forces.

The rejoicings for the happy restoration of the royal family, were hardly over before the duke of Gloucester paid the debt of nature, in the twenty-first year of his age. He was a young prince of many amiable qualities. His judgment was clear, his perception quick, his ideas extensive. He was warmly attached both to the religion and constitution of his country, so that his death was considered as a loss of the utmost importance to the nation. The king was never so deeply affected by any incident in his life.

In the month of October the princess of Orange came over to England to complement her brother on his restoration; the queen-mother arrived the month following, bringing with her the princess Henrietta, her youngest daughter, who, by the king her brother's consent, was married to the duke of Orleans. The princess of Orange had not been more than two months in England, before she was seized with the small-pox, and died on the twenty-fourth of December, leaving only one son, William prince of Orange, who was afterwards king of England.

When Charles came to disband the army he was struck with their martial discipline, and would have been glad to have detained them; but Clarendon soon convinced him that it could not be done with any safety to the nation. Only five thousand men, and a few garrisons, were retained.

On the twenty-ninth of December, the king, after returning the parliament thanks for their assiduous attention to settle the nation, dissolved them. If we may credit some authors, the king had it in his power to raise two millions annually on the landed interest, exclusive of the excise and customs: a sum more than sufficient to have rendered the crown independent. The same authors add, that a member of the house of commons having proposed it to him, he rejected it by the advice of his chancellor. "Your majesty's best revenue," said Clarendon, like an honest subject, "is the hearts of your people." While you have those you will never want money." If such an offer ever was made, we may safely conclude it was not by the consent of the house; for though they gave largely to his majesty, yet it was done with such precautions as sufficiently shewed they had the rights of parliament at heart; and were determined to defend the liberties of the people.

The parliament had taken no care to settle episcopacy; it was considered as a kind of appendage to monarchy, and not having been established by any legal power it was restored without violence by the legal authority of the king only. In an affair so delicate and so odious to the presbyterians, Charles, from the very first, shewed himself extremely moderate, and determined not to infringe that liberty of conscience, which he had so solemnly promised. The episcopal jurisdiction was to be limited. Such parts of the liturgy as gave offence to the opposite party were to be expunged; and every man left wholly at liberty to pursue his own principles. But an insurrection of the Millenarians or fifth monarchy-men obliged the minister to recede a little from these benevolent principles. About fifty or sixty of these wretches, headed by one Venner, a cooper, broke out into open hostility, and proclaimed king Jesus. They declared that the personal reign of Christ upon earth was just going to commence; that they were called by God to reform the world and to make all earthly powers subservient to king Jesus; and in order to accomplish this pious work, they were never to sheathe the sword till all the carnal powers of the world became a hissing and a curse; and in the frenzy of their zeal, they declared, that one of them was alone sufficient to subdue ten thousand of their adversaries; and had very confidently planned, after having led captivity captive in England, to march into France, Spain, Germany, and other parts of the world, to prosecute in those countries their holy design. They were, however, soon subdued; but so strong was the force of enthusiasm, that they maintained with their last breath, at the place of execution, that if they were in an error, it was the Lord that was to blame.

Clarendon imputed all the troubles England had suffered during the civil wars to the factious spirit of the presbyterians, and was therefore determined to take every opportunity of weakening them, that they might not be any longer capable of raising discontents and insurrections in the nation.

The affairs of Scotland were settled with less difficulty than those of England. They had so severely felt the consequence of their joining the English parliament, that they were determined not to follow such imprudent methods for the future. The people had also discovered, that their former resistance had proceeded more from the turbulence of the aristocracy, and the bigotry of their ecclesiastics, than from any fixed passion for civil liberty. The lords of articles were restored, with some important branches of the prerogative; and the royal authority, fortified with more plausible claims and pretences, was re-established in its full extent. The ecclesiastical affairs required more consideration; but it was at last determined to restore prelacy; and Sharpe, who had been commissioned by the presbyterians in Scotland, to manage their interests with the king, was persuaded to abandon that party; and as a reward for his compliance, was created archbishop of St. Andrews. The covenant, once revered as divine, was dissolved. The Scottish parliament testified the greatest difference for the pleasure of the monarch; but the people still retained the leven of discontent, which might one day occasion the worst effects. Charles would gladly have united the presbyterians with the natural church; and for that purpose procured a conference to be held in the Savoy between twelve bishops and an equal number of presbyterian divines; but as each party came absolutely determined to give no point up, the conference came to nothing.

A.D. 1661. The interests of the royalists was now so powerful in the different counties and boroughs of England, that it was found at the meeting of the parliament, which assembled on the sixth of May, that there were only fifty-six presbyterians in the lower house, a number much too small to prevent the commons from distinguishing their zeal for the church and crown. They voted every attempt to dethrone the king to be high treason; that to accuse him of heresy or popery, or to asperse him by libels; should be punished with an exclusion from all employments; that the power of the sword belonged to him; and that it was unlawful for a man to defend himself against him. The covenant, and other republican acts were condemned to be burnt. Though the hierarchy was already restored to their spiritual authority, they were still excluded from parliament by the law which the late king had passed immediately before the commencement of the civil wars. The greatest violence had been used both against the king and the house of peers at the passing of this bill; and on that account alone the partizans of the church were provided with a very plausible pretence for repealing it. It met with no great opposition except from the few presbyterian members, and it was observed that Charles expressed great satisfaction when he gave it the royal assent.

These acts being passed the assembly was adjourned to the twentieth of November, when both houses again applied themselves to repair all the breaches that had been made by the fury of faction and civil war. It was now thought proper to relinquish, in the most solemn manner, the violent pretensions of that parliament, and to acknowledge that neither one nor both houses, independent of the king, were possessed of any military or legislative authority. An act was passed for empowering the king to appoint commissioners for regulating all the corporations in the kingdom; and expelling from thence such magistrates as had either obtruded themselves by violence or professed principles dangerous to the constitution, civil and ecclesiastical. It was also enacted, that all magistrates should renounce the obligation of the covenant, and declare their belief, that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatever, to take up arms against the king, and of their abhorrence of the traitorous position of taking arms by the king's authority, against his person and government.

A. D. 1662. These bills paved the way for the act of uniformity, which now came to be debated in the house. By this bill it was enacted, that every minister, who had not received episcopal orders, should now receive them; that he should declare his approbation, without reserve, of the book of the common-prayer; that he should take the oaths of canonical obedience; and that he should abjure the covenant, and renounce its principles of taking arms, by any pretence whatever against the king.

This bill was a thunder-bolt to the presbyterians. Confounded with other nonconformists, and even with papists, they had the mortification of finding themselves exposed to penalties, after having seen their sect predominant during the commonwealth. The church of England was put upon its ancient footing; and the penal laws were revived. Liberty of conscience, so expressly promised by the sovereign, was annihilated. Experience shewed the dangers of these violent measures. They were attributed to the catholics, who were desirous either of sharing the benefit of toleration with the presbyterians, or that they should share with them the rigours of persecution.

But however desirous the commons might be of restoring the prerogative of the crown, they did not exert the same activity, where any demand was made by the crown for the pecuniary assistance. In the mean time the king's debts were become intolerable, and the commons saw at last the necessity of voting him an extraordinary supply of one million, two hundred thousand pounds, to be levied by eighteen months assessment. They also voted an additional imposition of two shillings on each hearth, and settled the tax on the king during life.

Before Charles put an end to the session, the court was employed in making preparations for the reception of the new queen, Catherine of Portugal, to whom the king was betrothed, and who was just landed at Portsmouth. The marriage ceremony was performed with great pomp on the twenty-first of May; but the princess, had neither the graces of person or humour, to make herself agreeable to the king. She had a portion of three hundred thousand pounds, together with two fortresses, Tangier on the coast of Africa, and Bombay in the East-Indies.

Lambert and Vane were still in prison: they had not been concerned in the death of Charles I. but their professed hatred to the crown having occasioned them to be excepted from the amnesty, the royalists demanded that they should be brought to justice. They were accordingly tried, with great solemnity, before all the judges of the kingdom. The impeachment of Vane turned wholly on his conduct since the death of the king, in quality of counsellor of state, and secretary of the marine department. He alledged, in his defence, the necessity of obeying the established government, however illegal that establishment might be. "If that obedience be criminal," said he, "after the government is changed by force, every subject in the kingdom may be liable to punishment. The usurpers will punish some for their fidelity to the deposed prince, and the prince will punish others for their submission to the usurpers. To prevent these disasters, and to defend the life and liberty of the subject, an act of Henry VII. declares, that no person shall be held criminal for obeying the reigning prince. It does not belong to individuals to discuss the titles of those who govern. Besides, as the most respectable people were divided between the king and the commonwealth, ought a man to be condemned for following the party to which he was bound by the covenant, an obligation then sacred and indispensable?" Those arguments were not, however, sufficient to efface the remembrance of Vane's seditious conduct. The judges kept to the letter of the law; and though naturally of a timid disposition, he died with all the fortitude of a fanatic. Vane had been noted, in all civil transactions, for temper, insinuation, address, and a profound judgment; in all religious, for folly and extravagance. He was a perfect enthusiast; and fancying that he was certainly favoured with inspiration, he deemed himself, to speak the language of the times, a "man above ordinances;" and by reason of his perfection, to be unlimited and unrestrained by any rules which govern inferior mortals. These whimsies mingling with pride, had so corrupted his excellent understanding, that he sometimes thought himself the person deputed to reign on earth for a thousand years over the whole congregation of the faithful. Vane had been a principal leader in the trial of Strafford, and he was the last victim to these sanguinary quarrels. Lambert was condemned at the same time, but reprieved at the bar. He lived above thirty years after, happier, possibly, in his exile, than he had ever been in the thorny path of fortune.

The act of uniformity produced a kind of ecclesiastical revolution. It was called the St. Bartholomew act, because it was to take place on the twenty-fourth of August, the feast of that apostle. Though it bore no resemblance to the St. Bartholomew's day in France, it shewed the invincible obstinacy of the enthusiasts. In one day, and by a concerted resolution, above two thousand presbyterian ministers resigned their livings, because they would not conform to the articles of the act. The church of England now triumphed over her persecutors. The presbyterians, in the time of their exultation, had left her at least one fifth of the livings; but they now refused the same indulgence, though it was solicited by the peers. They were even, some time after, prohibited from coming within five miles of those places where they had exercised their ministry, except on journeys, under pain of six months imprisonment, and paying a penalty of five pounds. This was cutting off their very livelihood; nor were these rigorous proceedings by any means agreeable to the king. Though strongly suspected of indifference for all religions, he was secretly inclined to popery, which he had, probably, embraced before his restoration. He was strongly solicited by his brother James to grant a general toleration; and the misfortunes of the presbyterians afforded a very plausible pretence. Charles embraced the opportunity: he proclaimed an indulgence to those scrupulous consciences that were afraid of conforming to the established worship; and as the parliament was now prorogued, he gave his royal word, that at the approaching session, he would endeavour to procure a confirmation of that indulgence.

A prince without economy is at all times exposed to the most cruel necessity. The principal faults of Charles II. were an excessive love of pleasure, and prodigality in the gratification of his darling passion. Prudence and good policy were therefore very necessary; but these were not in the catalogue of Charles's virtues. The parliamentary supplies, together with the portion of his new queen, were all squandered away; nor had he yet paid the portion of his sister Henrietta to the duke of Orleans. Urged by necessity, he had recourse to a measure which exposed him to the severest censure, and is still regarded as one of the greatest blemishes of his reign. He offered the French ministry to deliver up Dunkirk, on their paying a valuable consideration. Clarendon and Southampton, though virtuous ministers, were concerned in this transaction; though there is the greatest probability to think, that the expedient was first proposed by Charles himself. The resolution being taken, a negotiation was opened with d'Eftrades, the French ambassador; and the French monarch purchased Dunkirk, with all the artillery and ammunition in the place, for four hundred thousand pounds. The annual expence of the garrison amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand pounds; and the advantages arising from it were by no means answerable to such a charge. The transaction, however, occasioned great murmurings among the people; and Lewis XIV. soon converted Dunkirk into a port equally advantageous to France, and formidable to England.

A. D. 1663. On the 18th of February, the parliament assembled, pursuant to their prorogation, and Charles endeavoured to fulfil his promise with regard to the liberty of conscience. But the parliament, who strongly suspected that he had another, and much deeper design in view, determined to defeat his intentions. The avowed design of gratifying the dissenters, and the secret resolution of supporting the catholics, were equally disagreeable. They accordingly drew up a remonstrance against the late declaration of indulgence, which they presented to his majesty, and both houses joined in desiring him to issue a proclamation against all popish priests and jesuits. To this request the king returned a very obliging answer; but in the proclamation afterwards issued, the terms were couched in so artful a manner, as to render it of little or no effect. This seeming complaisance of the king, however deceitful, was so pleasing to the parliament, that, upon his application, they voted him a supply of four subsidies, and this was the last time taxes were raised in that manner. The clergy also granted as much as the parliament; both parties being satisfied with the king's complaisance.

Gratitude was not one of Charles's principal virtues. The royalists, who had ventured so much, and suffered so deeply in his service, were wholly neglected. When application was made to him for relieving their distress, he seemed not at all affected, but lavished his favours on those who had been enemies to his family. The parliament, however, had more generosity: they took some notice of the poor cavaliers, and distributed among them above sixty thousand pounds. Mrs. Lane and the four Penderells had also some presents and pensions assigned them, for their eminent services to the king after the battle of Worcester.

A. D. 1664. At the meeting of the parliament, which was fixed for the sixteenth of March, a motion was made in the lower house for repealing the act for triennial parliaments. No great opposition was made to this motion: the act was repealed; and thus all the security of the subject against the influence of the court was at once destroyed; and Charles failed not to take advantage of these concessions to baffle opposition, from whatever quarter it might arise.

Nor was the parliament more servile in their compliance with regard to the request of royalty, than rigorous and uncharitable with regard to the people. The true spirit of persecution seemed to actuate all their proceedings on religious subjects. They had, possibly, forgotten, that the same rigid maxims of intolerance adopted by Laud had been one of the principal causes of the dreadful calamities from which the nation had been so lately delivered. They were not contented with the penalties contained in the act of uniformity; they now passed the famous conventicle act, whereby it was enacted, that if any one should repair to conventicles, the name they gave the meeting-houses of all dissenters, he should be fined five pounds for the first offence, or suffer three months imprisonment; for the second offence, ten pounds, or six months imprisonment; but for the third offence, after being convicted by a jury of his peers, he was to be transported to some foreign plantation, or pay the penalty of one hundred pounds.

A dispute had, for some time, subsisted with the states of the United Provinces, in relation to commerce. The royal African company, in particular, had been opposed in establishing their settlements on the coast of Guinea. Sir Robert Holmes had been sent the preceding year with a fleet of two-and-twenty ships to the coast of Africa, to protect the English traders, and expel the Dutch from some places they had seized, contrary to the faith of treaties. Holmes executed his commission with equal spirit and success. After taking from the Dutch Cape Verd, the island of Goree, and several of their trading ships, he sailed to America, where he made himself master of Nova Belgia, since known by the name of New York, where the Dutch had been settled several years. Warm remonstrances were presented by the Dutch against these hostilities; but receiving no satisfactory answer, they resolved to do their subjects justice by force. De Ruyter was accordingly dispatched, with a strong squadron, to the coast of Guinea, where he soon re-established the Dutch in possession of the settlements from which they had been driven by the English admiral. He afterwards attempted to take Barbadoes, but without success. These hostile proceedings, which could only be considered as preludes to a rupture between the two nations, were not displeasing to Charles, whose growing necessities, the natural consequences of a blind prodigality, induced him to embrace every pretence for drawing money from his parliament. The dispositions of the commons were very favourable to his design; for on taking the state of the trade of the kingdom into consideration, they voted, "That the wrongs, dishonours, and indignities offered to the English by the subjects of the United Provinces, had greatly interrupted the commerce of these kingdoms: that his majesty should be humbly requested to demand and obtain reparation for those damages; and that in the prosecution of this affair, the house would assist him with their lives and fortunes against all opposition whatever." This vote was considered as a sufficient sanction for those vigorous measures which the court had adopted, and the parliament was prorogued till the month of November.

The naval preparations were now carried on with great vigour, and the whole nation seemed desirous of humbling the pride of the Dutch. But as the parliament had granted no supplies, the city of London advanced one hundred thousand pounds, that no stop might be put to the preparations. Charles visited the ports in person, directed the operations himself, and animated the workmen by his presence and liberality.

The navy was soon in a respectable condition; and in the month of September, admiral Lawson sailed with orders to seize all the Dutch ships he met with in his cruise. He was so successful, that in a very short time one hundred and thirty-five of their merchant ships fell into the hands of the English. On the twenty-fourth of November the parliament assembled, and voted two millions five hundred thousand pounds for carrying on the war; a much larger supply than had ever before been granted to any English monarch.

A. D. 1665. Strengthened by this vote of the commons, Charles declared war against the Dutch in the beginning of March; and soon after prorogued the parliament. In this session the clergy gave up the right of taxing themselves in convocation, and have ever since been taxed by the parliament, in common with other subjects. In consequence of abandoning the above privilege, they obtained votes at the elections of members of parliament.

The great preparations made in England alarmed the Dutch, who sent an ambassador extraordinary to the court of England, in order, if possible, to prevent an open rupture, so destructive to the interests of a trading people: but finding all their endeavours were in vain, they exerted themselves in making preparations for carrying on the war with vigour. John de Wit, a minister equally distinguished for the extent of his capacity and the integrity of his manners, now directed all the measures of the Dutch republic, and infused spirit into that phlegmatic people. Though remarkably modest in his private behaviour, he well knew how to support, in his public conduct, that magnanimity which becomes the minister of a powerful people. It was always his opinion, that no independent government should ever make any mean or unreasonable concessions to another; and that all such compliances, instead of preventing the miseries of war, served only to invite farther insults and indignities. By his management, a spirit of harmony was preserved in all the provinces of the republic; large sums were raised; and a powerful fleet, consisting of larger ships than the Dutch had ever built before, was fitted out with the utmost expedition, in order to contest with the English the empire of the sea.

On the eighteenth of March, the duke of York, as lord high-admiral of England, sailed with a fleet of one hundred and fourteen sail, exclusive of fire-ships and bomb-ketches. He was assisted by prince Rupert; and the gallant earl of Sandwich commanded one of the divisions. Two and twenty thousand men served on board this powerful armament. The Dutch navy consisted of one hundred and twenty sail of men of war, besides fire-ships. Opdam, an experienced sea-officer of undoubted courage, commanded this numerous fleet, and received orders to seize the first opportunity of giving battle to the English.

The two fleets met on the third of June, and a furious engagement ensued, in which the Dutch were defeated, with the loss of twenty of their men of war. The ship on board of which the brave admiral Opdam had hoisted his flag, was blown up, and he himself perished, with all his crew. The English lost only four men of war; but several persons of distinction were slain, and others dangerously wounded. A thanksgiving was appointed in England for this victory, and medals of the duke of York were struck on this occasion. He had, indeed, displayed amazing courage and conduct during the whole engagement.

When the news of this defeat reached Holland, the Dutch were seized with terror and dismay; it required all the abilities and constancy of De Wit to revive the drooping spirits of his countrymen. He visited the fleet in person, rectified all disorders, and repaired the damages sustained in the late engagement. While he was thus employed in fitting out the navy for another battle with the enemy, a large fleet of Dutch merchant-ships from Turkey and the East-Indies, having sailed north about to avoid the English cruisers, anchored in the port of Bergen, in Norway, in order to wait there till a proper convoy could be sent to bring them into the ports of Holland.

This was no sooner known in England, than orders were sent to Sir Gilbert Talbot, the English envoy at Copenhagen, to persuade his Danish majesty to seize this rich fleet, in revenge for the shameful conduct of the Dutch, who had involved him in a troublesome war with Sweden. Tempted by the value of the prize, his Danish majesty listened to the reasons of the English ministry, but declared he was not in a condition to execute the design. Talbot promised to procure assistance from England, if his majesty would agree to give the captors half the value of what should be taken. The conditions were accepted, and the earl of Sandwich was ordered to sail immediately to Bergen. Persuaded that part of his squadron would be abundantly sufficient to seize a fleet of merchantmen, Sandwich sent Sir Thomas Tiddeman, with a few ships, on that service. He attacked the Dutch with great impetuosity; but the governor of Bergen having then received no orders to remain neutral, joined the Dutch, and gave the English so warm a reception, that Tiddeman was obliged to abandon the enterprize, after having received considerable damage. Charles was greatly provoked at this disappointment: he ordered the earl of Sandwich, to whose conduct he imputed the whole cause of the miscarriage, to return to London, where he deprived him of his command, and sent him ambassador to Spain.

During these transactions at sea, a dreadful plague raged in the city of London. It continued eleven months, and during that time swept away above one hundred thousand souls. The dead was carried out in carts during the night, and buried at Holy-well mount. Charles at its first appearance removed to Hampton court, and afterwards to Salisbury. The session of parliament was held at Oxford; and the capital seemed for a time to be deserted.

Alarmed at the miscarriage of Tiddeman, and ashamed of his conduct, the king of Denmark concluded an offensive alliance with England against the states; but reflecting on the great power of the English navy, and the fatal consequences that might attend the destruction of a power, whose fleets were only capable of disputing the sovereignty of the ocean, he sent orders to his resident at the Hague to conclude a defensive alliance with the states against England. He adhered to the last alliance, and seized and confiscated all the British ships in his harbours. This was a sensible check to the advantages Charles had obtained over the Dutch. The English commerce was not only affected, but the naval force of the king of Denmark was also considerable, and there was the greatest reason to imagine that his ships would soon join the fleets of the republic.

Nor was Denmark the only power that was alarmed by the success of the English; the king of France could not behold their triumphs without uneasiness. He was already engaged in a defensive alliance with the states; but his naval force was yet in its infancy. He was resolved to support the Hollanders in the unequal contest in which they were engaged; but protracted his declaration, and employed the interval in naval preparations both in his ports on the ocean, and those in the Mediterranean. The king of Denmark was, however, made acquainted with his design, and stipulated to assist the Dutch with a fleet of thirty sail; in consequence of which he was to receive an annual subsidy of one million five hundred thousand crowns; three hundred thousand of which were to be paid by France.

Encouraged by these favourable circumstances, the Dutch continued to exert all their power in their own defence, and to support that power on the ocean, their fleets had obtained. De Ruyter, their great admiral, was arrived from the coast of Guinea: their India fleet was returned in safety: their harbours were crowded with merchantmen: Domestic faction was appeased: the young prince of Orange had put himself under the tuition of de Wit, who executed his office with the strictest honour and fidelity: and the whole republic was so exasperated against the English, that they thirsted for revenge, and promised themselves that their next enterprize would be attended with better success. Their merchant-ships were not suffered to sail; and even the fisheries were suspended, that no impediment might retard the manning of their fleet.

The English parliament assembled at Oxford, declared their intention of supporting his majesty in the war against the Dutch. Accordingly they voted him twelve hundred and fifty thousand pounds, to be levied in two years, by monthly assessments. The independents, anabaptists, and republicans, encouraged by the emissaries of the Dutch, had formed a scheme for a general insurrection; but their whole plan was rendered abortive. Exasperated by these practices the parliament brought in a bill, known by the name of the five-mile-act, and which has given occasion to many heavy and just complaints. Under the specious pretence of supporting the throne, against the attempts of its most inveterate enemies, the church persevered in her project of wreaking her vengeance on the non-conformists. By this bill it was enacted, that no dissenting teacher, who refused to take the oath of non-resistance, should, except upon the road, come within five miles of any corporation, or of any place, where he had discharged the offices of a minister after the act of oblivion, under the penalty of fifty pounds. Violences like these could only be considered as preludes to the most furious persecution; but the spirit of the nation had undergone a change.

change, and the intolerant spirit was nipped in its bud: the commons rejected the bill for imposing the oath of non-resistance on the whole nation.

A. D. 1666. France was now openly engaged on the side of the states, and declared war against England. The contest was now unequal. But the English still enjoyed one advantage: their country lay between the fleets of her enemies, and might be able, by speedy, and well-concerted operations, to prevent their junction. But such was the want of intelligence in the ministry, or the want of conduct in the commanders, that this favourable circumstance became rather prejudicial. Beaufort, the French admiral, had received orders to sail from Toulon with his squadron, in order to join the Dutch, and it was supposed that he was already in the channel. The English fleet, consisting of seventy-four sail, was commanded by Monk, earl of Albemarle, and prince Rupert. The former, from the repeated defeats of the Dutch during the government of Cromwell, had rashly entertained too despicable an opinion of their courage; and it was determined in a council of war, to detach prince Rupert with a squadron of twenty ships, in order to intercept Beaufort.

The Dutch fleet, commanded by de Ruyter, was now riding at anchor between Newport and Dunkirk, expecting, as it was supposed, the arrival of the French squadron. Albemarle determined to force them to an action, and accordingly stood immediately towards them. The Dutch, who did not expect this visit, prepared for the engagement, and cut their cables, that they might be the sooner in readiness to receive the enemy. Sir George Ascue, who was well acquainted with the bravery of the Dutch, cautioned Albemarle of his danger, but it was now too late. The battle which ensued is one of the most remarkable recorded in history, whether the duration, or the desperate courage with which it was fought, be considered. It continued four days, and each was marked with events of the most astonishing nature. Albemarle, conscious of the mistake he had made with regard to the courage and conduct of the enemy, exerted all his great abilities on this memorable occasion. Though now in the decline of life, he appeared the youthful hero, and seemed to have forgot his years as well as his danger.

Sir William Berkeley, who led the van during the first day's engagement, fell into the thickest of the enemy, and was obliged to yield to superior force. When the victors entered the ship, they found the gallant commander dead in his cabin and covered with blood. The advantage which the English had acquired by gaining the weather-gage of the enemy, was of very little consequence, occasioned by the wind blowing so high, that they could not use the guns on the lower deck. A discovery made by de Wit was of the utmost consequence to the Dutch. This was chain-shot, which tore the rigging of the English to pieces. Sir John Harman attacked the Dutch admiral Evertz, and obtained the victory: Evertz was killed in the engagement. Night at last put an end to the contest.

It was somewhat calmer the next morning; by which the battle became at once more steady and dreadful, and it was now perceived that valour alone is not sufficient to compensate for a defect of superiority, when the enemy is not wanting either in courage or conduct. De Ruyter and Van Tromp, at once enemies from faction, and rivals in glory, exerted themselves in this memorable battle. The latter being surrounded by the English, was relieved by the former, when reduced to the last extremity. During the action sixteen fresh ships joined the Hollanders. This addition was decisive. The English, whose ships were dreadfully shattered, and reduced to twenty-eight, found themselves obliged to retreat towards their own coasts, whither they were followed by the Dutch, and their whole fleet must have been taken had not a sudden calm, which happened a little before night, prevented a fresh engagement.

As soon as the morning appeared, they continued their retreat. The shattered ships were ordered to set all their sails, while sixteen of the most entire, drawn up in order, followed them, and kept the enemy in play. Albemarle himself closed the rear, and presented an undaunted countenance to the enemy flushed with victory. The admiral confessed to the young earl of Ossory, who served a volunteer, that he was determined to blow up his ship, and perish gloriously in the bed of honour, rather than strike to the enemy. Ossory agreed with him, and highly applauded this desperate resolution.

Just as the Dutch were come up with the English, and were preparing to begin the engagement, a new fleet appeared to the southward, crowding all their sails to reach the scene of action, and join in the dreadful contest. De Ruyter was persuaded that Beaufort was arrived to assist in the total defeat of the enemy: while the English flattered themselves that prince Rupert was coming to snatch the laurel wreath from the brow of the conqueror. Albemarle was soon convinced that they were the prince's ships; and stood immediately towards them. The whole fleet followed the admiral; but Sir George Ascue, whose ship carried one hundred guns, and was the largest in the fleet, unfortunately ran ashore upon a sand called the Galloper, and was obliged to strike to the enemy.

It was now determined in a council of war, to make another attempt against the Dutch, and accordingly the engagement began the next morning with more fury than ever. The ships were grappled to each other, and the men fought hand to hand, as if on firm ground. In this manner the contest continued till a thick mist obliged them to separate; when the English retired to the mouth of the Thames.

The Dutch claimed the victory, but had little reason to boast. The English fleet was soon in a condition to face the enemy; and de Ruyter having repaired the damages his fleet had sustained, stood to the mouth of the Thames, in order to block up the English, and facilitate his junction with the French admiral. It could not be expected that the English would tamely bear so vile an insult. Albemarle and prince Rupert hastened to attack the enemy. The two fleets, as well as the courage and conduct of their leaders were nearly equal; each consisted of about eighty-eight sail. They met on the twenty-fourth of July, and the engagement began with incredible fury. Sir Thomas Allen, who commanded the white squadron attacked the van of the Dutch, with so much fury that they were entirely routed, and the three admirals who commanded that division were slain. Van Tromp engaged Sir Jeremy Smith; and during the heat of action he was separated from the main body commanded by de Ruyter, who with the utmost conduct and valour maintained the fight against the principal force of the English; and the fight continued till night put an end to the engagement. He proposed to have renewed the battle as soon as the morning appeared, but instead of finding his ships in a situation for attacking the enemy, he saw them scattered, and unwilling to renew the battle. In this alarming situation neither his courage nor his presence of mind forsook him. He made so noble a retreat, that he acquired as much honour by his prudence as he would have done had he gained the victory. But he could not bear the thought of flying from the enemy. He often exclaimed, "What a wretch am I, that among so many thousand shot that fly near me, not one will put an end to my miserable life!" He however persevered in his duty, and by his amazing efforts, the Dutch fleet were conducted into their own harbours. On his return to Holland he complained loudly of Van Tromp's conduct, and that gallant admiral was dismissed the service.

This victory rendered the English the undisputed masters of the ocean, and admiral Holmes was detached with twenty sail of ships, to insult the coasts of Holland. He accordingly entered the road of Uke, where he destroyed one hundred and forty sail of merchantmen, and two ships of war. He afterwards burnt Brandorus, a rich and populous village on the coast. These losses exasperated the merchants: they exclaimed loudly against the administration, and joined the Orange faction. The firmness of de Wit was hardly sufficient to stem the furious tide of popular resentment.

Alarmed at the victory of the English, the king of France hastened Beaufort to join the Dutch, left his friend de Wit might not be able to support himself in the administration. De Ruyter's fleet was soon refitted; he put to sea, and again cruized in the straits of Dover. The English fleet, now stronger than ever, failed, under the command of prince Rupert, to attack the enemy. Ruyter thought proper to decline the engagement, as he every day expected to be joined by the French Squadron, and retired into St. John's road near Bologne, where he was sheltered from a terrible storm which soon after arose. Rupert was not so fortunate: his ships received considerable damage, and he was obliged to retire to St. Hellens to refit. In the mean time the duke of Beaufort, the French admiral, proceeded up the channel, and passed the English fleet unperceived. But before he reached the place where he expected to join de Ruyter, that commander had been seized with a fever, and the states had thought proper to recal their fleet. Anxious for his navy, which he had raised with so much care and industry, Lewis sent orders to Beaufort to make the best of his way to Brest, and to continue as near as possible to the French coast. Beaufort obeyed, and was fortunate enough to pass the English without being perceived. One of his ships only, being separated from the fleet, fell into the hands of the enemy.

While the fleets were thus inactive, the city of London was laid in ashes by a dreadful fire which broke out on the second of September. It began at a broker's house near the bridge, and diffused itself on all sides with such rapidity, that nothing could resist the progress of the flames. The dreadful conflagration lasted three days and nights; nor did it stop, till the greater part of the capital was destroyed. Eighty churches, several of the city gates, and four hundred streets, containing above thirteen thousand two hundred dwelling houses, were consumed. The ruins covered a space of four hundred and twenty-six acres, extending along the banks of the Thames from the Tower to the Temple church; and from the north-east gate along the city wall to Holbourn-bridge. It was at last extinguished by blowing up a number of houses. Both the king and the duke of York attended, and exerted all their endeavours to put a stop to the progress of the flames, but without success.

This dreadful calamity gave occasion to various conjectures with regard to its cause; no person being inclined to think it casual. Some imputed it to the malice of the republicans; but the greater part ascribed it to the papists; and in order to comply with this popular prejudice, an inscription engraved by authority on the monument, imputed this calamity to that hated sect. Both these suspicions, however, seemed to have owed their rise to the violent animosities that possessed the minds of the different parties which divided the people at this period. Their posterity, who behold this, and other events of that time, through the cooler medium of reason, see no cause for ascribing this dreadful accident either to treachery or malice. The streets of London were then extremely narrow; the houses were almost all built of timber, or lath and plaister; the season was remarkably dry; and a violent east wind happened to blow at that time. To these causes, and to these only, the astonishing progress of the flames ought to be ascribed.

But however dreadful this calamity proved to the inhabitants, it has since been attended with very beneficial consequences. The new streets were much wider than the old; the houses were built with brick and stone, lath and plaister, as well as timber in the walls, being forbid by authority. By this means the city became much more healthy than before; and the plague, which so often swept the greater number of inhabitants, has not once appeared since this dreadful conflagration. The parliament voted a supply of one million, eight hundred thousand pounds, to be levied partly by a poll-tax and partly by assessments.

A.D. 1667. The king was by this time convinced that it would prove a much more difficult task than he at first imagined to humble the Dutch. He was therefore desirous of opening negotiations for a peace; but concealed his intentions till the parliament had granted the supply, which had been postponed from time to time, on the most trifling pretences, notwithstanding the king sent repeated messages to the house, requesting that the business might be finished. At last, on the eighteenth of January, the bill for raising the above sum passed the commons, and received the royal assent with several other acts, about the middle of February.

Charles now determined to bring about a peace, and accordingly proposed the opening conferences for that purpose. The Dutch, who by their riches and navigation, were on a better footing than the English, proposed the alternative, that things should be restored to the situation they were in at the beginning of the war, or that the two nations should retain all their acquisitions. The last was accepted, and no difficulty remained but with regard to the possession of the Isle of Polorone in the East Indies, once famous for its spices. Holles and Coventry, the English plenipotentiaries at the congress, proposed that a cessation of hostilities should be concluded, till the several claims could be adjusted; but de Wit refused the offer. That sagacious and enterprising minister, who was no stranger to Charles's necessities, had planned an expedition, which, if successful, he knew would be of more weight in the negotiation than any arguments whatever.

Persuaded that there was not the least reason to fear the success of the negotiation, and that no attempt would be made by the enemy, while the conferences were open, the king had laid up his large ships, in order to convert to his own use the greater part of the money granted him by parliament. De Wit, who had the best intelligence from England, determined to take advantage of this negligence of the British monarch. He ordered de Ruyter to sail with a fleet of ships and surprize the English, lulled in a fatal security. De Ruyter executed his commission with equal conduct and success. He entered the mouth of the Thames, and threw the English into the utmost terror and consternation. The mouth of the river Medway was defended by a chain, and some fortifications had been added to Sheerness and Upnore castle. But the former was soon taken, though defended by the brave Sir Edward Sprague. The wind blowing fresh at east, the vice-admiral, Van Ghent, broke the chain drawn across the entrance of the Medway, and burnt the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles V. all capital ships, and all taken from the Dutch during the war. He also possessed himself of the hull of the Royal Charles, which the English had set on fire, and advanced with six men of war and five fire ships as far as Upnore castle, where he burnt the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James, all of them capital ships.

After performing this exploit without receiving any considerable damage, the Dutch fell down the Medway, and it was apprehended that they would proceed up the Thames next tide, and destroy all the ships in the river. The capital was in confusion. Nine ships were sunk at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall: platforms were raised in several places, and furnished with artillery: the trained-bands were called out, and every precaution taken to render the attempt attempt of the enemy abortive. But de Ruyter did not think proper to proceed; the danger, he thought, was too great, and the hopes of success too precarious. He left the mouth of the Thames, and stood to the westward, and made an attempt to destroy the shipping at Portsmouth and Plymouth, but was repulsed at both places with loss. He was not, however, intimidated: he returned again to the mouth of the Thames, and advanced as far as Tilbury-fort; but found the English so well prepared for his reception, that there were no hopes of success. He next insulted Harwich, and kept the whole southern coast of England in perpetual alarms till the conclusion of the peace, which happened on the tenth of July, when the treaty was signed at Breda. Arcadia was yielded to the French, who agreed to restore St. Christophers, and some other islands which they had taken in the West-Indies. The island of Porerine remained with the Dutch. The colony of New-York was the only advantage the English derived from a war, that had cost the nation such immense sums, and in which the folly, negligence, and avarice of the sovereign, had been so singularly displayed.

A war so ruinous, and terminated with so little advantage, exasperated the English; and it was thought necessary to make some sacrifice to appease the people, before the meeting of the parliament. Clarendon, the chancellor, was, at this time, no favourite with either party. The king respected the merit of that great minister, but his virtues were troublesome. The chancellor, incorruptible in the midst of a dissolute court, still retained his integrity of manners. He had no complaisance for the king's mistresses. He was a restraint upon his pleasures, and opposed his prodigalities. The people, less grateful for the good he had done them, than exasperated at the circumstances that displeased them, were so far from thinking themselves obliged to Clarendon for his conduct, that they considered him as the author of their sufferings. The presbyterians reproached him with persecution on one hand, and the Roman catholics with cruelty on the other. Tho' the war with Holland was undertaken contrary to his advice, yet the misfortunes were attributed wholly to him, because it was determined to find him guilty at all events. The earl of Southampton, high-treasurer, and the virtuous friend of Clarendon, who had been dead about three months, had done justice to his character. "This man," said he, in full council, "is a true protestant, and an honest Englishman: while he enjoys power, we are secure of our laws, liberties, and religion: if he is removed, I tremble for the consequences." But the virtues of Clarendon, instead of preventing, occasioned his fall. The seals were taken from him, and given to Sir Orlando Bridgeman.

His enemies were not, however, satisfied with his disgrace; they were determined to complete his ruin. As soon as the parliament met, a charge was opened against him in the house of commons, by Sir Edward Seymour. It consisted of seventeen articles; but the principal, and indeed the only one, that could affect him, was his advising the sale of Dunkirk, and even this amounted to nothing more than an error in judgment. When the charge was carried up to the peers, it was so ill supported, that they refused to put him under arrest. But Clarendon perceiving that the tide of popular clamour ran strongly against him, and that he was entirely abandoned by his master, whom he had so long and so faithfully served, withdrew to Rouen, in Normandy, and put himself under the protection of Lewis XIV. The French, more judicious and more humane than his countrymen, received the illustrious fugitive with every mark of respect. He lived six years in this retirement, employing his leisure time in writing a history of the civil wars, a work worthy of the statesman and the illustrious citizen. The early part of his life had been spent in the study of the laws. His father often exhorted him never to advance the prerogative at the expence of the public liberty, and died of an apoplexy just after he had repeated that lesson to his son. This affecting incident imprinted it strongly on his memory. His loyalty to Charles I. was that of an Englishman firmly attached to the principles of the constitution; and he died with the character of a nobleman of unblemished virtue, an incorruptible judge, and an able minister, equally valuable for his attachment and integrity.

The ministry of Charles was now totally changed; the treasury was put into commission; and Sir Richard Clifford, a declared papist, was made first commissioner. Sir Henry Bennet, created earl of Arlington, a concealed papist, was made secretary of state. The duke of Buckingham, a nobleman of spirit and humour, but of an abandoned character; and Wilmot, earl of Rochester, the lewdest, and most licentious poet of the age, were the king's chief favourites, and ministers of his pleasures. With these, and his mistresses, Charles spent the greater part of his time.

The dreadful conflagration having laid the Royal Exchange, built by Sir Thomas Gresham, in ashes, it was determined to rebuild it in a most splendid manner. A model of the intended building was accordingly presented to the king; and it being approved of, Charles laid the first stone in the beginning of October, with great solemnity.

The banishment of Clarendon not having fully contented the people, the king had recourse to another expedient more deserving of praise; and had it been steadily pursued, would, probably, have rendered his reign happy; at least, it would have rendered his memory glorious. This was the triple alliance; a measure which gave entire satisfaction to the public.

Lewis XIV. as proud as he was powerful, and passionately fond of glory, particularly that of conquests, unworthy of a great prince, filled Europe with uneasiness and apprehensions. Notwithstanding the renunciation of his queen, Maria Theresa, of Austria, he seized Flanders and Franche Comté, pretending he had a legal right to them both. The United Provinces were sufficiently alarmed. England was enraged at the assumed superiority of France; and Charles projected the triple alliance. Sir William Temple was sent to negotiate the treaty. A philosophical minister could not fail of being agreeable to De Wit. The same frankness, sincerity, and greatness of mind, distinguished them both. It was not between ministers of such a character that politics degenerate into finess and chicanery. They undertook to mediate between France and Spain, and to engage them in a treaty that should leave to Lewis part of his conquest, but that he should absolutely renounce the rights of his queen. Sweden entered into this alliance. According to the laws of the States General; all the towns were to consent to the treaty; and this it was possible the intrigues of Lewis might have power to prevent. His ambassador, d'Estrades, was so sure of this, that, on being informed of the negotiation, he said, "We will talk of it in six weeks." But De Wit, foreseeing the danger of delay, and persuaded that, in a case of so much importance to his country, the good of the public ought to over-rule even the laws themselves, boldly urged the states to ratify the league the very day it was signed, and prevailed. Sir William Temple received the most flattering encomiums with a degree of modesty that added to his merit. He answered, that to remove things from their element, or their centre, force and labour were necessary; but that they would return of themselves. The triple alliance, signed at Aix-la-Chapelle, put an end to the conquests of Lewis XIV. He kept what he had gained in the Low Countries, but Franche Comté was restored to Spain.

Philip IV. of Spain had been succeeded by his son, Charles II. then a minor, and his mother held the reins of government, with the title of regent. The court of Spain, though it was forced to submit to the terms of the triple alliance, by no means approved of that treaty; because certain concessions were to be made to France, by no means agreeable to the haughty spirit of the Spaniards. That court even declared, that they were ready to relinquish all the Low Countries, rather than submit to the articles of the treaty. This was, however, nothing more than a passionate declaration; it was found in vain to resist, and the treaty was accepted.

A. D. 1669. Peace being thus restored on the continent, Charles formed a scheme for attaching both the presbyterians and papists more strongly to his interest. To effect this, he proposed to incorporate the presbyterians with the church of England, and to obtain a toleration for all the other sects of non-conformists. The lord-keeper was accordingly directed to procure a conference between some of the most eminent of the episcopal and presbyterian ministers; and to offer proposals for a comprehension of such dissenters as could be brought into communion with the church of England. The episcopal divines, either from a spirit of christian charity, or a desire to please their sovereign, were very compliable on this occasion; they even made large concessions; and nothing remained to put a final hand to the accommodation, but the re-ordinating the presbyterian ministers, which was at last settled by the consent of both parties. Matters being thus adjusted, lord chief-justice Hales undertook to draw up a bill of comprehension, and the lord-keeper engaged to support it in parliament.

The archbishop of Canterbury, who was not intrusted with the secret, determined to render every scheme of this kind abortive. He wrote circular letters to the suffragan bishops in his province, enjoining them to make an exact enquiry into the number of conventicles in each particular diocese. Provided with these necessary informations, he repaired to court, and obtained a proclamation to be published, for putting the laws against dissenters in execution, particularly the act for restraining non-conformists from residing in corporate towns. But the king soon rendered the intentions of the bishop abortive, by ordering the non-conformist ministers to be told from him, that he was very desirous of making them easy; adding, that if they thought proper to petition the crown, they should be favourably heard. They embraced the offer; a petition was presented; and the king, in his answer, told them, "That he would use all his interest to get them comprehended in the public establishment."

The parliament was, however, averse to any concessions; and when they met in October, they presented an address of thanks to his majesty for his proclamation, and appointed a committee to make a strict enquiry into the conduct of the non-conformists. A great number of informations were accordingly laid before them; and they reported, "That several conventicles and seditious assemblies were held, even in the neighbourhood of the house, tending to insult the government, and endanger the peace of the kingdom." This report set the house in a flame; and the following declaration was immediately voted, "that they would adhere to his majesty, for the support of the government, both in church and state, against all adversaries whatever." They proceeded no farther at that time, and the king prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of February.

A. D. 1670. The king, when he opened the session of parliament on the fourteenth of February, demanded a supply in the most pressing terms. But the commons, before they complied with the king's desires, passed the conventicle act, by which every member of a conventicle, or assembly of non-conformists, consisting of more than five persons, exclusive of the family where it was held, was liable to a fine. And contrary to the principle received in criminal matters, what appeared doubtful was always to be interpreted in the least favourable light. This severity of the commons was the more extraordinary, as the same spirit of persecution had, a little before, occasioned a rebellion in Scotland. About two thousand presbyterians, after renewing the covenant, took up arms; and the flame which despair had kindled was quenched in blood. One Maccail, who had joined in this insurrection, expired under the torture, in a kind of triumph of joy. The moment when his soul was taking her flight, he cried out, "Farewell sun, moon, and stars; farewell world, and time; farewell weak and frail body: welcome eternity, welcome angels and saints, welcome Saviour of the world, and welcome God, the judge of all!" The spectators were struck with a fortitude like this; a man expiring under the most cruel torments, and rejoicing in the dreadful conflict, was truly astonishing; it increased their hatred against such inhuman persecutors.

Though prince Rupert, the duke of Ormond, secretary Trevor, and the lord-keeper Bridgeman, on whose honour and integrity the people could rely, still continued in office, yet they enjoyed but little power: they were seldom admitted to the cabinet council, or consulted on the most pressing affairs of the nation. Equally suspicious and suspected, a slave to pleasure and a dupe to artifice, Charles neglected the cares of government, and exposed himself to the danger of a fatal revolution. Five ministers shared his confidence, and directed all the affairs of government. Ashley Cooper, earl of Shaftsbury, distinguished by his learning, but of the most violent passions; the duke of Buckingham, with all the advantages of wit, figure, and fortune, but without either conduct or principles; the duke of Lauderdale, a man of parts, but opinionated, a sycophant to the prince, and a tyrant to the subject: the bold and impetuous Clifford; and the earl of Arlington, well versed in business, and worthy of the place he enjoyed, had his resolution been sufficient to follow his own sentiments, rather than the influence of the court. The ministry was called the Cabal, from the five initial letters of their names forming that word. Their political system seemed to be that of complying with the king's inclinations, and supporting the interest of the duke of York.

As soon as Charles had given the royal assent to the bill against dissenters, the commons passed an act for granting one million seven hundred thousand pounds to his majesty; but this money had the same fate with other sums he had already received from parliament. It was squandered away upon his mistresses and favourites; and he was so far from making good his engagements with the States-General, that he entered into measures for forming a closer union than ever with the king of France. Desirous of rendering himself absolute, by shaking off the yoke of dependence on the supplies of parliament, he determined to secure the friendship of Lewis XIV. as the only method of executing his purpose. To this chimerical project he sacrificed every sentiment of honour, justice and humanity. He knew he had nothing to fear from his ministers; their servile flattery, and the licentiousness of their manners, were ill calculated to support the interests of their country. They were desirous of rendering the king independent of the parliament; and thought the only way to effect it, was to enter into a new war with Holland, and depend upon Lewis for assistance of men and money.

Pursuant to this resolution, it was determined to renew the war with Holland on the slightest pretences. The duke of York entered heartily into this scheme, which he was persuaded could not fail, if successful, of establishing the catholic religion in England. But the alliance with France was to be kept an impenetrable secret, till Charles had procured a vote of parliament for arming the nation, under pretence of being ready, at all events, to protect the commerce, and support the independence of the nation against the attempts of any power whatever, great preparations being making in the ports of France and Holland.

But however fond Charles might be of the French alliance, it does not appear, till an event determined him to pursue the scheme with the utmost vigour. The triple alliance had put an effectual stop to the conquests of Lewis, and that ambitious prince was very desirous of revenge. Could the English be prevailed upon to enter into a new war with the Dutch, that difficulty would be removed; and he flattered himself that this was not difficult to be accomplished, as the reduction of Holland would remove the object of emulation to the English, who were jealous of their privileges. Full of these ideas, he took a journey to Dunkirk, accompanied by his whole court, and the dutchess of Orleans took that opportunity of visiting her brother. Lewis was no stranger to the address of that amiable princess, and the ascendant she had acquired over the English monarch, and had prevailed upon her to exert all her interest to draw her brother from the triple league. This young princess, then only twenty-five years of age, was accordingly selected as the plenipotentiary for concluding this important treaty. Charles met his sister at Dover, where they spent ten days together in the utmost harmony. In their conferences she artfully insinuated, that nothing was wanting to render him the greatest monarch in the world, and to recompense him for all the misfortunes he had suffered, than that of making himself as absolute in England, as the other princes of Europe were in their dominions. This glorious end she observed could never be obtained while his subjects had any prospect of being assisted by the Dutch, whose republican principles led them to support the liberty of the subject. It was therefore necessary for him to humble the Hollanders, which would effectually remove the only difficulty of keeping his own subjects within the bounds of obedience. She added, that he might rest assured, the king of France would assist him with men and money sufficient to quell any commotions that might be raised in England, by pursuing this design. Blinded with the love he bore his sister, and intoxicated with the desire of governing with unlimited authority, Charles agreed to every thing proposed by Lewis, and laid the foundation for the ruin of his allies, in the midst of feasting and diversions.

But Lewis was no stranger to the natural inconsistency of Charles's temper, and therefore artfully determined to fix him firm to his engagements by the bands of pleasure. He sent over with the princess Henrietta, mademoiselle de Querouaille, a young lady of extraordinary beauty and accomplishments. Charles wanted power to resist her charms. She accompanied him to London; was soon after created dutchess of Portsmouth, and maintained her empire over his heart during the whole course of his life. She kept him firm in his connections with France, and continued to be the reigning favourite, while his former mistress was honoured with the title of a dutchess, as some recompence for the favour she had lost.

But the joy which Charles derived from this new alliance was greatly lessened by the loss of his sister, who died soon after her return to France. This event, however, made an alteration in the resolutions of the two monarchs. The duke of Buckingham was dispatched to Paris to put a finishing hand to the treaty, by which the spoils of the Dutch, devoted to destruction, were to be shared between France and England.

It was soon found impossible to keep this treaty a secret: too many persons had been concerned in its execution. But though it was generally suspected, and perhaps known to most of the courts of Europe, it occasioned no alarm. The emperor was fully employed with seditions in Hungary; the Swede lulled asleep with negotiations; and the Spanish monarchy, weak and irresolute, and always slower in its motions, permitted Lewis to follow the career of his ambition without restraint.

The marquis of Crequi made an irruption into

Lorraine; the duke, not dreaming of hostilities, was forced to abandon his territories. He flattered himself that he should find a powerful advocate in Charles, in return for the many favours he had received during his exile: but he was mistaken. His envoy was told, "That the king was extremely sorry for the misfortunes of his master, but that the present violence, like the misfortunes of a sudden inundation, had no remedy but patience."

Such glaring partiality in favour of the French monarch alarmed the Dutch, and they began to fear for the safety of their country. Their misfortunes were increased by two factions which divided the commonwealth. One composed of rigid republicans, to whom the least shadow of absolute authority seemed a monster, contrary to the laws of human society; the other of republicans of a more moderate disposition, who were desirous of investing the young prince of Orange, afterwards the famous William III. with the posts and dignities of his ancestors. The grand pensionary John de Wit, was at the head of the rigid republicans, but the party of the young prince began to gain ground in the state. These domestic dissensions were more regarded than the foreign danger that threatened the destruction of their liberty.

The French monarch had not only gained the English monarch over to his interest, but also the famous Van Galen, bishop of Munster, whose delight was war and plunder, and naturally an enemy to the Dutch. Lewis had formerly assisted them against this warlike prelate; he now joined him for their destruction. The Swedes, who had united with the republic to stop the projects of a conqueror, who had then no designs against them, abandoned her when they saw she was threatened with ruin, and renewed their old connections with France, on condition of receiving the former subsidies.

But among all the powers engaged against this little state, not one of them could alledge a lawful pretence for hostilities. Their desire of sharing in the ruins of a people, who had enriched themselves by commerce and oeconomy, was the only reason for their uniting in their destruction.

On the twenty-fourth of October, the parliament met pursuant to their prorogation, and the session was opened with a speech from the lord-keeper, who represented the pressing exigencies of the state, and the absolute necessity of an immediate supply. He told them, "That France and the states-general were collecting powerful armies by sea and land; were assiduously employed in building ships, and filling their magazines with all sorts of warlike stores and provisions: that since the beginning of the last war with Holland, France had increased the strength of her marine more than three times what it was before; and that Holland, also since the conclusion of the peace, had applied herself diligently to the augmentation of her fleets: that in so critical a conjuncture, common prudence required that his majesty should make some suitable preparations: that he had accordingly given orders for fitting out fifty sail of his largest ships against the spring, besides those which were necessary for the security of trade, foreseeing, that if he neglected to put his navy in a respectable condition, it might prove a temptation to those who seem not now to intend it, to offer an affront at least, if not do a real injury to the nation." He next expatiated on the several advantageous leagues he had entered into for the defence of his kingdom, and the benefit of commerce. He particularly mentioned the triple alliance concluded with the Dutch and Swedes, and those with Portugal and Denmark. And concluded with assuring them, that the king would prorogue the parliament at Christmas, and therefore wished they would regulate the proceedings accordingly.

The commons were deceived by this shameful peravacation, and either unacquainted with, or not crediting his engagements with France, voted him two millions millions and a half: a much larger supply than had ever been granted by parliament, and certainly never less deserved. Sir William Temple was still at the Hague, where he had acquired so great a reputation for honour and integrity, that the Cabal were persuaded no orders from his majesty could prevail upon him to promote or countenance measures destructive of the interest of his country. He was therefore recalled. De Wit, who admired the great and noble qualities of the English resident, took leave of him with the highest regret. The Dutch saw through the flimsy veil of pretence made use of to remove him; and were now fully convinced of the insincerity of Charles. They even ordered their ambassador at London to signify to the English ministry, that they should look upon their recalling Sir William Temple, as an undoubted proof of their having changed their measures.

A. D. 1672. Though the parliament had voted a large supply to his majesty, the bills for it were not passed when the parliament was prorogued. They met again the latter end of January, and a few days after the king sent a message to the commons, desiring that the money-bills might be hastened; but instead of passing the acts they joined with the lords in a solemn address to his majesty, upon the alarming increase of popery, and desired that no papist or reputed papist might enjoy any office civil or military. The king, unwilling to give them an absolute denial, published a proclamation against the catholics, but never intended to carry it into execution.

When the first of the money bills was carried to the house of peers, Lucas severely animadverted on the enormous grants made to the crown, and the shameful manner in which these supplies were squandered away. "While we are continually giving," said he at the conclusion of his speech, "and the king is continually asking, it is necessary to make some estimate for ourselves. Would his majesty be pleased to request a quarter of our estate, I would, for my part, cheerfully resign it. Were it half, upon good occasions, I should resign it freely; but then let us have some assurance of quietly enjoying the residue, and know what we have to trust to." The king was in the gallery when Lucas spoke with such boldness, and was highly offended; but he was so exasperated when he found the speech was printed and dispersed in every part of the kingdom, that he ordered it to be burnt by the hand of the common executioner.

It had, however, such an effect upon the lords, that they made some alterations in the money bill sent up by the commons. This was highly resented by the latter, who considered it as an infringement on their undoubted right of regulating all acts of subsidy. Several conferences were held between the two houses, in order to terminate the affair; but instead of coming to an amicable agreement, they carried the dispute to so great a height, that the king was obliged to prorogue the parliament, and lose the large supply that had been voted by the commons.

During this session of parliament, a tax on plays was proposed. This was objected to by the court party, who said the players were the king's servants, and administered to his pleasures. Sir John Coventry pleasantly asked, "Whether the king's pleasures lay among the male or female actors?" Charles, who besides his other mistresses, entertained two actresses, Mrs. Davis, and Nell Gwin, was hurt by this sarcasm, and took an unworthy revenge. Some of his guards attacked Coventry, and slit his nose. The commons expressed their indignation, by passing what is called the Coventry act, by which maiming and deforming was made a capital crime, and those persons who had assaulted Coventry were rendered incapable of receiving the king's pardon.

About the same time one Blood, a discarded officer who had served under Cromwell, and the most daring villain recorded in history, found means to steal the crown, and several other parts of the regalia from the Tower. He had some time before attempted to assassinate the duke of Ormond, but failed in his design, and escaped without being discovered. He was not so fortunate in his second villany. He was detected; but by a strange lenity, or rather weakness in Charles, he not only gave him his pardon, but settled on him five hundred pounds a year. When he was taken, he confessed his crimes, but refused to discover his accomplices. "I will never," said he, "disown a crime, nor betray a friend." The king had the curiosity to see so daring a villain. He was accordingly brought into his presence, and had the impudence to tell his majesty, that if he ordered him to be executed, his friends, who were both able and willing, would not fail to revenge his death. Whether this declaration intimidated the king, or whether he thought so intrepid a person might be of use on some future occasion, is uncertain; but Charles took him into his favour, and even treated him with distinction, while many of his faithful servants, who had lost their fortunes in his service, were unrewarded and forgotten. Princes are not easily forgiven for neglecting those who have served them faithfully, especially when they lavish their favours on unworthy objects.

But this imprudent action was only a prelude to others of a more dangerous tendency. Charles was always in want of money, and the failure of the last supplies voted by the commons, had greatly increased his necessities. In this exigency, the Cabal advised him to shut up the exchequer. Their advice was followed; the exchequer was shut up, and continued so for a year and some months, to the great distress and ruin of many families, who had lent their money upon government security. No English monarch had ever before dared to commit so flagrant an act of injustice; and at any other period he might perhaps have fallen the victim of his own folly. Every part of the kingdom resounded with complaints. The most severe libels against the king and his ministers were published. But Charles was deaf to the complaints of his people. Immersed in pleasure, he regarded not the reproaches incurred by his avarice and injustice.

It has been already observed that Charles had published a proclamation against the papists; but he now determined to change his conduct. Accordingly, as head of the church, he issued a proclamation for suspending the penal laws, which had been made against all non-conformists and recusants whatever; and for granting to the protestant dissenters the public exercise of their religion, and to the papists the liberty of celebrating mass, in private houses. The lord-keeper Bridgeman refused to put the seals to the edict for suspending the penal laws. Exasperated at this opposition, the king deprived him of his office, and gave the seals to the earl of Shaftsbury.

The nation could not, however, still believe that the king had entered into a treaty with Lewis for the destruction of the Dutch. A yacht had been sent from England to bring over the lady Temple from Holland. The captain insisted that the Dutch admiral Van Ghent should pay the honours due to the English flag. This the Dutchman refused, declaring that it was never known for an admiral in his own harbour to strike his flag to a small vessel, especially as the commander had nothing more than a captain's commission. Though this reason was irrefragable, the Cabal laid hold of the incident to quarrel with the states. Unwilling to enter into a war with England, the Dutch offered to make any concessions: But the ministry, determined to declare war against the republic, pursuant to the conditions stipulated in their famous treaty with Lewis, refused every satisfaction.

It was now generally believed, that the vast naval preparations making in the different parts of England were intended against the Dutch; but before any declaration was published, a perfidious attempt was made on the Dutch Smyrna fleet, amounting to seventy

seventy sail, and valued at a million and a half sterling. The design was, however, rendered abortive, by the gallant behaviour of the Dutch, who repulsed all the attacks of the English during three days successively. These hostilities were followed by a declaration of war. But surely never reasons more absurd and ridiculous were employed to cover so flagrant a violation of the late treaty. Complaints were made of injuries offered to the East-India company; a charge which that company themselves disowned. The detention of some English subjects in Surinam was also alledged, though it was known that their continuing in that colony was voluntary. The refusal of a Dutch fleet to pay the honours of the flag to an English yacht, was also urged as an unpardonable offence; and to complete the ridiculous catalogue of affronts, mention was made of some abusive pictures, reflecting on the English nation. It was some time before the states could discover the meaning of the last charge against them. At last it was found, that the complaint related entirely to a portrait of Cornelius de Wit, brother to the pensionary, who had distinguished himself in the expedition, when the English ships were burnt in the Medway. On the back ground of the picture was a representation of several ships on fire. Such were the injuries which nothing less than the blood of a whole people could obliterate. Lewis, with more dignity, though not with more solid reason, alledged nothing but his displeasure with the states.

All the efforts which ambition could dictate, or prudence devise, were now to be put in practice for the destruction of a state, whose only crime was their opposition to the conquests of Lewis XIV. Near two millions sterling were expended by that ambitious monarch in making preparations against the Dutch republic. Thirty men of war, of fifty guns each, joined the English fleet, which consisted of an hundred sail. The French monarch, accompanied by his brother the duke of Orleans, marched, at the head of one hundred and twelve thousand men, towards Maastricht and Chaleroi, on the frontiers of Spanish Flanders and Holland. The bishop of Munster, and the elector of Cologne, had about twenty thousand men. The prince of Condé and marshal Turenne were the principal generals of the French army: the duke of Luxembourg commanded under them: Vauban, the famous engineer, was appointed to conduct the sieges.

Against so formidable a force, commanded by such consummate generals, and furnished with immense treasures to bribe the commanders of garrisons, what had the republic of Holland to oppose? A young prince of a weak constitution, who had never seen a battle, and about twenty-five thousand ill-trained foldiers, who formed the whole military force of the country. In a word, the total annihilation of the republic appeared inevitable.

Lewis soon made himself master of all Guelderland, and the towns upon the Yssel. The inhabitants of Utrecht sent the keys of their city to the conqueror, and the whole province of that name capitulated. Lewis made a triumphal entry into Utrecht on the twentieth of June. The provinces of Holland and Zealand only remained to conquer, and Amsterdam itself seemed but to wait the hour of its slavery or destruction. A little more alacrity on the part of Lewis would have put that important fortress into his hands. The capital once taken, not only the republic itself must have fallen, but there would have been no longer such a state as Holland. Some of the richest families, and those who were zealous lovers of liberty, were preparing to fly their devoted country, and embark for Batavia.

Nor were the Dutch distressed in this manner by land only; the combined forces of France and England threatened the destruction of their marine power, and the total annihilation of their navy. The states had not, however, been negligent in fitting out their ships; and De Ruyter, with a fleet of ninety sail, was sent in quest of the English and French fleets, commanded by the duke of York, and the marshal d'Etrees. They were riding carelessly in Solebay, little expecting the appearance of a ship from an enemy, whose whole force was far from being sufficient to defend their own frontiers. Cornelius de Wit was on board, as deputy from the states. The English were very near being surprized; but recovering themselves, they slipped their cables, and stood out to meet the enemy. A dreadful engagement ensued, in which both the commanders and seamen displayed the greatest courage and conduct. The earl of Sandwich, who commanded under the duke of York, led the van, and was soon engaged in a close fight with the enemy. Several Dutch ships attacked him at once; but he bravely defended himself against their joint attempts, killed the Dutch admiral, Van Ghent, and beat off his ship. Astonished at the valour displayed by this gallant officer, and desirous of silencing the dreadful fire he kept up with such amazing vigour, three fire-ships were sent successively to destroy him; but he sunk them all, together with another capital ship of the enemy, that had ventured to lay him aboard. At last, when his ship was almost torn to pieces, and six hundred of his men were slain, another fire-ship grappled him, and he perished with the remainder of his crew. In the mean time, De Ruyter engaged the ship on board of which the duke of York had hoisted his flag, with the utmost fury, and one of the fiercest encounters recorded in history succeeded. At last the duke's ship was shattered, that he was obliged to leave her, and hoist his flag on board another. But he was so overpowered by the enemy, that had not Sir Joseph Jordan brought the Blue squadron to his relief, he must have been taken, with several ships that were closely engaged with the enemy. This reinforcement rendered the contest equal, and it was continued with the same fury till night obliged them to separate. The Dutch retired; nor did the English think it prudent to follow them.

Both sides claimed the victory; and, perhaps, with equal reason. The loss was greatest on the side of the English; but the Dutch first retired. De Wit, who knew that nothing less than a complete victory could save his country, thought it prudent to retire when he found that this was impossible to be obtained. The English complained loudly that the French were wanting in their duty, for they separated from the fleet, and fought only at a distance. This conduct was ascribed to secret orders given to the marshal d'Etrees. Nothing could tend more to promote the ambitious projects of Lewis, than the total destruction of both the English and Dutch fleets, while his own ships were spared.

The Dutch were now reduced to despair; and to add to their misfortunes, the state was distracted by the divisions which commonly arise among an unfortunate people, who impute to each other the calamities of their country. John de Wit was persuaded, that the only way of saving the small remains of the wretched republic, was by making a peace with the conqueror. Full of a republican spirit, and jealous of his personal authority, which had always been exerted for the good of his country, he dreaded the power of the prince of Orange, little less than the ambition of the French monarch. While the prince, who was equally attached to the interest of the state, exerted all his interest to induce the states to elect him stadtholder, an honour so long enjoyed by his ancestors. He strenuously opposed a peace with Lewis, as he knew it could now only be obtained on terms that must annihilate the power and opulence of the republic. But the interest of the pensionary prevailed; and a resolution was taken, in an assembly of the states, to sue for peace. Deputies were accordingly sent to the French camp, to implore mercy in the name of the republic, who, six months before, looked upon herself as the arbiter of kingdoms. Lewis received the deputies with an arrogance that was an insult upon humanity; but at length designed to dictate the terms on which he would permit the Dutch to exist as a state. His demands, however, were little better than articles of slavery; and a peace on such conditions was absolutely insupportable. Inspired with a desperate courage by the haughtiness of the conqueror, it was determined, that if a peace could be obtained on no better terms, to perish with their liberties.

The first step necessary to be taken, pursuant to this desperate resolution, was to stop the progress of the conqueror; and accordingly the sluices of the province of Holland were opened, whereby the whole country was laid under water. The eyes of the people were now fixed upon the young prince of Orange, whom they considered as the deliverer of their country: while the grand pensionary, by having prevailed upon the states to send deputies to the French king, was considered as the betrayer of the state. The fury of party zeal now rose to the greatest height; and Cornelius de Wit, being accused of a design to murder the prince, was committed to prison, where he underwent the most cruel torture, in the height of which he repeated those verses of Horace, which so elegantly express the duty of a true citizen. His brother, the pensionary, failed not to visit him in prison, determined to share his fate. The outrageous populace followed him, and glutted their brutal fury on the mangled bodies of these two illustrious citizens.

The murder of the De Wits extinguished, for a time, the party distinctions which had divided the state. The prince of Orange was declared stadholder, and shewed himself worthy of the power with which he was intrusted. He exhorted the citizens to firmness, assuring them that the other powers of Europe would not fail to send them assistance. He represented to them, that it was in vain to flatter themselves with being able to disarm, by submission, an enemy whose ambition would keep no measures: that now was the time to sacrifice every thing to support that precious liberty which their ancestors had purchased with their blood: that, for his own part, he would tread in the steps of his fathers, and devote himself, without reserve, to the preservation of the state. Buckingham, the English envoy, asking him whether he did not see that the republic was infallibly ruined, answered, with great vivacity, "I have one sure method of never seeing the ruin of my country; I will die in the last intrenchment."

His conduct shewed that he spoke the real sentiments of his heart. He exerted all his power against the common enemy. He overflowed all the passes by which the French could penetrate into the rest of the country. He sent envoys to the different courts of Europe; and by his negotiations, roused the emperor, the empire, the Spanish council, and the government of Flanders, from their lethargy; and even induced the court of England to be less desirous of supporting the ambitious designs of the French monarch. Affairs now began to wear a different aspect. Lewis entered Holland in the month of May; and before September, the greater part of the powers of Europe were forming a confederacy against him. Montercy, governor of Flanders, sent privately a few regiments to the assistance of the States; the emperor Leopold dispatched Montecuculli, at the head of twenty thousand men; and the elector of Brandenburg took the field with forty thousand troops, whom he paid himself. In a word, while the subjects of Lewis were every where erecting monuments of his conquests, the powers of Europe were forming confederacies for snatching them from his hands. They rightly considered the reduction of Holland as a prelude to their own slavery. It would be impossible, they thought, to defend themselves against the exorbitant power of France, should it be increased by so great an accession.

A.D. 1673. The states depended greatly on the English parliament; they were persuaded that the interest of the nation would prevail over the ambitious views of the court. Charles, for near two years, had been free from the uneasiness of parliamentary remonstrances; but the want of money rendered it absolutely necessary for him to summon that assembly. His speech to both houses at the opening of the session, full of confidence and cordiality, disguised the real sentiments of his heart. Shaftsbury, the chancellor, insisted on the necessity of carrying on the war against a republic so essentially an enemy to the English. "The parliament itself," said he, "acknowledged that Carthage was to be destroyed: the present hostilities therefore may more properly be called the war of the parliament, than that of the king." The commons, however, entertained a different opinion, and were determined that his majesty should purchase the supplies by particular compliances.

The cabal had usurped the whole power of the government, and the chancellor, contrary to the established custom, had issued writs for electing new members in the room of those who were deceased. The first vote of the parliament declared these elections void, and the members accordingly withdrew. It was now evident that there was a large majority against the court, and that without remarkable firmness in the king the whole plan formed by the cabal must fall to the ground, and a change in the ministry be the consequence. Shaftsbury, before he communicated his plan to Charles, had determined within himself, that if he found the king wanted resolution to execute it, he would immediately join the country party, in order to prevent a prosecution by the commons, as the adviser, or at least the promoter of a step that threatened the destruction of the constitution. The example of the earl of Clarendon was yet too recent to be forgotten, and he doubted not but his sovereign would as readily sacrifice him to the indignation of the parliament and people, as he had done that faithful servant.

The parliament now proceeded to take into consideration the proclamation of indulgence, by which the penal laws against non-conformists and catholics were suspended, and it was voted, that it tended to alter the constitution, and change the legislative power, which the two houses shared with the king. Charles at first appeared determined to support his declaration, and in case of resistance, to apply to France for assistance. But he now saw the danger of his resolution. He perceived that a civil war must be the consequence of his breaking with the parliament; and the remembrance of the miseries that had attended his family nearly affected him. His natural indolence, his love of pleasure and repose, added to his want of money, were motives too powerful to be withstood, and he determined to comply with the parliament. He, however, consulted the peers in order to give an air of deliberation to the business; after which he broke the seals of the obnoxious declaration with his own hand, and promised to assent to all bills that had a tendency to remove abuses.

Shaftsbury saw his danger, and immediately joined the country party, and his great talents soon placed him at the head of the opposition. The parliament were now determined to put the king's declaration to the proof. They passed a bill entitled, "An act to prevent the dangers which may happen from popish recusants," commonly called the Test Act, whereby all persons, enjoying any office, or place of trust or profit, were required to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and also an oath against transubstantiation in these terms, "I declare that I believe that there is no such thing as transubstantiation in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, either before or after consecration by any person whatever." They were likewise to receive the communion, according to the rights of the church of England, in some parish church. Nor were the parliament contented with passing these bills, they also presented two petitions concerning grievances; and the king having promised to redress them, they passed the money-bill, but without mentioning tioning any thing of the war, which they highly disapproved; but they added a clause to it, importing, That no papist should be capable of holding any public employment.

In consequence of the Test Act all the popish officers resigned their employments, and among the rest the duke of York his post of lord high-admiral. The lord Clifford also resigned his treasurer's staff, and died soon after. Shaftsbury was deprived of the seals, which were given to Sir Heneage Finch; and Sir Thomas Osborne, created earl of Danby, succeeded lord Clifford in the office of treasurer.

The duke of York had some time since lost his dutchess, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, and was now determined to marry Mary, sister to the duke of Modena, a princess educated in all the superstition of the Romish religion. This alliance was warmly opposed by the parliament, who, on this occasion, presented a petition to the king, conceived in the strongest terms, and expressive of their apprehensions of the dangerous consequences that might result from such a marriage. The duke of York, however, paid little regard to their petition. He declared he would not be contradicted in a measure he thought so essential to the happiness of his life. He accordingly married that princess on the twenty-first of November.

The war was still carried on with great vigour against the Dutch, and prince Rupert was appointed commander of the fleet, in the room of the duke of York. As soon as the prince had joined the French admiral, they failed in quest of the Dutch to force them to an engagement; and as the latter were far from declining the offer, a battle ensued, and proved very obstinate and very bloody; but without either gaining any very great advantage. The principal loss fell upon the French, whom the English, dissident of their attentions, took care to place under their own squadrons, and by that means exposed them to the thickest part of the fire of the enemy. This engagement was fought on the eighth of June; and was renewed on the fourteenth, when the fortune of the day remained as doubtful as before.

Both nations now exerted all their force, and seemed determined to put the whole to the event of a general engagement. The prince of Orange had found means to reconcile de Ruyter and Van Tromp, a son worthy of the gallant father from whom he sprung. These two celebrated admirals now commanded the Dutch fleet, and on the eleventh of August the battle began at the mouth of the Texel. De Ruyter singled out prince Rupert, Tromp opposed himself to Sir Edward Sprague, the English vice-admiral, and Brankert, the Dutch rear-admiral bore up to attack d'Etrees. The engagement was conducted with astonishing fury and emulation by the English and Dutch officers; but the French kept at a distance and left the English to sustain the whole fury of the battle. In vain did prince Rupert make a signal to d'Etrees to bear down to his assistance; he took no notice of any thing that passed, and kept his whole squadron far from the scene of action. Sprague, when the battle began, had hoisted his flag on board the Royal Prince; but she being soon disabled he left her, and displayed his flag on board the St. George, while Tromp for a similar reason, quitted his own ship, and went on board the Comet; and the fight was immediately renewed with the same fury as before. Both the ships of these gallant commanders were soon shattered, and Sprague was leaving the St. George in order to hoist his flag on board a third ship, when a cannon ball passing through his ship, struck his boat, and the gallant admiral was drowned. It is worthy of remark, that in all the engagements these brave admirals always singled out each other, as the only antagonist worthy of them; and when the brave Sprague perished Van Tromp generously paid him the tribute of a tear.

Had the French done their duty a total victory must have been the consequence. But by this refusal in the Frenchman, and his own ships having received so much damage by the enemy, prince Rupert could not pursue the advantages he had gained by his valour. He therefore stood away for the English coast, leaving the victory undecided. The Dutch, however, gained every thing they wished. By the retreat of the English, a rich fleet of East-India ships, which had been for some time expected, arrived unmolested in their ports. An expedition which had been planned against the coast of Zealand, was also rendered abortive. This was the last engagement fought betwixt those rival nations. The English became very desirous of putting an end to a war which had exhausted them of men and money, without the least prospect of honour or advantage.

The parliament met on the twentieth of October; but the king, finding he had nothing to expect from their deliberations, sent the usher of the black rod to the commons, commanding their attendance in the house of peers. But before they would suffer him to enter, they voted, that a standing army is a grievance; that the evil counsellors about the king are a grievance; that the duke of Lauderdale is a grievance, and not fit to be employed in any office of trust. They had hardly finished these votes before the usher of the black rod entered, the speaker leaped from the chair, and the house broke up in the utmost confusion.

In the mean time the Dutch began to recover from their astonishment. Lewis by not destroying the forts, as Condé and Turenne had proposed, greatly weakened his own army by the number of garrisons he was obliged to detach. The prince of Orange, by a masterly piece of military conduct, joined the army of the empire, and the French were obliged to evacuate the three Dutch provinces with as much precipitation as they had conquered them; but not before the inhabitants had paid dear for their deliverance. The intendant Robert had raised in the single province of Utrecht no less than sixteen hundred and sixty-eight florins. All the triumphant monuments of Lewis's conquest erected in the Netherlands were destroyed, and that prince, considered by all the powers of Europe as one who had enjoyed the honours of a transient triumph with too much precipitation and pride; which had now involved him in a bloody war with the united forces of the empire, Spain and Holland.

A. D. 1674. On the seventh of January the parliament met agreeable to their prorogation, and it was soon evident that they had not changed their opinions during the recess. Aware of the dangerous designs of Charles, they were determined to exert all their power to render his plans of arbitrary power abortive. They seriously debated on the grievances of the nation, and both houses were persuaded that there was a necessity for their being removed. They began with addressing the king for a general fast to implore the blessing of the Almighty on their endeavours against the dangerous errors of popery; and then resolved to grant no more supplies till the grievances they enumerated were redressed, and the protestant religion, as well as the liberties and properties of the people, secured. Both houses joined in an address to the king, for the removal of the duke of Lauderdale from his majesty's presence and councils for ever. The commons examined the duke of Buckingham on several particulars of government, and not being satisfied with his answers, they passed the same vote against him, as they had done against Lauderdale. Arlington was next questioned; but his answers were so satisfactory to the house, that notwithstanding an impeachment was prepared against him, they thought proper to drop the prosecution.

These vigorous proceedings intimidated Charles; who, finding it would be impossible to carry on the war without supplies, began to listen to the terms proposed by the states general, for a separate peace. The French minister exerted all his power to keep Charles firm to his engagements, but in vain. The king chose rather to reconcile himself to his people and and parliament, by agreeing to a peace they so much desired, than to depend upon France for support. A treaty was accordingly signed with the states, by which they again gave up the honours of the flag, and agreed to pay three hundred thousand pounds towards defraying the expence of the king's naval armaments. Several attempts were made for concluding an offensive and defensive alliance with Holland. Most of the European princes solicited this measure as the only infallible means of putting a stop to the alarming progress of the French monarch. The two houses of parliament supported these solicitations with all their power. Their hatred to the French was indeed so great, that they would gladly have relinquished the enjoyments of the new peace for a time, to see their king armed against the common disturber of the tranquillity of Europe; nor would they have thought any supplies too great in order to prosecute a war which had so evidently tended to increase the good of the public. Charles, however, paid no regard to their solicitations. Prompted equally by his hatred to the Dutch, and the hopes of still receiving a powerful assistance from France, he refused to sacrifice his ally to the resentment of his enemies. He suffered ten thousand of his men to engage in the service of that crown, and made a merit with Lewis of the necessity which had drawn him from his alliance, and offered his mediation for concluding a general peace.

Soon after the treaty with the states was signed, Sir William Temple was again sent to Holland with the title of ambassador. But before he embarked he nobly represented to the king the inconvenience which the system of the Cabal must occasion; how difficult, not to say impossible, it was, to establish in England the government and religion of France; that the genius and principles of the people were not to be suddenly or easily changed; that force of arms alone could compel them to submit to a yoke they beheld with horror; that an English army could never be prevailed upon to promote those ends; that the catholics did not compose the one hundredth part of the nation; that foreign troops could not be levied or maintained in any considerable number; and that if a few were retained, they could do nothing more than excite the hatred and revolt of the people. He concluded with referring him to the observations of Gourville, a French writer much esteemed by Charles, who says, "A king of England that chuses to be a man of his people, is the greatest monarch in the world; but if he chuses to be something more, he is nothing at all." Though the king was highly displeased at this discourse, he knew how to dissemble. "Tis very well," said he, "I will be the man of my people." Events soon shewed that he spoke, not the dictates of his heart.

The defection of England was followed by that of the bishop of Munster, and even the elector of Cologne. Lewis was, however, successful in several places. Francke Comté was again reduced. Turenne was able, with a much inferior force, to baffle all the attempts of the allied army in Alsace. By a sudden and unexpected march he attacked and defeated, at Sintzheim, the duke of Lorraine and Copara, the imperial general. Seventy thousand Germans invaded Alsace, and took up their quarters in that province. He attacked and routed a body of the enemy at Mulhausen. He drove from Colmar the elector of Brandenburg. He obtained a new victory at Turkheim: and having cleared the province entirely of the allies, he compelled them to repass the Rhine with great loss and dishonour. The French were not so fortunate on the side of Flanders where the prince of Orange commanded. That young general shewed himself nearly equal to the great Condé, in the bloody battle of Senefse. "The prince of Orange," said Condé, "has conducted himself through the whole action like a great general, except in exposing his life like a young soldier."

A.D. 1675. After a recess of fourteen months the parliament assembled on the thirteenth of April, and immediately voted a bill to be brought in for preventing the growth of popery; in which it was declared, that the saying mass should be a sufficient evidence of a person being a popish priest; and that a penalty should be inflicted on all who assisted at the catholic service. They also framed a bill declaring it treason to levy money without consent of parliament; another for vacating the seats of members who accepted of offices; and a third for securing the liberty of the subjects, and preventing their being transported as prisoners to distant islands.

On the other hand the ministry exerted all their influence in the upper house, and passed a bill for a new test, by which every member of parliament, and all persons in office, were to take an oath in the following terms: "I declare, that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatever, to take up arms against the king; and that I abhor the maxim, as treasonable, which holds, that one may take up arms, by the authority of the king, against his person, or against those who act by virtue of his commission; and I swear that I will never use any effort to change or alter the government in church or state." This bill was vigorously opposed; some maintained that it was founded upon false principles; others, that it would revive dangerous disputes: even in the house of lords, it was carried only by two voices. The opposition would have been stronger in the commons, had not an unforeseen quarrel between the two houses suspended all business of that kind. Dr. Shirley having appealed to the house of lords from a decree in chancery given in favour of Sir John Fagg, a member of the commons, the latter asserted, that this proceeding was a violation of their privileges; that none of their members could be cited to appear before the lords; and that the lords could not even receive appeals. On the other hand, the lords resolved, "That it was the undoubted rights of the lords in judicature to determine, in time of parliament, appeals from inferior courts, where the members of either house were concerned, that there might not be a failure of justice." Several conferences passed between the two houses, but with so much rancour and animosity, that the king, alarmed for the consequences, came to the house of peers on the ninth of June; and after reproaching both branches of the legislature for carrying their differences to such an indecent height, he prorogued the parliament to the thirteenth of October.

The coffee-houses, whither the people resorted in crowds, were filled with censures on the government. The ministry was at once alarmed and exasperated; and a proclamation was published, commanding all the coffee-houses to be shut up: a strange method of quieting the fears of the people, by giving them fresh cause of complaint. The keepers of the coffee-houses promised not to suffer any seditious discourse in their houses, and on this condition they were soon opened again. But the general discontent continued to increase.

The war on the continent was still carried on with great vigour, and the French arms were, in general, successful. Though Turenne fell by a cannon-ball, and the prince of Condé had left the army; yet the defeat of the marshal du Crecqui, at Confabrick, near Treves, was the only misfortune of that kind the French had experienced for sixty years.

On the thirteenth of October, the king opened the session of parliament with a very short speech; in which, after recommending unity between the two houses, he demanded a supply sufficient for building several new ships, and clearing off the anticipations of his revenue. The commons absolutely refused to give any money for paying off the debts of the crown, but voted three hundred thousand pounds for defraying the expence of building twenty ships of war, and appropriated the duties of tonnage and poundage to the support of the navy. But the business of the nation was soon after suspended by the revival of the dispute dispute between the two houses, in the case of Shirley and Fagg. The commons were as resolute and determined as ever in maintaining their privileges; and the king, to prevent the consequences that might ensue from these alarming disputes, prorogued the parliament for fifteen months.

A. D. 1677. When the two houses met, pursuant to their prorogation, they acted as if they had forgotten these unhappy heats and animosities which had put an end to the two last sessions. The commons voted his majesty six hundred thousand pounds for the use of the navy, and a continuance of the duty of excise upon ale and brandy for three years. In a word, every thing seemed to promise a happy union between the king and both houses of parliament. But unfortunately, these pleasing appearances were soon over; the rapid progress of the French on the continent filled the nation with the most alarming apprehensions. At the same time, it was evident, that Charles had it in his power to give peace to Europe whenever he pleased, by declaring his intention to join the allies, unless Lewis would accept of a peace upon reasonable terms. The parliament had therefore recourse to every method to induce the king to take up arms. They promised that the most affluent supplies should be the reward of his compliance. This offer was a powerful motive; he seemed willing to comply with the wishes of his people. He gave the princess Mary, daughter to the duke of York, to the prince of Orange in marriage, and displayed some proofs of firmness with regard to France. He even made preparations for war with the supplies he received from parliament. But ever fluctuating and irresolute, sometimes gained by the promises of Lewis, and sometimes absorbed in the charms of pleasure, he neither fulfilled the expectations of the English, nor that of the allies.

A. D. 1678. Weary of the war, and finding there were no hopes of any assistance from England, the States General signed a separate peace with Lewis, on the tenth of August. By this treaty it was agreed, that each party should retain what they were possessed of, except Maastricht and its dependencies, which Lewis was to restore to the Dutch, and were indeed all the French possessed of their conquests in the United Provinces; and by a secret article, Lewis engaged to restore all that belonged to the prince of Orange in France, Franche Comté, Charleroi, and Flanders. Spain and the Empire soon after accepted the conditions, and peace was restored in every part of Europe.

This peace, which was signed at Nimeguen, furnishes a memorable instance how greatly projects are contradicted by events. Holland, against whom alone the war was undertaken, and whose ruin seemed inevitable, was so far from losing any thing, that she gained a barrier; while every other power that had interposed to snatch her from destruction, found themselves considerable losers, and obliged to accept the terms prescribed them by Holland. It may, however, with great truth, be affirmed, that it was owing to the fault of the English monarch alone, that the allies had not a more advantageous peace; since the parliament were both ready and desirous to furnish very ample supplies for carrying on the war against France, would Charles have acted agreeable either to the interest of Europe in general, or of England in particular. This strange conduct can be ascribed only to his passionate desire of executing his darling scheme, that of rendering himself the absolute master of his people. Some have accused him of labouring to introduce the popish religion into England; but this is a crime of which he was not guilty. All religions were alike to Charles; and the concessions he often made in favour of the catholics, seem rather to have been the effect of his love for his brother, and ready compliance with any councils he adopted, than his own attachment to that particular mode of faith. He cared not whether popery or protestantism was the reigning religion in England, if he could enjoy his beloved ease and pleasure.

During these transactions, Scotland had groaned beneath a load of tyranny. The duke of Lauderdale, in quality of royal commissioner, had been sent into that kingdom. By his arts and influence, he prevailed upon the Scottish parliament to declare, that the whole exterior power of the church was vested in the crown. He also induced them to establish a militia of twenty-two thousand men, ready to act in every enterprise where either the power or the grandeur of the sovereign were concerned. The duke was as fond of persecution as his master was of toleration. The former strained the laws in favour of the first, and the latter suspended their force in favour of the second. He did not reflect, that persecution was the most dangerous of all remedies against the presbyterian fanaticism disseminated thro' every part of Scotland. It would be endless to particularize all the instances of oppression in that unhappy kingdom. Let it suffice to say, that they were at once cruel and impolitic. Because the law for prohibiting conventicles, had called them "Seminaries of Rebellion," he treated those counties as rebellious where the conventicles most abounded; and the troops he detached into those parts were guilty of the most horrid and shameful disorders. By an old Scottish law, every person who was accused, and did not appear, was liable to be condemned for contumacy, and outlawed; and whoever afterwards held the least communication with them, though only to give them the common assistances of humanity, was liable to the same penalties. This law, too odious to be executed with rigour, occasioned a great number of outlawries. Fearful of appearing in a court where they could expect no mercy, they incurred, perhaps, a greater punishment by their absence. In a word, the whole nation became a prey to the rapacity of the duke and duteches of Lauderdale. Fearing that the complaints of the people might find their way to the throne, Lauderdale forbade all who were possessed of lands in Scotland from leaving that kingdom. Bishop Burnet tells us, that Charles one day said to his friends, "I hear that Lauderdale behaves very ill to my people in Scotland, but I do not find he has done any thing contrary to my interest." It is no wonder, when a prince makes a distinction between his own interest and that of his people, that the people follow the example.

We are now come to a period, when a transaction happened which has given occasion to many politicians to exercise their critical sagacity in supporting the truth, or exposing the falsity of this remarkable incident, according as they were attached to this or that party. It must, indeed, be granted, that the whole is replete with contradictions, so that it is impossible, perhaps, to unravel the whole. It will be sufficient, however, for an historian, to give a plain narrative of facts, and leave the reader to make his own reflections. The oppressions of the duke of Lauderdale in Scotland; the desire Charles had always shewn with regard to procuring the catholics the free exercise of their religion; and his secret connections with Lewis XIV. which even the offer of the largest supplies could not induce him to abandon; all tended to confirm the people in an opinion, that he intended to introduce popery and arbitrary power.

When the minds of the people are thus prepossessed, it is no wonder that they listen to every thing that has a tendency to confirm their suspicions. At this juncture, a conspiracy for establishing the catholic religion was discovered by one Titus Oates. This man was originally a clergyman of the church of England, and of a very indifferent character. At length he turned papist, and lived for some time with the Jesuits at St. Omers. Thence he went into Spain, where he was admitted to the councils of the Jesuits; but being at length discharged from that society, his resentment induced him to turn informer. He now gave out, that his conversion to popery was a mere pretence, to enable him to discover the secrets of the Jesuits; and the substance of his depositions was, that the pope claimed the sovereignty of England, and had commissioned the Jesuits to exercise his rights. In consequence of which, the general of the order had, by patents under the pope's seal, disposed of the principal offices, civil and military. That in a council of fifty Jesuits, held at London, it was unanimously resolved to kill the king; and that father de la Chaise, confessor to Lewis XIV. had promised a reward of ten thousand pounds to the regicide: that the crown was to be offered to the duke of York, on condition of his submitting to receive it from the pope; but on his refusing, he was to share the fate of his brother. They (the Jesuits) had formed a plan for setting fire to the city of London, and executing a general massacre of the protestants in every part of the kingdom. In a word, that they designed to overturn the whole constitution, and establish by blood and desolation the dominion of popery.

It is impossible to describe the universal confusion of the nation, when the information given by Oates was known. Coleman, secretary to the dutchess of York, being arrested, copies of his correspondence with father de la Chaise, the pope's nuncio, and some other papists, increased the alarm, and seemed to confirm the truth of Oates's narrative. In one of Coleman's letters to the French king's confessor, is the following passage: "We have a great work on our hands; nothing less than the conversion of the three kingdoms: God has given us a prince (meaning the duke of York) who is marvelously ambitious of being the instrument of this design; but as we must expect to meet with opposition, it behoves us to secure all the assistance possible." And in another letter he says, "Money will persuade the king to every thing: there is nothing we may not obtain from him by this means. Money has an irresistible influence over him; that logic has more power in his court than all the arguments in the world." He therefore desired de la Chaise to furnish him with three hundred thousand pounds, which would, he said, engage the king to dissolve the parliament, whose resolutions were unfavourable to France. A new incident seemed to confirm the guilt of the Jesuits, whose known bigotry had before rendered it probable. Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, the justice of peace who had taken the deposition of Oates, was found dead in a ditch, with his rings on his fingers, and his money in his pockets; a sufficient proof that he had not been killed by robbers. This assassination, the author of which was never discovered, was considered as the act of the papists. The whole city was in alarm: every individual thought himself in danger, and the same precautions were taken as if an enemy had been at the gates. Whether Charles believed the truth of this conspiracy, or thought the whole a forgery of Oates, is uncertain; but he mentioned it to both houses, and recommended vigilance to the magistrates in discovering and prosecuting all who were concerned in so black an action. Danby, the prime minister, moved, in the house of lords, that the affair might be taken into consideration, and his motion was agreed to. Oates was called before the house, and strictly examined; and on his persisting that the narrative he had before given to Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey was strictly true, the house resolved, that the popish recusants had formed an infernal plot against the king, the government, and the protestant religion. An apartment in Whitehall, with a pension of twelve thousand pounds a year, was assigned to Oates; and every method that prudence could dictate, was taken to discover the particulars of this alarming contrivance.

While the parliament were engaged in this business, one Bedloe accused several papists, in the service of the queen, of being concerned in the murder of Godfrey. He also added some circumstances to the depositions of Oates. Several noblemen, accused by these informers, were apprehended, among whom were the earl of Powis, the lord viscount Stafford, and the lords Arundel of Wardour, Petre, and Bel-lasis, who were sent to the Tower.

The depositions of Oates and Bedloe being published, excited such a ferment in the kingdom, that Charles was obliged to issue a proclamation, commanding all popish recusants, under the severest penalty, to repair to their own houses, and not venture farther than five miles from thence, without a particular licence. Another proclamation was also published, offering a reward to any person who should apprehend a popish priest or jesuit. The test which declared popery to be idolatry, was now instituted, and all who refused to take it were excluded from parliament. The duke of York, with tears in his eyes, requested of the upper house an exemption in his favour, declaring, that his religion should be altogether between God and himself, and never appear in his public conduct. It was with difficulty he carried his point by two voices. "I would not" said one of the lords, "have any thing of popish principles here; neither man, woman, dog, nor cat."

The commons proceeded still farther. Finding that Sir Joseph Williamson, secretary of Scotland, had countersigned several commissions to popish recusants, and being a member of the lower house, they committed him to the Tower. Charles, highly incensed at this commitment of his servant, without making any application to him, immediately ordered him to be released. He, however, revoked the commissions that had given offence, and the commons were satisfied with this instance of royal condescension.

During these transactions in parliament, Montague, ambassador in France, hastily returned, and laid open a new scene. He produced a letter written by the high-treasurer Danby, during the late negotiations for a peace on the continent: by which it appeared, that the king had, in some measure, sold the interests both of England and the allies. Among other particulars, it imported, that if the conditions of the peace were accepted by the allies, Charles was to be paid six millions by France, within three years after the treaty should be signed. Danby, who, it seems, disapproved of writing this letter, endeavoured to secure himself, by procuring it to be authenticated by the king, who had added, with his own hand, "This letter is written by my order, C. R." The commons now no longer doubted that Charles had acted in concert with France; and though they perceived that the letter reflected greater dishonour on the king than his minister, yet, in order to discover the whole truth of this provoking mystery, they impeached Danby of high-treason, but the lords refused to put him under arrest. The dispute now became violent between the two houses; and Charles, to prevent the disagreeable consequences that might result from a breach between two branches of the legislature, first prorogued, and afterwards dissolved the parliament, now justly suspicious and dissatisfied, though at first very favourable to the interests of the crown. The alteration in the sentiments of the commons was wholly owing to the conduct of the king, and the spirit of the nation.

The trials of the conspirators now wholly engrossed the attention of the public, and Coleman was the first that felt the weight of popular indignation. On the twenty-seventh of November, he was brought to the bar of the king's bench, where lord chief-justice Scoggs presided. The evidences against him were Oates, Bedloe, and his own letters. Oates and Bedloe swore that he had received a patent from the general of the Jesuits, to act as secretary of state; and that he had agreed to the assassination of the king. He was accordingly convicted of high-treason, and suffered on the third of December, but declared his innocence to the last. Father Ireland also suffered, though he alledged he was in Staffordshire at the very time the accusers swore he attended the meetings of the conspirators.

conspirators in London. Every Jesuit was considered as a villain, and that lying and mental reservation made a part of the principles of their order. Several other persons were impeached, among whom were Thomas Pickering, a priest; John Grove, a lay-brother; Thomas Whitebread, provincial of the Jesuits in England, and who, according to the evidence of Oates, was to have been created archbishop of Canterbury; Harecourt, Fenwick, Gaven, and Turner, all Jesuits; and Langhorne, a catholic lawyer. These were all found guilty, and executed.

A.D. 1679. A new parliament being summoned to meet on the sixth of March, it was soon evident that a very considerable majority was on the side of the country party. Charles was alarmed; and in order to ingratiate himself with this new assembly, he prevailed upon his brother, the duke of York, to submit to an order for his leaving England. He deprived Danby of the treasurer's staff, and gave it to the earl of Lauderdale; but in order to prevent the former, either through resentment or fear, from discovering secrets he wished to be concealed, he granted him a free pardon.

Shaftsbury, and the other leaders of the popular party, determined to avail themselves of the popular commotions, and the majority in the commons, to carry into execution the plan they had formed for excluding the duke of York from the throne. Shaftsbury's object was to give the English crown to the duke of Monmouth, one of Charles's natural sons. It was already reported, that a marriage had been contracted between the king and Lucy Walters, the duke of Monmouth's mother. It therefore became necessary for Charles either to disapprove or confirm this report; and accordingly, he solemnly declared, in full council, that it was false, and that Monmouth was illegitimate. The duke of York, who had obtained assurances from the king, before his departure from England, that he would support his succession to the crown, took up his residence at Brussels.

Foiled in this attempt, the commons renewed the impeachment of Danby, notwithstanding the king had granted him a free pardon, and assured the house that the minister had done nothing but by his particular orders. They insisted, that a pardon from the crown was no arrest of judgment with them; and it was voted, that if Danby did not appear on a day appointed, he should be declared guilty. He did not chuse to provoke farther the indignation of the commons; he appeared, and was committed to the Tower.

Alarmed by these violent proceedings, Charles summoned Sir William Temple, whose virtues he knew were revered by the public, to attend his duty in council. More attracted by the charms of philosophy than those of ambition, Temple had retired into the country, where he cultivated his favourite studies in a quiet retreat. But he no sooner received the royal mandate, than he hastened to court, always preferring the good of his country to his own. He proposed to form a council, composed chiefly of the favourites of the people. By this means (said he) the parliament will be less assuming, or, at least, we shall have a strong party in the house against the discontented and the factious. His reasons were thought to be well founded, and the scheme was carried into execution. But, contrary to his advice, Charles appointed Shaftsbury president of this new council. The king flattered himself, that by conferring so honourable a post on that dangerous man, he would become a friend to the measures of the court. He was mistaken. Shaftsbury perceiving that the king's conduct towards him was less the effect of sincerity than policy, changed not his conduct. He cultivated a still closer correspondence with the leaders of the opposition; and by being acquainted with all the secrets of government, became a more dangerous enemy than ever.

Having acquired so able a leader, the commons seemed determined to carry their resentment to the greatest lengths. They resolved, that the duke of York's zeal for popery, and the hopes of seeing him on the throne, occasioned popish conspiracies. The king, who saw the design of this resolution, endeavoured to prevent it, by proposing conciliating measures. He offered to pass a bill for restricting the power of a catholic prince, if ever one of that persuasion should fill the English throne. He was not to have the right of conferring church dignities. The members of the privy-council, the judges, the lord-lieutenants of counties, and their deputies, together with all the officers of the navy, were neither to be appointed nor removed without consent of parliament. These extraordinary concessions, which must so greatly have limited the prerogative, were not sufficient to appease the house, which was constantly enflamed by the cabals of Shaftsbury.

It was therefore resolved by a considerable majority to bring in what was called, "The Exclusion Bill," by which it was declared, "That the crowns of England and Ireland belonged to the next heir, the duke of York excepted; that if he appeared in either of these kingdoms, he should be declared guilty of treason; and that those who defended his title should be deemed enemies and traitors." Nor was this the only popular act of the commons; they expelled all such as possessed lucrative offices, in order to weaken still farther the influence of the crown. They declared standing armies, and even the royal guards, illegal; and they passed the famous Habeas Corpus bill, which is still considered as the principal security of the subject. By virtue of this noble act, no person can be sent to prison beyond the sea. No judge can refuse a prisoner his habeas corpus, which obliges the goaler to produce the prisoner before any court the writ shall appoint, and there shew cause for the imprisonment. The prisoner is to be tried at the time appointed; and if he is discharged by a court of justice, he cannot be imprisoned again upon the same account. This bill soon after passed the upper house, and received the royal assent.

Having passed these bills, the commons resumed the prosecution of Danby; and resolved, that to maintain the validity of the royal pardon in his case, was an infringement of their privileges. They also demanded, that the bishops, who were considered as entirely devoted to the court, should absent themselves during this trial. This was opposed by the upper house; and the commons prepared a remonstrance. Charles was alarmed by these proceedings; and fearful lest they should present a remonstrance to him, which might have the most dangerous consequences, he repaired to the house of lords on the twenty-seventh of May; and after giving the royal assent to five bills, he prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of August. By this means the exclusion bill was dropped for a time, and the schemes of Shaftsbury rendered abortive.

The presbyterians in Scotland were treated with as much rigour as the catholics in England. They bore their persecutions for a long time; but at last, seeing no prospect of an end to their miseries, they lost all patience, and determined to take a full revenge on their persecutors. Sharp, archbishop of St. Andrews, who had made his fortune by deserting their party, and was now become as great a persecutor as Lauderdale himself, was marked out for destruction. A large body of the covenanters accordingly lay in ambush for him; and, as he was returning in his coach from the council at Edinburgh, they attacked him near a little village called Magus, about two miles from St. Andrews: they immediately dragged him out of his carriage, and, regardless of the prayers, tears, and supplications of his daughter, who happened to be with him, put him to death in the most inhuman and brutal manner.

This assassination, considered as an action worthy of the faithful, was the signal for the covenanters to fly to arms. They accordingly assembled from every quarter, proclaimed the covenant at Rutherglen, surprized surprized the city of Glasgow, issued a proclamation, commanding the magistrates to drive all archbishops, bishops, and curates, out of the kingdom immediately; and inviting all their brethren to join them, and finish the good work they had so happily begun. They were soon joined by a vast multitude of people; but instead of confining themselves to the redress of grievances, they fell to plundering the adjacent country. This gave time to the magistrates to provide for the security of Edinburgh. The duke of Monmouth was sent, at the head of an army, to reduce them, and soon executed his commission. He came up with them at Bothwell-bridge; and falling upon them with incredible fury, soon gained a complete victory. Near a thousand of the insurgents were left dead on the field of battle, and twelve hundred taken prisoners, among whom were several of those concerned in the murder of archbishop Sharp. These were all hanged up immediately; a few more were afterwards tried and executed; but the greatest part were sent to the plantations. Monmouth, desirous of gaining the affections of the Scots, treated the people with great humanity.

While this rebellion subsisted in Scotland, the king was seized with a violent fever, which threw the whole kingdom into the utmost confusion. The council assembled; and notwithstanding the opposition of Shaftsbury, and several other members of the country party, they resolved to send for the duke of York from Brussels. He soon arrived; but, in the interval, the king was pretty well recovered. The opposition was not, however, idle, during the king's sickness: they demanded that the parliament should be immediately assembled; and the court party, as a counterpoise to their petitions, presented the most respectable addresses. This opposition in the two parties gave occasion to the introduction of the names of Whig and Tory. The former, which had before been given to the Scotch fanatics, was now given to the opposition; and the latter, which had been originally applied to the rebels in Ireland, was now applied to the courtiers. These odious appellations served no other purpose than that of fostering malignity and discord, and of widening the breach, already too large, between the two parties.

The behaviour of Monmouth in Scotland alarmed the duke of York, who used every method in his power to procure the disgrace of that popular nobleman. He succeeded in his attempts, and Monmouth was obliged to retire to the continent; while he himself, under pretence of quieting the minds of the English, obtained permission to retire into Scotland, but made himself more enemies than friends in that kingdom. Shaftsbury, whose designs were now sufficiently known, was dismissed from his post of president of the council, and the earl of Radnor was appointed in his room. The earl of Essex resigned his post as treasurer, and Lawrence Hyde was appointed in his room. Lord Russel, one of the most popular and virtuous men in the kingdom, quitted the board, and Sir William Temple retired into the country.

The papists, exasperated at the prosecutions carrying on against them, determined to be revenged upon their prosecutors, and turn the late odium from themselves to the presbyterians. They had accordingly recourse to one Dangerfield, a fellow who had suffered almost every punishment that the law can inflict on the most abandoned miscreant. This man, who enjoyed the first place in the chronicles of infamy, was tutored for the purpose. He was confined in Newgate for debt when he was pitched upon as the leader in this scene of action. The catholics released him, and found him sufficient employment. He pretended to have been privy to a design for destroying the king and royal family, and changing the government into a commonwealth. The king and his brother countenanced the information, and rewarded him for his discovery with a sum of money; but certain papers which he produced as evidences of his assertions, appearing to be forged by himself, he was sent to prison. His character was alone sufficient to create suspicions; all his haunts were ordered to be searched; and in the house of one Mrs. Collier, a Roman catholic, his particular friend, they found the model of the plot fairly written in a book, tied with a ribband, and concealed in a meal-tub. From this incident it was called the Meal-tub Plot. Finding the whole discovered, the miscreant made a general confession. He said the whole had been contrived by the counsels of Powis, the earl of Castlemain, and the five lords confined in the Tower, in order to invalidate the evidences of Oates, Bedloe, and others, against the papists. He added, that he was instructed to accuse the dukes of Monmouth and Buckingham, the earls of Essex, Hallifax, and others, of being concerned in a conspiracy against the king and the duke of York. This discovery being made, lord Castlemain and lady Powis were committed to the Tower; and the people did not fail to censure both the king and his brother with being concerned in this perfidious scheme.

A. D. 1680. The new parliament met on the twenty-sixth of January, when the king endeavoured to inspire the members with sentiments of unanimity, so necessary for the public welfare. "All Europe," said he in his speech at the opening of the session, "has its eyes on this assembly, and seems to think its fate involved in it, as well as ours. Let us beware of strengthening our enemies, and disheartening our friends by unseasonable disputes. Should these arise, the reproach will not fall upon me, for I have neglected nothing that might contribute to keep you in peace while I live, and to leave you so when I die." But the commons were far from entering into these views: they began with acts of violence against the Tories: no respect was paid to the habeas corpus bill. Arbitrary imprisonments became so common, that the whole nation complained of the violence. One Stowel had the courage to resist an officer of justice, who attempted to imprison him by order of the house. He said, in his defence, that he knew no law by virtue of which he could be deprived of his liberty. The commons did not think proper to proceed any farther; and in order to free themselves from the embarrassment, they gave out, that Stowel was sick, and they had granted him a month for his recovery. They now revived the exclusion bill, and sent it up to the lords for their concurrence. A violent debate succeeded, in which the eloquence of Shaftsbury was eclipsed by that of Hallifax, his nephew, a zealous partizan of the court. At last the question was put, and the bill was rejected by a considerable majority. This decision rendered all the hopes of the commons abortive; and they discharged their resentment on some catholic peers, whom they impeached as abettors of the popish plots. Five of them had been, for some time, confined in the Tower. The first they attacked was the old lord Stafford. Oates deposed, that he had seen a commission sent to him, signed by father Oliva, general of the Jesuits. Two other witnesses swore, that he had engaged to kill the king; and Stafford was found guilty by his peers upon a majority of twenty-four voices. His courage, supported by conscious innocence, did not forsake him in the dreadful trial. Being very old and infirm, on going to his execution, he desired a cloak: "I may tremble with cold," said he; "but, thank heaven, I shall never tremble through fear." He declared, on the scaffold, his abhorrence of the corruptions of the church of Rome. "I die," said he, "in hopes that the delusion will soon vanish, and that truth will oblige the world to do me justice at last." "We believe you, my lord," replied the weeping populace; "God bless your lordship." The executioner was melted into tears, and it was with the utmost difficulty he performed his duty. The circumstances of this execution shook the general belief of the conspiracy; and though it still continued to alarm alarm the people, no more blood was shed upon that account. The commons perceived the passions of the people were turned against them; and they began to act with less resolution.

They were, however, still determined to pursue the plan they had formed, and flattered themselves the flexibility of Charles, and his necessities for money, would at last render them successful. They accordingly proposed several inflammatory bills; and at last voted, that they would grant no supplies till the exclusion bill was passed into a law. Convinced that nothing was now to be expected, Charles dissolved the parliament.

A.D. 1681. But though he had thus abruptly parted with one assembly, he hoped to have better success with another; and accordingly summoned a new parliament to meet at Oxford, where the unfavourable dispositions of the capital could have no effect on the members. This measure occasioned the strongest resentment in the citizens. The old members were re-chosen, and thanked by their constituents for their enquiry into the popish conspiracy, and for their attempt to exclude the duke of York from the throne: "for (added they) we look upon him as the principal cause of that ruin which threatens the nation." The duke of Monmouth, at the head of fifteen peers, opposed the design of holding the parliament at Oxford; and said in his petition, "That the two houses would be exposed to the swords of the papists and their adherents, several of whom had crept even into the king's guards." This was followed by a more open attack; the spirit of rebellion no longer hid itself under the mantle of darkness. The heads of the party arrived at Oxford strongly escorted; and the representatives of London in particular were followed by crowds of citizens, with cockades, on which were written, "No popery, no slavery." In a word, both parties endeavoured to make a pompous display of their strength; and the meeting of this parliament had rather the appearance of those in the distracted times of Henry VI. at Clarendon, Oxford, and Coventry, than the peaceable and amicable meeting of the sovereign and his people.

Exasperated at these appearances, Charles began to exert his authority with a vigour of which he was thought incapable. He opened the session with a noble and elegant speech; in which, after complaining of the disrespectful proceedings of the last parliament, which were such he said, as few princes besides himself would have borne with equal patience; he declared, that as it was neither his desire nor intention to exercise arbitrary power over them, so he would not allow it to be exercised over himself. He again inculcated moderation in their debates, as it was by that means alone the ends of the nation, who had deputed them as representatives, could be answered. He told them he was willing to give them every satisfaction in his power, with regard to their fears of a popish successor, by joining with them to establish any practical scheme for putting the government entirely into the hands of protestants, during the reign of such a prince. In a word, that as he would, on his part, perform every thing that could reasonably be desired of him, so he expected that they should lay aside their animosities, and concur with him in that salutary intention; and not, by a revival of their past irregularities, inspire him with a disgust to parliaments.

This speech, however, produced not the desired effect. Equally indifferent to the menaces and soothing of the king, they elected the same speaker that filled the chair in the last parliament, and adopted the same measures, namely, the impeachment of Danby, the enquiry into the popish plot, and the bill of exclusion. They were so determined to carry the last measure, that they rejected every expedient. Ernelly, one of the king's ministers, in order to remove all their fears with regard to a popish successor, proposed, "That the duke of York should be banished five hundred miles from the British dominions:

that the government should be wholly vested in a regent: that this regent should be the prince of Orange; and in case of her death without issue, in the prince's Anne: that if the duke should have a son educated in the protestant religion, then the said prince's respectively to succeed in the regency, during the minority of such son, and no longer: that notwithstanding these kingdoms, out of respect to the royal family, and for preserving the right of succession, might be governed in the name of James II. yet no man should take arms from him, or by virtue of his commission, on pain of being capitally punished: that all officers, civil or military, shall take an oath to observe this settlement of the government; that acts of a similar nature should pass in the parliaments of Scotland and Ireland: that if the duke of York should come into any of the three kingdoms, he should be absolutely excluded; and the government devolve to the regent: that all papists of any consideration should be banished by name, and their children be educated in the protestant religion." But even this proposal, which amounted very near to an exclusion; was rejected. They were determined on their object; and no palliative expedients would be accepted.

While the parliament was thus employed, one Fitz-Harris, an Irish catholic, had insinuated himself into the favour of the court, by giving information concerning the schemes of the opposite party. He joined with one Everard in composing an infamous and injurious libel; apparently with a view of getting money by the information: A traitor never spares his associate when it is his interest to give him up. Everard impeached Fitz-Harris, and he was immediately arrested. The prisoner had now no hopes of escaping from the hand of justice, but by changing his party. He accordingly declared, that he had been engaged by the court to write the libel in question, to throw the odium on the partizans of the exclusion bill. He added some other circumstances concerning the popish plot, and pretended he could make very important discoveries. The commons, hoping to obtain fresh matter for declamation, afforded him their protection; and their first measure was to rescue him out of the hands of justice. In order to this, they sent up an impeachment against him to the lords, who thought proper to reject it. Exasperated at this refusal, the commons complained of a violation of privilege, and declared, that if any judge should presume to try Fitz-Harris, he should be held guilty of that violation.

The dispute between the two houses continued to increase, which afforded Charles a very favourable opportunity of putting a period to a parliament, whom he found were determined to oppose him in every particular. He, however, kept his design a secret even from his most intimate friends; and on the twenty-eighth of March, the very day the exclusion bill was to be read the second time, he repaired, with the utmost privacy, to the house; and before they had received the least intimation of his design, dissolved the parliament. This resolute behaviour in the king disconcerted all the measures of the Whigs. He afterwards published a proclamation, in which he gave his reasons for dissolving the two last parliaments; and accused the commons of a design to wrest from him the regal authority, and totally subvert the constitution of England.

Convinced from experience that he had nothing to hope for from the commons, he determined not to expose himself any longer to parliamentary storms. He retrenched the expences of his government, relinquished the town of Tangier in Africa; though the fortifications had cost him very considerable sums, and seemed resolved to maintain the triumph he had gained over the opposition by his vigour. The clergy now boldly propagated the favourite maxims of the crown; and the whigs were represented as sectaries and republicans of the most dangerous kind. Doubts were thrown out with regard to the truth of the popish pish conspiracy; and could the king have maintained the same moderation in his conduct, he had hitherto done, his triumph had been worthy of him; but he suffered reprisals of too rigorous a nature to be made by the tory party. The spies who had served the parliament, now offered their services to the court, and were accepted. Fitz-harris was tried and executed. He declared before his execution that the libel was his own, and that he had composed it merely to give it up to the ministry for the sake of a reward. The duke of York was recalled from Scotland, and resumed his seat at the council board.

In order to preserve the transactions of England entire during this busy period, we have omitted to mention those of Ireland. That kingdom had for some years been governed by the duke of Ormond, a zealous royalist, and a true friend to his country. He professed the principles of the protestant religion, but was no bigot to his tenets: he was indulgent to those of other persuasions, and provided they did nothing that tended to disturb the peace of the government, was willing they should worship their Maker in a manner most agreeable to their conscience. Ormond had served Charles faithfully; he never forsook him in his banishment; but, disdaining the meanness of flattery and adulation, he was long neglected by that prince who could not number gratitude among his virtues. Dillon, an Irish colonel, once requested the duke to assist him on some particular occasion with his interest at court, adding that he had no other dependence but on God and him. "I am heartily sorry for you," replied the duke, "you could not possibly have two friends of less credit at court." During his government, his whole study was to preserve peace, and render the people happy. But his virtues were not sufficient to defend him against the malice of Shaftsbury. He attacked him in parliament with all the powers of eloquence, and insinuated crimes of which he was wholly a stranger. Ormond's only defender was his own son, the earl of Ossory. He invalidated all the insinuations of his adversary, and after many just encomiums on the conduct of his father, added, with a boldness that did him honour, "He never advised to break the triple alliance; he never advised to shut up the exchequer; he never advised the declaration in favour of the non-conformists; he never advised to break with Holland, to preserve the alliance with France: let my father enjoy the privilege that all honest men ought to enjoy; let him be judged by his counsels and his actions." Shaftsbury felt the poignancy of the sarcasm, having been the author of those evil counsels which the king had followed. The lords applauded the noble defence of Ossory, and his true and simple narrative of facts prevailed over the artificial eloquence of his adversary. Ossory did not long survive this triumph. His father was sincerely affected with his death, and said on that melancholy occasion, "I would not change my dead son, for any living son in Christendom."

The duke of York while he resided in Scotland, practised all the severities of arbitrary power. He established a test, by which the royal prerogative, the supremacy, and passive obedience were expressly acknowledged. But the oath was drawn up in so prolix and ill-digested a manner, that Argyle thought some explanations necessary, before he could be prevailed upon to take it. This conduct exasperated the duke, who determined to make him feel the weight of power. Argyle was arrested and condemned; but found means to escape. Above two thousand presbyterians were prosecuted on this account with the most horrible severity. An inquisition more cruel than that of Spain was carried on in various parts of Scotland. The people complained; but without redress; the duke of York, who now directed the affairs of the kingdom, stifled all their applications.

A. D. 1683. The mutual animosity of the two parties in the kingdom was now enflamed into rage and rancour; and Charles, who should have conducted himself as the common parent of all his people, openly headed a faction. Very extraordinary measures were taken to humble the city of London, whose power and political intrigues had given great umbrage to the court. A quo warranto, or an order to produce the charters of the city, was issued. If it should appear upon a strict enquiry, that any of the conditions prescribed in either of these charters, had been violated in any essential point, the privileges of the city might be taken away. Two facts were cited to prove that the city had actually broken the conditions of the charter. This was denied by the council for the defendants with very strong reasons; but the judges, devoted to the court, passed sentence agreeable to its intentions. Struck with consternation, the common-council assembled to consult the most proper measures to be taken on this alarming exigency. It was proposed, that an entire submission should be made to the ministry, as the only means of preventing the total extinction of the liberties of the city. This proposal was strenuously opposed by the whigs. They represented the late action of the court as a most notorious violation of their rights and privileges; and added, that they should be, in some measure, accessory to this act of usurpation, if, by a dastardly submission, they acknowledged the unjust authority. Fear, blended with interest, however, prevailed over that firmness and resolution which might have been expected from the capital of the English nation. An humble deputation was sent to his majesty, requesting the restoration of their charter. Their petition was granted, but not till they had made such concessions as, in effect, annihilated even the shadow of liberty.

Terrified by the example of the capital, all the other corporations in the kingdom tamely resigned their charters into the king's hands: nor could they obtain a restoration of them till they had paid considerable sums; and even then all the places of power and profit were, like those of the capital, left entirely at the disposal of the crown. This may truly be considered as the triumph of despotism. The English were no longer that bold and resolute people who, in defence of their ancient privileges, had made their monarchs tremble on the throne; they were dwindled into slaves, who covered the yoke of oppression, and offered the incense of adulation to the tyrant that trampled upon their liberties.

Shaftsbury, in conjunction with the duke of Monmouth, lord Russel, and several other noblemen, had formed a plot for an insurrection. After the dissolution of the parliament at Oxford, Shaftsbury had been imprisoned, and an indictment for high-treason had been preferred against him; but the bill was rejected by the grand jury. After the seizing of the city's charter he found means to renew the scheme; and it was proposed to excite insurrections in different parts of the country, and even to attack the king's guards. All their measures were taken, the time fixed, and a manifesto ready for justifying the revolt. But some unforeseen accidents occasioning delays, Shaftsbury, who knew the danger, despaired of success. He therefore abandoned the enterprise, and retired into Holland, where he died soon after, disregarded both by friends and enemies.

The defection of Shaftsbury did not, however, intimidate the conspirators: they determined to pursue their plan; and hoped for success from the universal dissatisfaction that prevailed in every part of the nation. While they were employed in concerting measures for carrying their design into execution, another plot was formed by a set of inferior conspirators. The principal of these were colonel Rumsey, colonel Walcot, both republican officers; Goodenough under-sheriff of London; West, Tyler, Norton, Ayliffe, Ferguson, Rouse, Home, Keiling, Holloway, Bourne, Lee, and Rumbald. The last, who was a maltster, possessed an estate in the road to Newmarket, called the Rye-house farm. Here the conspirators frequently met, and from this circumstance the conspiracy is generally known by the name of the Rye-house plot. The design was to attack the king's guards, and seize the the persons of the king and his brother in their return from Newmarket. This being effected, the conspirators were to have repaired, with the utmost haste, to London, in order to join their brethren in the city, assemble their forces, and break out into open rebellion.

But before the design could be carried into execution, the whole was discovered by the confession of Keiling. Orders were immediately issued for seizing the conspirators. Terrified at their danger, West and Rumsey surrendered with an intention of becoming evidences. The former had been admitted into the secret of the plot formed by the noblemen, and orders were accordingly issued for arresting them. Ruffel, Essex, Howard, Sidney, and Hambden, grandson to the celebrated republican of that name, were apprehended, and sent to the Tower. Monmouth absconded.

Walcot, Home, and Rouse, were first tried. The evidences against them were Rumsey, West, and one Bourne, a brewer, who concurred in deposing, that they were all frequently at the meetings held the preceding year on the business of the plot. Walcot, in his defence, alledged, and offered to prove by undoubted testimony, that he was ill of the gout all the time the king was at Newmarket. The evidence against him was, however, greatly strengthened, by a letter he himself wrote, while under confinement, to secretary Jenkins; wherein he promised to reveal all he knew relative to the plot against his majesty, provided he might be assured of the royal pardon. The jury found them all guilty, and they were soon after executed at Tyburn.

The trial of lord Ruffel, son to the earl of Bedford, followed that of Walcot. Howard, a man of a very profligate character, condescended to purchase his pardon, by turning evidence against his friends. But his conduct rendered him so universally odious, that not a man of character or reputation in either party would afterwards admit him into their company. In adhering to the letter of the laws of England on the subject of treason, it was difficult to constitute the crime of the peers. According to the famous statute of Edward III. there are two species of treason, the intention or attempt to take away the king's life, and the actual attempt to make war against him. According to a statute of Mary, either of these crimes must be proved by the concurrent testimony of two evidences, with regard to any act tending to such purposes. The refinements of the lawyers rendered the definition less limited, and, consequently, the proof more easy. This was what condemned Ruffel, who had long been the idol of the people. Too honest to deny that he had any concern in the proposed insurrections, he insisted only in saying, that he had no design against the life of the king. Monmouth offering to surrender himself a prisoner, if he thought that action would save his life, the earl nobly answered, "By no means; I should gain nothing by seeing my friend die with me." He also rejected the offer of lord Cavendish, who was desirous of changing dresses with him, in order to facilitate his escape.

On the morning of his execution, after winding up his watch, he said, "We have done with time, we have nothing now to think of but eternity." It was thought he would have been pardoned, could he have been prevailed upon to abandon a principle he had always maintained, and which was thought by the court incompatible with the duty and loyalty of a subject. This principle was, that the power of every king of England is limited by the laws; and that if he goes beyond these bounds, the subjects have a right, in their own defence, to bring him back. But he always declared, that he was incapable of the base design of assassinating the sovereign. He often declared, that he preferred a violent death to any other; because, after being exposed a few minutes to the eyes of the populace, every thing was over: and that there was less to be suffered than in the drawing of a tooth. He was attended in his last moments by Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Burnet. He suffered on a scaffold erected in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, on the twenty-first of July; and died like an Englishman, without shewing the least weakness, though surrounded by a populace drowned in tears.

The celebrated Algernoon Sidney, son to the earl of Leicester, was the next victim. His prodigious genius, his insuperable courage, and his passion for liberty, gave him a distinguished place among the republicans. He opposed the restoration of monarchy with the same zeal he had before opposed the usurpation of Cromwell. Finding that his opposition would be in vain, he withdrew into Holland; but desirous of revisiting his native country, he took the benefit of the act of indemnity, and returned to England. He soon joined the country party, and warmly supported the bill of exclusion. In a word, he opposed, with all his interest and eloquence, every design and measure of the court. Howard was the only evidence against him: his papers were therefore produced, in order to supply the rest. Some writings, in which he declared his own sentiments on the national contract, on the resistance to tyrants, on the advantages of a republican government, were considered as supplementary evidences, more than sufficient to convict him. In vain did Sidney represent, that the resemblance of a hand-writing, a proof rejected in England, was the only evidence that those works were his; that besides, they had never been published or communicated to any person; that they proved no recent conspiracy, because it was clear the writing was of an older date. He was, however, condemned; the duke thought him too formidable an enemy to escape. His sentence had, however, no power to terrify him; he gloriéd in dying for the cause he had embraced from his infancy. This illustrious man must for ever be lamented, as, under a republican government, he must certainly have merited the highest applause.

The earl of Essex was found dead in prison; and it was strongly reported that he was murdered by order of the king and his brother; but there were afterwards found sufficient proofs that he had put an end to his own life. This was the less surprising, as he had always been a strong advocate for suicide. The principal friends of the duke of Monmouth being dead, that nobleman wrote two letters to the king, filled with the most humble and submissive expressions. Monmouth was the favourite son of Charles, who now felt all his tenderness revive. He accepted of the guilty youth's submission, and permitted him to come to court. He even indulged him so far, that he was excused from giving evidence against any of his friends; but was required to sign a paper, owning the plot in general, and tacitly justifying the evidence against those who had suffered. In a few days, however, Monmouth repented of the step he had taken, and, with the greatest earnestness, intreated the king to return him the paper. Charles was so highly incensed at his behaviour, that he banished him from court. Monmouth passed over into Holland, where the king, notwithstanding all that had passed, corresponded with him by letter, unknown to the duke of York, and privately made him considerable remittances of money.

Charles now enjoyed an almost unlimited authority in peace. The plot that had been formed against him rendered him dearer to his people, who imputed all the late severities to the duke of York. The doctrine of absolute submission and passive obedience became the prevailing system; and the university of Oxford condemned for those propositions which before had been established as principles. Among these were the following: "All civil authority is derived originally from the people: the sovereignty of England consists of three estates, the king, the lords, and the commons, and the king has a power equal to that of the two houses. Self-preservation is a fundamental law of nature, and over-rules other laws, laws, when put in competition with it." These propositions were now condemned. Such is the instability of human opinions!

The duke of York, conscious that the severities lately practised by the government, were imputed to him; and being desirous of doing some action that might recover a part at least of his popularity, relaxed, for a time, the furious measures he had embraced; but his attempt was in vain; the veil was too thin to hide the enormity of his late conduct. Charles was more successful. He knew the fear of popery had caused the most alarming apprehensions in the minds of the people, and was desirous of dissipating their terrors. He thought proper to bestow his niece, the princess Anne, daughter to the duke of York, on prince George, brother to the king of Denmark. But though he gratified his people in that particular, he never could be prevailed upon to call a parliament, or trust the nation with the election of new representatives, who might, in their collective capacity, become formidable to his newly assumed despotic power. York strongly supported this resolution of his brother; and at the same time prevailed upon him to pursue such measures, as rendered it highly imprudent to convene that assembly.

The earl of Danby, who had remained several years a prisoner in the Tower, was now admitted to bail; the four popish lords that still remained in confinement, were admitted to the same privilege. Lord Petre had died in the Tower about a month before. On his death-bed he wrote a letter to the king, assuring him on his hopes of salvation, that he was entirely innocent of the plot with which he was charged.

But all the flattering ideas of power were not sufficient to drive remorse from the breast of Charles. Conscious of being the oppressor of a free and generous people, he pined beneath the oppression under which the whole nation groaned. He had pursued measures he secretly condemned, and yielded to counsels which his own heart told him were equally inconsistent with his honour, and the happiness of his people. Naturally of an easy temper, and a gentle disposition, he had suffered arbitrary, and even cruel proceedings, to receive the sanction of his authority, and the seal of royalty had been stamped on actions he never approved. He now saw, but it was too late, that while he compelled his people to submit to his desires thro' fear, he had lost their affections as subjects. Penetrated with these reflections he formed a design of changing his conduct, and restoring the neglected intercourse between himself and his parliament. The duke of York proposing some measures which were extremely disagreeable to the king, Charles said to him, with some vivacity, "Brother, I am now too old to go a second time upon my travels; you may do it if you please." But he lived not to carry the generous plan he had formed into execution.

A.D. 1684. He was suddenly seized with an apoplectic fit on the seventh of February, and four days after he expired, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his reign, computing from his restoration. Some believed that he was poisoned; but there seems very little foundation for their opinion. The papists, however, bore the odium of the act, and were said to have perpetrated the execrable deed, in order to prevent his carrying on the reformation he had proposed.

Charles would have been more worthy of a throne, had not indolence, and the indulgence of his passions, perverted his natural talents. He was an enemy to labour, forgetful of services, attached to no person from esteem, and negligent of every duty. His conduct gave sufficient room for the censure of one of his intimate friends, that he never uttered a foolish sentence, nor ever did a wise action. Most of his faults as well as his vexations, flowed from one source; his excessive love of pleasure. To obtain the pecuniary assistance of France he formed an alliance with that power, which gave sufficient room to suspect that his real intention was that of making himself absolute. This opinion gave rise to all the disputes between him and his parliament, and seemed even to threaten him with the loss of his crown. He was guilty of the same mistake that had involved all the Stuart family in distress; they thought their authority equal to that of the most powerful monarchs on the continent, and thence paid no regard to the English constitution. Their principles and conduct could not therefore fail of alarming a people whose liberties were founded on Magna Charta, and were now grown excessively jealous of their privileges. Had the Stuarts paid more respect to the laws and constitution of England their own prerogatives would have been secure, and they would have reigned with more honour to themselves, and advantage to the people. In private life Charles had fewer faults. He was an obliging husband, a generous lover, a tender father, a kind master, but gratitude was a virtue to which he was totally a stranger: the royalists served him faithfully from affection; but he remembered not their services; nor took any care to restore that fortune they had so generously spent in the support of his family.

Charles had no children by his queen, Catherine of Portugal, a virtuous princess, who could never engage the affections of her husband. He, however, left a numerous progeny the fruits of his illicit love.

J A M E S II.

A.D. 1685. AS the bill of exclusion had failed in parliament; James, duke of York, mounted the English throne without any opposition. His speech to the privy-council gained him great applause, being filled with wise and moderate principles of government. After paying some eulogiums to the memory of his brother, and declaring that he proposed to take him for his model, he proceeded in the following manner: "I have been represented as infatuated with principles of arbitrary power; nor is this the only calumny that has been thrown upon me. But I now declare that I will endeavour to maintain the government both in church and state, as by law established. I am sensible that the church of England is favourable to monarchy, and that all the members of it have shewn themselves faithful subjects. I shall therefore apply myself to support and defend it. I am sensible, at the same time, that the laws of England make me as powerful a prince as I can wish to be; and my object is to preserve the prerogative of my crown without invading the privileges of my subjects. I have often exposed my life in defence of the nation, and am still ready to expose it for the maintenance of its just rights and privileges."

This speech, which was printed and dispersed through the kingdom, revived the spirits of the English, who had formed the most alarming apprehensions of his conduct. He had established his courage and conduct as a seaman; and he was considered as one of the most able persons in Europe, with regard to maritime affairs. His friends magnified his probity to the skies; and the people readily believed them, because they wished it to be true. Addresses were sent from every quarter of the kingdom, filled with the warmest expressions of duty and respect. Even the quakers followed the general practice, and waited on the king with a congratulatory address, in which was the following remarkable paragraph: "We are come to signify our affliction for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy to see thee made the ruler of the people. They tell us, thou art not of the church of England any more than we; so we hope thou wilt allow us the same liberty that thou takest thyself; and if thou doest, we wish thee all manner of prosperity."

But it was too soon evident that James never intended to support the church of England, and secure the privileges of the people. The very first Sunday after his accession he went publicly to mass, though contrary to the established laws of England, and the priests and jesuits became his principal confidants. He also published a proclamation for levying the duties of excise and customs granted to his predecessors, as if given by parliament, though he well knew that the grant expired with the life of his brother. He, however, took care not to shew much partiality to those of his own communion, in settling the officers of his household. All who possessed posts under the late king were continued in their respective offices by proclamation.

But the number of priests and jesuits who now basked openly in the sunshine of the court, gave great offence. Pope Innocent XI. to whom he sent his submission, blamed his conduct, and desired him to proceed with more caution. The Spanish ambassador also desired him to be more circumspect in his proceedings, adding, that so many priests about the court might do hurt by their counsels. James asked him whether the king of Spain did not consult his confessor, "Yes," answered the minister, "and for that very reason our affairs are badly managed."

Though the king had entertained the greatest disgust against parliaments, it was absolutely necessary to summon that assembly at the commencement of a new reign, unless it had been determined to introduce at once a despotic government. The utmost pains were taken to procure a parliament wholly devoted to the court. Their endeavours were in general successful, few besides Tories being elected. James opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which he repeated his promise to govern according to the laws, and to support the protestant religion. But the manner in which he demanded that his revenue should be established for life, in the same manner as in the preceding reign, gave the patriots no very favourable opinion of his designs; they thought he spoke the language of a despotic prince rather than that of an English monarch, whose actions are limited by the laws, and who can levy no taxes without the consent of parliament. "It may possibly be supposed," said he, "that to grant me supplies from time to time, would prove an infallible means of frequent parliaments; but as I now speak to you from the throne, for the first time, I tell you, without reserve, that such an expedient would be ill received, and that the best means to engage me to assemble you frequently is to treat me well."

This speech wanted no comment to explain its meaning. It was sufficiently evident, that he had already formed a resolution of setting parliaments wholly aside, in case he met with any opposition. The parliament, however, thought proper to dissemble their apprehensions, and voted the king the fixed revenues of his predecessor; but added, that they depended upon his royal word for the performance, with regard to his maintaining the religion of the church of England, as it was beneath the dignity of a king to falsify his promise.

It could not be expected that Oates, who had occasioned so many reflections to be thrown on the Catholics, could long escape the vengeance of his majesty. He was tried in the court of king's-bench on two indictments for perjury, and found guilty on both. He was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment; to stand five times every year on the pillory, and to be whipped first from Aldgate to Newgate, and the second day after from Newgate to Tyburn. But notwithstanding this dreadful punishment, which was executed with such severity that he fainted away several times, he would confess nothing. He continued in prison till the revolution, when he obtained his liberty, and a pension of four hundred pounds a year.

Dangerfield, his principal associate, was also tried for writing a seditious libel, and convicted. He was sentenced to stand twice on the pillory, to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn another; and to pay a fine of five hundred pounds. As he was returning in a coach from his second whipping, he was insulted by one Francis, a barrister of Grays Inn. Dangerfield resented the unmanly treatment, and spit in his face. This so provoked the barrister, that he pushed his cane with the utmost violence in the face of Dangerfield, and striking him directly on the eye, he died in torture a few hours after. Francis was immediately apprehended, tried for the offence and executed at Tyburn.

On the twenty-third of April the Scottish parliament assembled, and the session was opened by the duke of Queensberry, as king's commissioner. His grace assured them that they were equally included in his majesty's declaration in council with their brethren in England. At the same time he caused a letter from James to the Scottish parliament to be read. In this letter the king inveighed strongly against the fanatics, or rigid presbyterians; whom he called horrid murderers and assassins; and desired the states to take proper measures against their intrigues. The parliament shewed the most abject submission to the royal pleasure: they presented an address to the king full of the grossest flattery: they confirmed the act passed in the preceding reign for maintaining the established religion: they gave the crown the duties arising from the excise: they passed a bill, by which the taking of defending the solemn league or covenant, was declared high treason: and another for suppressing house or field conventicles, by which all who should preach or be present at such conventicles, were to be punished with death: and in a vote which they called an offer of duty, they professed their abhorrence of all principles and positions that tended in any wise to derogate "from the king's sacred, supreme, sovereign, absolute authority and power."

These pleasing concessions both in the English and Scottish parliament, seemed to flatter James with an opinion that no opposition would be made to his measures; and that he should be able to re-establish the Romish faith in all his dominions. He soon found himself fatally mistaken in imagining no commotions would interrupt the tranquillity of his reign. The earl of Argyle, who had been obliged to fly from Scotland on being accused of having engaged with Monmouth and his friends in the late design for raising a rebellion in England, thought this a fair opportunity for being revenged upon James, whom he considered as the sole cause of his disgrace and misfortunes. He imparted his design to the duke of Monmouth, who, as well as himself, was an exile in Holland. Monmouth, always beloved by the people, listened to Argyle, and precipitately engaged in an attempt to dethrone his uncle. They hired a few ships of the Dutch, and collected between two and three hundred of the English exiles in Flanders, all persons of desperate fortunes, and who had no other prospect of retrieving their affairs, than by bringing about a change of government at home. The duke flattered himself, indeed, with being joined by the whig party in England, provided a successful landing both in England and Scotland could be effected.

The plan being concerted, the two chiefs separated in order to carry the design into execution. Argyle, with a handful of troops, but with arms for five thousand men, sailed from Holland in the beginning of May, and landed without opposition in Scotland. But he soon found himself deceived in the notion of being joined by multitudes of his countrymen. About two thousand men, principally highlanders of his own clan, repaired to his standard; but the government, who received advice of his intended invasion, were ready to receive him. He was pursued from one post to another by the royal army, till he was abandoned by the greater part of his followers, and taken prisoner. His execution was not long delayed. He was carried to Edinburgh, where his head was struck off upon a scaffold.

Nor was Monmouth more fortunate in his enterprise. He landed at Lyme in Dorsetshire, on the eleventh of June, with about eighty followers, but with arms for a much larger number. Some of his officers dispersed themselves about the country, in order, if possible, to engage the people to join him. They were so successful, that in a short space of time the duke's little army was increased to near two thousand men. On his first landing he published a manifesto, in which he declared, that the sole intention of his coming was to assert his natural right, and deliver the nation from the tyranny of the duke of York, whom he accused of being the principal author of that dreadful conflagration which laid the capital in ashes; of the late popish plot for assassinating the king; and subverting the protestant religion; of the murder of the earl of Essex in the Tower; and of having actually imprisoned the king his brother. He represented the duke as being incapable, by his religion, of swaying the sceptre of England; which could never hope for peace and safety while a papist and a tyrant filled the throne.

Very little effect was produced by this manifesto, which abounded more with invective than sound reasoning. Few persons of any distinction joined his standard, and the greater part of those who did, were a rude, undisciplined rabble. On his reaching Taunton, his army was increased to about five thousand men; but instead of marching directly to Bristol, which was in no condition to resist him, he spent several days in making preparations for a splendid procession when he was proclaimed king, which was performed on the eighteenth of June. This ridiculous piece of ostentation gave the king time to assemble his forces, which were now in full march against him, under the command of the duke of Albemarle.

Monmouth now saw his folly, but it was too late. A single alternative only remained; he must either conquer or perish. A council of war was called, where it was determined to march and meet the royal army, in order to prevent a surprize, which must have been fatal. The two armies came in sight of each other on the fourth of July, and the next morning the battle began. Monmouth's horse, commanded by lord Grey, fled at the first charge, owing to the inexperience, cowardice, or treachery of their general. He was himself taken prisoner, but readily obtained the king's pardon. The foot stood firm, and maintained their ground for a considerable time with great resolution; but being deserted by the horse, and exposed to a most dreadful fire from the artillery of the royal army, they at length gave way, and a most dreadful carnage ensued. Three hundred were killed upon the spot, above a thousand in the pursuit, and as many taken prisoners. This battle was fought on Sedgemoor, near Bridgewater.

Monmouth himself, after using every method in his power to retrieve the fortune of the day, and displaying the most noble efforts of valour, was obliged to have recourse to flight. His assumed sovereignty vanished like a dream, and all his mighty prospects disappeared in an instant. He fled, attended only by one servant, till his horse dropped under him with fatigue. This incident obliged him to pursue his way on foot, till he reached a poor cottage, where he changed clothes with the peasant, and continued his flight till he was wholly spent. Reduced to this extremity, he laid himself down in a ditch, covered with fern. Unfortunately for him, a party of the king's forces passing the next day by the same cottage, one of the officers knew the duke's clothes, in which the countryman was dressed. He was immediately seized; and, to extricate himself from danger, pointed out the road the duke had taken; and, after a strict search, he was discovered in his hiding-place, with his pockets filled with green peas, the only food he had eaten since his defeat. He was carried immediately to London, and committed to the Tower.

Terrified with this dreadful reverse of fortune, Monmouth wrote a very submissive letter to his uncle; but he no sooner perceived that his life would be saved only on the condition of impeaching his friends, than he rejected the offer with a noble disdain. James had a fine opportunity of signalizing his clemency, but his heart was a stranger to that generous passion; and Monmouth lost his head upon a scaffold, surrounded by multitudes of spectators, who generously paid him the tribute of their tears.

KIRKE'S Villainy & Cruelty to a Young Woman Who beg'd him to save her Brother's Life.

He was greatly beloved by the people; and had not indiscretion and the fire of youth precipitated his measures, his attempt might have shaken the crown on the head of his uncle.

The victory of Sedgemoor was followed by many barbarous executions. The lord chief-justice Jefferies, the most inhuman tyrant that ever filled the seat of justice; and colonel Kirk, a soldier of fortune, and who, by serving long at Tangier, had contracted, by his intercourse with the Moors, a degree of inhumanity hardly ever known in a christian, were sent into the west, to execute the vengeance of a bigotted prince on the unhappy persons who had joined Moamouth in his rebellion. The bare recital of the barbarities committed by these two inhuman monsters, is sufficient to fill the reader with horror. Numbers were executed without any form of trial. Thirty were hanged at one time, as a diversion to colonel Kirk and his officers while they were at dinner. One execution was attended with such circumstances of perfidy, as well as barbarity, that its equal cannot, perhaps, be found in the history of any other country. A young maid, frantic with grief, repaired to the colonel, to implore pardon for her brother. She threw herself at his feet, armed with all the charms that beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could possibly bestow. Fired with lust, rather than softened by love and clemency, he promised to grant her request, provided she, on her part, would condescend to satisfy his desires. The struggle was severe between virtue and her affection for her brother. The latter at last prevailed; she submitted to the conditions: but after passing the night with this inhuman ruffian, he shewed her next morning, from the window of the apartment, her brother, the darling object for whom she had sacrificed her virtue, hanging on a gibbet, which he had privately caused to be erected for his execution. The shock was too great for human nature: she lost her senses in the dreadful conflict, and never recovered them more.

The chief-justice Jefferies was equally cruel, and demands a severer reprehension, because his office should have taught him humanity. Mercy was a stranger to his breast; few escaped with life that were brought before him. He gloried in cruelty, and boasted of the numbers, he had put to death. A lady of the anabaptist persuasion was burnt for extending her charity to one of the rebels who had implored her assistance. The wretch she had entertained was pardoned for turning evidence against her. Lady Lisle, though herself a loyalist, and her own son a volunteer in the king's army, was beheaded for entertaining a presbyterian minister in Monmouth's party, though he had not been mentioned in the proclamation. The jury were melted into pity, and thrice refused to find a verdict against her; but at last the menaces of the inhuman Jefferies prevailed; and the lady, who was above eighty years of age, suffered on a scaffold. Father Orleans pretends, that James disapproved of these cruelties, expressed his indignation, and repaired the injustice to the utmost of his power. But this is a proof that bigotry is capable of sacrificing the most obvious truths to the support of its party. James was so far from disapproving the cruel proceedings of Jefferies, that he created him a peer at his return, and rewarded him with the post of chancellor.

The parliament were, however, alarmed at the behaviour of the court. James having declared that he had dispensed with the test required by the law in favour of the catholic officers who had served him faithfully, the commons shewed a becoming spirit, and passed a resolution for enquiring into the power which the king assumed in dispensing with the laws. "I hope," said one of the members, "we are Englishmen, and not to be frightened with a few hard words." But this shew of resolution was only for a moment; fear prevailed; they proceeded no farther, and voted more supplies than the king had demanded. The lords, however, were not so easily intimidated. They undertook the examination which the commons had declined: even the bishops themselves were strongly desirous of making the necessary enquiry. Alarmed and exasperated at meeting with opposition where the most unlimited complaisance was expected, James immediately prorogued the parliament. He determined to carry his point or lose his crown in the contest.

Freed from all apprehensions of the interposition of parliament, James flattered himself that he had no longer any occasion to disguise his sentiments, or suffer any restraint in his actions. His arbitrary principles therefore began now to appear too evident to be mistaken. The scabberd of deception was thrown away, and the sword of despotism appeared naked, and surrounded with all its terrors.

A. D. 1686. The duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland was removed from his post, notwithstanding his long and eminent attachment to the royal family. He was a protestant, and that particular alone was abundantly sufficient with James to obliterate a whole life of services. The earl of Tyrconnel, a catholic nobleman, was preferred in his room, and the test act was immediately repealed. The earl of Murray having supplanted the duke of Queensberry as high-commissioner in Scotland, he summoned a parliament, and, in his majesty's name, recommended to their care and humanity, the poor catholics in that kingdom, for indulgence in the exercise of their religion. A bill was accordingly brought in for that purpose; but it was so warmly opposed, that it was thought prudent to defer it till a more proper opportunity. But James was determined not to be disappointed: he sent orders to the high-commissioner to prorogue the parliament, and established, by virtue of his own prerogative, a liberty of conscience through the whole kingdom. Hardly any but catholics were now preferred to places of trust or profit, both civil and military. James saw the increasing power of the papists with great satisfaction; and was firmly persuaded that, by means of their influence, he should be able to establish both the Romish religion and arbitrary power in every part of his dominions.

Having succeeded in Ireland and Scotland, he now determined to attempt the more difficult part of the task; the reducing the English to submit to the yoke of despotism. He summoned the judges, and prevailed upon them to declare in favour of his dispensing power. He did not, however, carry his point without the utmost difficulty. Sir Thomas Jones, lord chief-justice of the common-pleas; Montague, lord chief-baron of the exchequer; Sir Robert Charlton, one of the judges of the common-pleas; and baron Nevil, absolutely declared against the dispensing power, as totally subversive of all the laws of England. It was therefore necessary to deprive these of their posts, and fill them with others, who were less conscientious, and more submissive to the court. One Milton, a professed catholic, was made a baron of the exchequer; and the rest, though they professed the protestant religion, were all creatures of the ministry. The people were now sufficiently alarmed; but James gave himself no trouble with regard to their apprehensions: he thought the establishment of the Romish religion, an action worthy of the greatest monarch, and that no danger was too great to intimidate him from the attempt. He therefore determined to proceed; and warmly solicited the noblemen who were about his person to change their religion, and embrace the Romish faith. This strange request was rejected by many with the contempt it deserved. The earl of Sunderland was, indeed, mean enough to purchase the smiles of royalty at the price of his religion. Rochester, the treasurer, though the king's brother-in-law, refused his compliance, and was discharged from his post. The treasury was put into commission; and lord Bellasis, who had been long confined in the tower, on account of the popish plot, was appointed first lord of that board. Emboldened by the countenance of the sovereign, the papists papists began to exercise their religion publicly: the jesuits opened colleges and seminaries in all the principal towns in the kingdom: four popish bishops were publicly consecrated in the king's chapel, and sent into different parts of England to exercise episcopal jurisdiction over those of their own communion, Catholic noblemen were made lieutenants of counties, and gentlemen of the same persuasion acted as justices of the peace.

Alarmed but not intimidated at these proceedings of the court, the English divines nobly stood forth, in defence of their religion, and opposed the errors of popery with reasons that never were or never could be satisfactorily answered. Orders were issued from the court, prohibiting the inferior clergy from preaching on controverted points of religion. But this order produced not the desired effect; the divines continued their laudible efforts; Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Tenison, Patrick, Sharp, and some others shone with distinguished lustre on this remarkable occasion.

Exasperated at this honest boldness of the clergy, especially at seeing the futility of the reasonings of the popish divines exposed, it was determined to erect an ecclesiastical tribunal, where all disputes with regard to religion were to be finally heard and determined. A court similar to this, together with that of the Star-chamber, had been abolished by act of parliament in the reign of Charles I. A clause was also added to the bill that demolished them, prohibiting all courts of a similar kind from being erected for the future. But James was determined to put all laws at defiance. The commission was issued, constituting Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury (who, however, refused to act) Crow, bishop of Durham, Sprat, bishop of Rochester, the earls of Rochester and Sunderland, chancellor Jefferies, and lord chief-justice Herbert, were appointed commissioners; but upon Sancroft's absolutely refusing to act, his name was struck out, and that of the bishop of Chester inserted in its room. These commissioners were invested with the same power with those who sat in the former high court of high commission, and every branch of the ecclesiastical affairs in England, subject to their arbitrary decisions.

The court was hardly established before an opportunity offered for exercising their judicial authority. Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles, and dean of Norwich, had preached a sermon, in which he had inveighed against popery in the strongest manner, and expressed his apprehensions of the danger that then threatened the established church. This sermon had given great offence to the court, and the king himself wrote to Compton, bishop of London, ordering him to suspend Sharp from his clerical function, till he should give satisfaction for the offence, and his majesty's farther pleasure should be known. Compton, on receiving this letter, returned an answer to the earl of Sunderland, secretary of state, desiring it might be communicated to his majesty. In this letter the bishop represented, that it was repugnant to all law and justice for him to pass sentence upon any person before the crime of which he was accused had been properly laid before him, and the party had liberty to answer for himself. This answer, though conformable to the strictest rules of equity gave the highest offence. James, inflamed with passion at what he styled an insolent dallying with his authority, caused the bishop and Sharp to be cited before the court of high-commission, where the sentence of suspension was passed against them both.

A. D. 1687. An open rupture with the church of England now seemed to be declared. Father Peters, the king's confessor, one of the most furious jesuits of his time, was the person whose counsels principally pushed on the king to the precipice from which he soon after fell. Ambitious of a cardinal's hat, and the primacy of England, he proposed the most violent measures; the bigotted misguided king followed his advice, and was undone. Every person of solid reason abroad condemned these precipitate measures; the cardinals at Rome turned both the king and his confessor into ridicule, declaring that they both deserved to be excommunicated as persons who were labouring to destroy the small remains of the catholic religion in England.

James was not satisfied with these impetuous proceedings, he was determined to shew his people what they must expect if they presumed to dispute his measures, or make any opposition to his will. He caused a camp to be formed on Hounslow heath, consisting of fifteen thousand men. This large body of men he had kept on foot notwithstanding the remonstrances of the parliament; and now gave the command to the earl of Feversham. A catholic chapel was erected in the center of this camp, and mass publicly celebrated every day. James fondly imagined that this military force, whose principal officers were Roman catholics devoted to his service, would be sufficient to enable him to carry into execution every measure he should think necessary to adopt, and put the tongue of opposition to silence. But he should have reflected, that this army was composed of Englishmen, who would be the first to abandon him, whenever they perceived that his real design was the destruction of the liberty of their country.

These warlike preparations, together with the expedition used in fitting out a powerful fleet, in the time of a profound peace, filled the people with the most alarming apprehensions. These were greatly increased by a report spread by the king's enemies, that this fleet was intended to act against the Dutch; it having been determined by the ministry to declare war against that republic, in order to exclude the prince of Orange for ever from the succession; because by that exclusion only, the establishment of the Roman catholic religion in England could be rendered permanent. It was also suspected, that James, pursuing the example of his brother, had concluded a secret treaty with Lewis XIV. and adopted that monarch's arbitrary plan of government. These suspicions which seemed to be well founded, completely deprived the king of the affections of his people.

James had sent an ambassador extraordinary to Rome, in order to procure a legate a latere to be sent into England. The pope highly disapproved of the violent measures pursued by the king in order to obtain the establishment of a scheme, which required the utmost prudence and caution to effect. But neither the cold reception of his ambassador at Rome, the incessant complaints of his own subjects, nor even the remonstrances of the more sensible and prudent part of his catholic subjects, who, fearful of the consequences, intreated him to moderate his zeal, could divert the king one moment from his darling purpose, the establishment of the catholic faith, in every part of the kingdom. Deaf to every prudent advice, he listened only to the dictates of his own superstition, and the inflammatory counsels of father Peters.

Finding himself deserted by the church party, James endeavoured to caress the presbyterians, and ordered a declaration to be published in Scotland, suspending, by virtue of his sovereign authority, all oaths, tests, &c. imposed upon non-conformists, who professed the Christian religion. He allowed the moderate presbyterians to meet in their private houses only, but forbade, under the severest penalties, all field conventicles. Quakers were also tolerated to meet and perform their worship in any place or places appointed for that purpose. By the same declaration, the catholics were relieved from all acts of parliament made against those of their profession.

A similar declaration was published in England on the fourth of April; and the dissenters, persuaded that this indulgence proceeded from a sincere desire of giving relief to tender consciences, presented him with the most flattering addresses. These tended to convince James, that he should meet with no opposition in establishing a liberty of conscience in every part of his dominions. Had his views extended no farther farther, it is possible it might have been effected without occasioning any commotion. But James was far from being satisfied with having procured his catholic subjects the public exercise of their religion; he was desirous of procuring them far greater advantages. The papists had not hitherto been able to procure any preferments in either of the universities, an advantage passionately desired by the clergy of that community. The king was therefore determined to attempt it, and procure them a share in the government of the church. An order was therefore sent from the king and council, to the university of Cambridge, ordering them to admit father Francis, a Benedictine monk, to the degree of master of arts, without administering to him the usual oaths. James was persuaded that no opposition would be made to his command; but he was mistaken. The university refused to comply, and petitioned the king to recall his mandate. Exasperated at this refusal, the king suspended the vice-chancellor, reprimanded the senate, and ordered them to send up to the privy-council, copies of their statutes. He, however, soon perceived that the university were not to be intimidated, and thought proper to desist from his purpose.

He next attempted to influence the university of Oxford; persuaded that as that body had been the foremost to establish, by their famous decree, the doctrine of passive obedience, they would not hesitate to put their principles in practice. The presidency of Magdalen college happening to be vacant, the king sent his mandate to the vice-president and fellows, requiring them to elect one Anthony Farmer, a man of a very indifferent character, who had promised to declare himself a catholic on his being elected into that office. The college absolutely refused to comply, as being contrary to their statutes, and actually elected Dr. Hough to be their president. The king was highly offended, and summoned the electors, together with Dr. Hough, before the court of high-commission, where the vice-president was suspended, and the election declared void. But the university having proved that Farmer's character was notoriously bad, the king sent them a second mandate, commanding them to elect Dr. Parker, bishop of Oxford, a reputed papist. The fellows, determined to support their choice, refused to obey the second mandate: they cited the statutes, and the oaths they had taken to prove, that they were obliged to pursue the method they had done, or be guilty of perjury. They proved that Parker was no better qualified than Farmer, having never been fellow either of Magdalen or New College, and therefore incapable of being elected their president.

Incensed at their refractory behaviour, and hoping to conquer their obstinacy by his presence, the king repaired to Oxford, under pretence of making a summer's progress; and having summoned the fellows before him, he reproached them in the most virulent terms for their disloyalty, arrogance and presumption, as he termed their firm attachment to the statutes of the college. He concluded with commanding them, in the most peremptory manner, to elect the bishop of Oxford, or prepare to feel the weight of his royal displeasure. But his threats lost their effect. Determined to support the choice they had made, they continued firm to their purpose; and the king, having exposed himself to the contempt of the whole nation, returned with confusion to London. The ecclesiastical commission, however, exerted all their authority, and the president and twenty-five fellows were expelled. Parker was established in the possession of his office, and the places of the deprived fellows supplied with papists. This action, which was contrary to all the laws of justice and equity, convinced the people, that the king intended to reduce them to the most abject slavery. The bitterest reflections, the most pathetic remonstrances, and the loudest complaints against the court, now made the subject of almost every publication.

But James was determined to proceed, and to shew the sovereign contempt with which he treated every complaint, he gave a solemn audience to the pope's nuncio.

About this time Lewis XIV. revoked the edict of Nantes, given to the protestants by Henry IV. by virtue of which they had enjoyed the free exercise of their religion. But the persecuting spirit of Lewis would no longer suffer them to enjoy a privilege which enriched his kingdom. They were now persecuted with such rigour and severity, that they were determined to seek, in a foreign country, that security they were so unjustly denied in their own. Above half a million of the most useful and industrious subjects deserted France, carrying with them, besides an immense sum of money, those arts and manufactures which had so greatly tended to augment the opulence of that kingdom. Numbers of these distressed protestants came over into England, and the pathetic accounts they gave of their sufferings, rendered the name of papist more abhorred than ever.

Sensible that the opinions of the prince and princess of Orange, who were adored by the people, would have great influence in England, James was very desirous of knowing their sentiments with regard to the revocation of the test and penal laws. The prince had hitherto conducted himself with the most profound policy, giving the king every demonstration of respect and attachment; never interfering in the affairs of England; appearing only to attend to the general interest of Europe. The increasing ambition, and haughty deportment of Lewis XIV. had alarmed all the neighbouring powers; and his cruel behaviour to his protestant subjects, represented him in the light of an odious persecutor. Their sufferings were commiserated by the powers to whom they fled for protection, and inspired them with the glorious resolution of procuring them redress. The prince of Orange excited the other courts against France, and by his influence the league of Augsburg was negotiated. While the prince was thus employed, the messengers of James, who were charged with a commission to procure, if possible, the prince's approbation of the measures he was pursuing in England, arrived at the Hague. Aware of the consequence of exposing himself to the hatred of a people whom he might one day govern, he gave James to understand, that if on one hand he approved the revocation of penal laws, as a friend to toleration, he regarded, on the other, the test oath, as a necessary means to preserve the established worship; that an exclusion from public offices was not a punishment; and that Holland, though she tolerated all sects without distinction, intrusted those offices to such only as professed the national religion. These sentiments were not long a secret in England, and gave as much joy to the people as mortification to the king.

A. D. 1688. This discovery had, however, no power to deter James from pursuing the measures he had formed. He published, on the twenty-second of April, a second declaration for liberty of conscience, couched in nearly the same terms as the former: but he now subjoined an order, commanding the ministers to read it in their churches immediately after divine service. James was persuaded that the clergy would not comply with the royal mandate; and determined, in that case, to make them feel the weight of power. He was not mistaken; the far greater part of the clergy considered it as an insult upon their order, and absolutely refused compliance. Among these, seven prelates nobly stood forth in defence of their religion. Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph; Ken, of Bath and Wells; Turner, of Ely; Lake, of Chichester; White, of Peterborough; and Trelawny, of Bristol; with Sancroft archbishop of Canterbury at their head, repaired to court, and presented, on their knees, a respectful petition to the king, in which they represented to his majesty, that the declaration being founded on a power which the parliament had often pronounced pronounced illegal; they could not in prudence, honour or conscience, publish it in the dioceses over which they presided. Impatient of controul, and distinguished for obstinacy, James resented this opposition in a manner unbecoming either a monarch or a man. He reprehended them in the most contumelious language, and told them, that if they had forgotten he was the supreme head of the church, he knew how to make them acknowledge his power. They were soon after summoned before the council, and insulted by the inhuman Jefferies with his usual brutality. He told them, that unless they instantly retracted their assertions and withdrew their petition, he would send them all to the Tower. They answered, "that they should submit to his majesty's pleasure, whatever it might be; that their own consciences told them, they had done nothing but what was agreeable to the laws, and the sacred character with which they were invested; and that they depended upon the king for protection." A warrant was immediately issued for committing them to the Tower.

Determined to proceed to extremities, but aware of the consequences that the sight of so many persons invested with a sacred character being sent as criminals to prison, might occasion among the people, the court took the precaution of sending them by water. But this artifice was in vain. The alarm was spread, and the shore from Whitehall to the Tower, crowded with multitudes of people, who with one voice deplored their fate, and intreated their blessing on their knees. Even the soldiers sent to guard them were moved to pity, fell on their knees, requesting their benediction, and expressed, in the strongest manner, their detestation of their persecutors.

Two days after the bishops were sent to the Tower, the queen was delivered of a son, who was baptized by the name of James. The nation, persuaded that the king would be deterred by no crime to establish the Romish religion in England, disputed the reality of this prince's birth; and many writers, even in our times, are not satisfied of his legitimacy. The king, and the whole catholic party, however, celebrated this happy event with the most extravagant demonstrations of joy: while the protestants were affected with a melancholy that bordered on despair.

While the attention of the nation was engaged in this event, the trial of the bishops came on in the court of king's bench. They were attended from the Tower by twenty-nine temporal peers, and a prodigious concourse of gentlemen, followed by multitudes of people, who waited, with the utmost anxiety, the issue of a cause on which they thought the fate of both their liberty and religion depended. The council for the bishops defended their cause with a boldness of expression, and force of reason, that did honour to their talents, and their love of liberty. Two of the judges, Powell and Holloway, declared themselves in favour of the prisoners, and the jury brought in their verdict "not guilty." An universal shout of joyful acclamation filled the hall. Those who were waiting without in the utmost anxiety caught the sound, which spread in a moment through the whole capital, and was soon conveyed to the remotest parts of the kingdom. It happened that the king had that day reviewed his army, and was just retired into the general's tent, when the news of the bishops' acquittal reached the camp, on which the whole army gave a loud shout, attended with the most extravagant symptoms of joy. The king enquiring with some degree of astonishment, into the cause, Lord Feverham answered, "It is nothing but the rejoicing of the soldiers for the acquittal of the bishops." "Do you call that nothing," replied the king, "but so much the worse for them."

This proof of the people's affection for their religion and liberties, had, however, no effect upon James. He determined to pursue the same measures which had already hurried him to the brink of the precipice. It is not perhaps easy to find in all the annals of history an instance of such infatuation in a man, who, in other respects, was far from being deficient either in sense or accomplishments. It is perhaps an object of compassion rather than anger. He knew he had only a handful of catholic soldiers that could be depended upon; and that the whole nation beside would defend their religion and liberties to the last. Death only was capable of wresting them out of their hands. But this had no effect upon the conduct of the king: he pursued his course and was undone.

He was, however, greatly alarmed with regard to the rejoicings made in the army on the acquittal of the bishops, and determined to be satisfied how far he might depend upon the assistance of his forces. He accordingly ordered lord Litchfield's regiment to be drawn up, and appeared himself at their head. After walking for some time between the ranks, and commending their appearance, he gave orders that all the officers and soldiers who would not contribute to the repeal of the test and penal laws, should lay down their arms; but his astonishment is better conceived than expressed, when he saw the whole regiment, captains, and a few popish soldiers only excepted, lay down their muskets on the ground. He stood speechless for some minutes, and then with a sullen air bid them take up their arms, adding, that for the future he would not do them the honour of asking their advice. Nor were the seamen in the royal navy more ready to second his designs. Vice-admiral Strickland having ordered masts to be laid on board his own ship in the Downs, the sailors were enraged to such a degree, that it was with the utmost difficulty they were restrained from throwing the priests overboard. James was, however, still obstinate: he determined to new model both the army and navy. He accordingly sent for six regiments from Ireland, composed chiefly of catholics, and sent orders for three regiments to advance from Scotland.

There was now no mystery in the measures intended to be pursued by the king. The flimsy veil of pretence was withdrawn, and it was evident he was determined to make use of force, where influence was unable to prevail. The chains of slavery were forging, and no time was to be lost to prevent their being rivetted on a free people. A close union was accordingly formed between the church and non-conformists in defence of their liberties; and it was determined to invite the prince of Orange into England, as the only person capable of saving the nation, which now tottered on the brink of ruin. He listened to their complaints, and by means of his agents cultivated the favour of all parties. The Tories, and such of the clergy who had supported the pernicious doctrine of non-resistance, abandoned that destructive tenet, and joined the Whigs. Several of the nobility and gentry passing over to the continent on various pretences, repaired to the Hague, and convinced the prince that the whole nation was ready to join him, and wanted only a leader to head them in their noble design of restoring their country to liberty.

William consented to give them all the assistance in his power, and made the necessary preparations, without imagining he was going to take possession of a throne. Though he acted in concert with the confederates at Augsburgh, the secret was long impenetrable. The preparations of the Dutch appeared to be made against France. The count d'Avaux, more quick-sighted than James, penetrated at last the bottom of this intrigue, and informed his master of the real design of the armament fitting out with so much secrecy and expedition. Lewis immediately communicated the discovery to James, and offered him a squadron to join his fleet, and even to raise the siege of Philippsburgh, and march his troops into the Low Countries, in order to intimidate the Dutch by the fear of an invasion. Carried away with a blind confidence, James was deaf to all advice, and rejected the offer of Lewis. "I am not," said he, "reduced to the condition of cardinal Furstemberg, nor obliged to seek the protection of France." These officious offers of Lewis had, however, their effect on the English. They were now persuaded that James had signed a secret treaty with the French monarch; and this opinion animated the spirit of revolt.

Every thing being settled at the Hague, the nobility and gentry in the interest of the prince of Orange dispersed themselves in their different counties; in order to gain the populace over to their party, and prevail upon them to take up arms in defence of the liberties of their country. The states of Holland declared their intention of assisting the English. The electors of Brandenburg and Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the whole house of Lunenburg, agreed to assemble all their forces, in order to protect the United Provinces during the absence of the stadtholder.

The illusion now vanished when it was too late. The English ambassador at the Hague informed his master, that every thing was ready for an embarkation of the forces; and that the grand pensioner Fagel openly avowed that the armament was intended to invade England. Distressed and terrified at the news, James retracted, and seemed desirous of reforming his measures. He restored the friends of the test and penal laws to their places; he caressed the persecuted bishops; he dissolved the ecclesiastical commission; he restored the charters of London and other cities; and endeavoured to gain the friendship of the Dutch, by promising to enter into such alliances as they thought necessary to the welfare of Europe. But his indiscretions, to call his measures by the softest name, had rendered the evil incurable; and had this sudden change been even admitted as sincere, still there was the utmost danger of his arbitrary principles returning the moment the danger was over.

A manifesto, published by the prince of Orange, prepared the way for an invasion. Copies of this paper were sent over into England, and distributed in every part of the kingdom. In this declaration the prince disclaimed, in the most solemn manner, all thoughts of conquest, or of disturbing the king in the enjoyment of his crown; declaring he had no other design than to maintain the protestant religion, the laws and liberties of England, and to procure the assembling a free parliament, which might provide for the public liberty, and enquire into the proofs of the legitimacy of the prince of Wales.

Soon after the publication of this manifesto, the prince of Orange sailed from Holland with a fleet of fifty sail of Dutch men of war, and a considerable number of transports, attended by many of the English nobility and gentry. But a violent storm soon overtook the armament, and separated the ships so effectually, that hardly four were seen together. Fortunately, none of them were lost, but some of them put into one port, and some into another. The news of this disaster no sooner reached England, than James, persuaded that the danger was over, repented of the concessions he had made to his protestant subjects, recalled several popular acts, and seemed again determined to pursue the same measures that had already pushed him to the very brink of ruin.

The damage was soon repaired, and the forces landed in Torbay on the fifth of November. The prince marched immediately to Exeter, where he continued till the fifteenth before he was joined by any persons of condition: the consequences of Monmouth's rebellion had struck the people with terror; and though they were very desirous of supporting their liberties, both civil and religious, they were fearful of being the first in joining the prince, lest a defeat should renew the former scenes of horror. Alarmed at this backwardness of the English, the prince was on the point of re-embarking his forces, when Sir Edward Seymour, major Barrington, and several other gentlemen of interest and fortune, appeared at the head-quarters, and offered the prince to assist him to the utmost of their power. They were received with the utmost politeness, and were soon followed by several more of the nobility and gentry. The whole kingdom was now in commotion. The earl of Devonshire declared for the prince in Derby, the earl of Danby seized York, lord Delamere took up arms in Cheshire, the earl of Bath, governor of Plymouth, declared his intentions of defending the religion and liberties of his country. None offered their service to the king: no preparations for opposing the invader were made in any part of the kingdom. Even the army gave sufficient indications that they would not draw their swords against the deliverer of their country. Lord Cornbury, son to the earl of Clarendon, and colonel of a regiment of dragoons, left the camp, and carried with him both his own regiment and three others to the prince. Churchill, afterwards the famous duke of Marlborough, followed the example of lord Cornbury, and deserted his unfortunate master.

Convinced by fatal experience, that no dependence could be placed on the army, James left the camp, and returned to London, where he was informed that prince George of Denmark, his son-in-law, and the princess Anne, his favourite daughter, had also abandoned him. In this scene of complicated distress, he cried out, "Great God, have pity on me; my own children have forsaken me!" He assembled all the protestant peers that remained in or near the capital, and desired they would give him their advice in this distressful situation. They unanimously declared, that the only way, in their opinion, to divert the threatening storm, was to summon a free parliament, and to send commissioners to treat with the prince of Orange. The king very readily embraced the proposal. The lord chancellor was directed to issue the necessary writs. All the papists about the court were removed from their places. Sir Edward Hales, lieutenant of the Tower, was dismissed, and Sir Bevil Skelton appointed in his room. Father Peters, whose pernicious counsels had plunged the king into this abyss of misery, perceiving the storm ready to burst on his devoted head, deserted his master in his distress, and escaped into France.

The prince received the marquiss of Halifax, the earl of Northampton, and lord Godolphin, who were sent by the king to negotiate a treaty, with great respect; and delivered to them a paper, containing certain proposals; the heads of which were, that a free parliament should be called; that all papists should be disarmed, and discharged from all employments; that all proclamations against the prince should be recalled; that the command of the Tower should be given to the lord-mayor of London; that if the king should think proper to reside in London during the session of parliament, the prince should also reside there, with an equal number of guards, or that both the king and prince should reside at an equal distance from London; that both armies should be removed thirty miles from the capital; and that no new forces should be landed in the kingdom; that Tilbury-fort should be put into the hands of the city magistrates; that till the parliament met, part of the public revenue should be assigned for the support of the prince's army; and that, in order to prevent an invasion from France, or other foreign power, Portsmouth should be committed to the care of some person equally agreeable to the king and the prince.

James now looked upon his fortunes as desperate. He saw himself abandoned by his servants, his friends and his children. He saw the religion he was so desirous of establishing on the point of being eradicated; and determined to seek protection in a foreign country. He, however, dissimbled his sentiments, and declared, that the terms were as moderate, or even more so, than he could expect in the present situation of his affairs. But fearful of throwing himself on the mercy of his parliament, he lost all his his firmness; and when every thing wore the aspect of an approaching peace and reconciliation, the king, after sending away the queen and prince secretly to Gravesend, disappeared himself, during the night, attended only by Sir Edward Hales, Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Labadie. The king's departure was no sooner known, than the populace assembled, pulled down the mas-houses, and insulted those of the foreign ambassadors, from a persuasion that the Roman catholics had there deposited the principal part of their riches. Conscious of the reasons he had given the nation by his infamous counsels and decisions, Jefferies attempted to make his escape; but being discovered in a house at Wapping, the populace seized him; and the lord-mayor was obliged to send him to the Tower, in order to prevent his being torn in pieces. He did not long survive this severe discipline; he died soon after in the Tower of the bruises he had received.

Feverham was no sooner informed that his master had deserted the throne, than he disbanded his forces, but without paying their arrears, or taking from them their arms. Thus a lawless banditti was let loose to plunder the country. A report was at the same time spread all over the kingdom, that the disbanded Irish, who served in Feverham's army, were every where employed in burning towns; and that nothing less than a general massacre of the protestants was expected. The people were confounded; they were seized with an universal terror; the capital was illuminated, that the enemy might not surprize it during the darkness of the night; and every person was in arms to defend his own house against the attempts of a cruel enemy. Next day, however, put an end to the confusion: it was known that the report was totally destitute of foundation, and the people soon recovered from their surprize.

On the fourteenth of December, the prince of Orange arrived at Windsor, in order to settle the affairs of government; it being supposed that the king had absolutely resigned the reins of government, and retired to France. But in the midst of their deliberations, advice arrived, that his majesty had been discovered on board a ship at Faversham, in Kent, where he was waiting for a wind to carry him over to the continent. Before he was known, the populace, who mistook him for some papist of quality attempting to make his escape, treated him with great indignity, brought him on shore, and lodged him in the town. The lords immediately sent the earls of Middleton, Aylebury, Yarmouth, and Feverham, with a party of the guards, to attend his majesty to London. Touched with the sight of majesty in distress, the people forgot his errors, and received him with shouts and acclamations of joy. On his arrival, an express was dispatched to the prince, to acquaint him with this unexpected event.

On the king's arrival at Whitehall, he again resumed the reins of government; and an order of council was immediately published for suppressing tumults, and preventing the demolition of all kinds of structures, and putting a stop to outrages of every kind. The next day the earl of Feverham was sent by his majesty to the prince, inviting him to take up his residence in St. James's palace, attended with any number of guards he thought proper, in order to open the conferences for settling the government of the kingdom, and redressing the grievances complained of by the people. But the prince, instead of returning any answer to this message, retained the earl of Feverham prisoner. The Dutch guards were detached to take possession of Whitehall; and the lords Halifax, Shrewsbury, and Delamere, were sent about midnight by the prince, requesting the king to remove early the next morning to Ham, a seat belonging to the dutehis of Lauderdale.

James had now lost all remains of spirit and resolution. He patiently submitted to this ignominious treatment, and only desired that he might remove to Rochester, instead of Ham. His request was very readily granted; but he continued only a few days in that city; embarking privately, on the twenty-fourth of December, on board a ship in the river; and, after a short passage, was landed safely at Ambleteuse, in Picardy. He was received by Lewis with more than royal magnificence, and every method made use of to soothe his care.

James left a paper behind him, containing his reasons for withdrawing a second time. "The world (said he) cannot wonder at my conduct, after the prince of Orange had confined the earl of Feverham, who was sent to treat with him in a friendly manner; and commanding his own guards to take possession of Whitehall at eleven at night, without giving the least intimation of his design; and even sending me an order at midnight to be gone. After this, I had little to hope from one who had invaded my kingdom, and called the legitimacy of my son in question. I appeal to all who know me, even to the prince himself, whether they could believe me guilty of so unnatural a villany? I was born free; I desire to remain so; and have, for that reason, withdrawn myself again, but so as to be within call whenever the eyes of the nation shall be open to see how they have been abused and imposed upon by the specious pretences of religion and property."

This may be considered as the last act of James in England; and that a final period was now put to his reign, which might have been as happy as that of any of his predecessors, had not his mistaken notions of prerogative, his excessive bigotry to the religion of Rome, and an inflexible severity of temper, hurried him into measures which rendered his government intolerable to a free and generous people, who could no longer submit to a prince whom they saw altogether guided by the violent counsels of a popish, jesuitical faction, and blindly adopting their slavish superstition.

James having thus deserted his kingdom, it became necessary to appoint some person to hold the reins of government, and prevent that anarchy and confusion that must ensue when there is no visible authority to carry the laws into execution. The prince of Orange, too politic to seize the crown, too much a friend to freedom to expose himself to the reproach of tyranny; at the same time, depending on the favour of the people, who looked upon him as their deliverer, left the settlement of the government entirely to the laws. A parliament, under the name of a Convention, was summoned; and the commons soon resolved, that James II. having attempted to overturn the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between the king and people; having violated the fundamental laws, by the advice of Jesuits, and other pernicious persons, had abdicated the government and vacated the throne. But this resolution met with great opposition in the upper house, where the Tories, though they had greatly relaxed their tenets with regard to the royal prerogative, displayed all their abilities. It was first debated, whether any national contract ever actually existed between the king and people, and the question was carried in the affirmative by a majority of seven voices. The next question was, Whether James had broken this contract, and this was also carried in the affirmative. The last question was, Whether James had vacated the throne, and this passed in the negative. So unexpected a decision produced a memorable conference between the two houses; the result of which was, that king James had abdicated the government, and the throne was thereby become vacant.

A.D. 1689. During these debates, the fugitive king continued in France, where both he and his family were royally entertained by Lewis XIV. But the behaviour of James rendered him contemptible in the eyes of all Europe. His sole companions were the Jesuits: he visited them at their college, told them he was one of their fraternity, and, as such, requested requested their prayers. This weakness of mind in a prince, together with the pusillanimous manner in which he had lost his crown, rendered him so despicable, that the French courtiers diverted themselves with turning him into ridicule. Nor did his great regard for the catholic religion, and his having sacrificed his crown in endeavouring to establish it in England, gain him the least esteem. The archbishop of Rheims, brother to Louvois, the prime minister, said openly in James's anti-chamber, "Is not this a pious man to give up three kingdoms for a mass?"

Lewis, however, more generous than his courtiers, endeavoured to support him in this scene of distress. His liberality had hardly any bounds, and he made great preparations for re-establishing him on the throne he had so meanly deserted. Roused from his lethargy by this generous and spirited conduct of his old friend and ally, James endeavoured to prevent the consequences of his imprudent retreat, and, if possible, recall his subjects to a sense of their duty. He accordingly wrote two letters to the house of convention, nearly of the same import with that he had left behind him at Rochester, only adding a promise on the word of a king, that he would, on his return to England, summon a free parliament, and settle the government according to their decisions: requiring, in the mean time, their advice with regard to the manner of his returning to his kingdom. He concluded with assuring them that he would pass an act of oblivion to all his subjects who had forfeited their allegiance, some few only excepted. These letters, though presented to both houses of convention were sent back unopened.

The offers of James being disregarded, the next question was, who should fill the vacant throne. Some were for a regent, others for a king. To change the right of succession appeared, to the former, a breach of the fundamental laws of the kingdom; to appoint a regent who should govern with a precarious authority, was, in the opinion of the latter, nothing less than opening a door to confusion and discord. While this question was depending, the prince of Orange summoned several of the peers, and told them, "that he meant not to interfere in the deliberations of the convention; and that it rested entirely with that body to fix upon the most advantageous system of government; but he thought himself bound to inform them, that if they fixed upon a regency he would not accept of a title of which he saw the inconveniences; that if they gave the crown to the princess, his spouse, with whose merit he was well acquainted, he should, for his own part, prefer a private condition to that of a crown, which would depend upon the life of another; that, on either of these suppositions, it would be impossible for him to second their resolutions; and that a precarious dignity could not induce him to abandon those important objects which would soon call him back to the continent."

The princess Mary, devoted to her husband, entered into his views, as well as the princess Anne her sister. The former declared, "that being the prince's wife he would never accept of any honour, but in conjunction with her husband; and should take it very unkindly in any one, who should endeavour to separate their interests."

These resolutions put an end to all debates in the convention, and the two houses agreed that the prince and princess of Orange should reign jointly as king and queen of England; but that the administration should be vested in the prince alone, and that the princess Anne should succeed after their death. This resolution was not, however, carried without a very considerable opposition. Echard says the majority was only twenty; the numbers being sixty-five against forty-five.

The princess of Orange, to whom an express had been sent on that occasion, arrived in London from Holland on the twelfth of February; and the next day, the prince and princess being seated in two large chairs in the banqueting-house at Whitehall, both houses of convention waited upon them in a body, when the clerk of the crown read, in the names of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons assembled at Westminster, the following "declaration of their rights," which they said, had been violated by king James.

"1. That the pretended power of dispensing laws, or the execution of laws by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal.

"2. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by legal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal.

"3. That the commission for erecting the court of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other commissions and courts of like natures, are illegal and pernicious.

"4. That the levying of money for the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament for longer time, or in any other manner than the same is, or shall be granted, is illegal.

"5. That it is the right of the subjects to petition the king, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning is illegal.

"6. That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of the parliament, is against law.

"7. That the subjects being protestants may have arms for their defence, suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law.

"8. That elections of members of parliament ought to be free.

"9. That the freedom of speech, or debates and proceedings in parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place, out of parliament.

"10. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel nor unusual punishments inflicted.

"11. That jurors ought to be duly impaneled and returned; and jurors which pass verdicts on men for high-treason, ought to be freeholders.

"12. That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons before conviction are illegal and void.

"13. And that, for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently."

"And they do claim, demand, and insist upon, all and singular the premises as their undoubted rights and liberties; and no declarations, judgments, doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people, in any of the said premises, ought in anywise to be drawn hereafter into consequence or example."

Such were the rights and liberties demanded by the convention, and the declaration in which they were contained, concluded in the following manner.

"Having therefore an entire confidence that his highness the prince of Orange will perfect the deliverance so far advanced by him, and will still preserve them from the violation of their rights which they have here asserted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, rights, and liberties, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons assembled at Westminster, do resolve, That William and Mary prince and princess of Orange, be, and be declared, king and queen of England, France and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to them the said prince and princess during their lives and the life of the survivor of them, and that the sole and full exercise of the royal power be only in, and executed by, the said prince of Orange, in the names of the said prince and princess, during their joint lives; and after their decease the said crown and royal dignity of the said kingdom and dominions

“to belong to the heirs of the body of the said prince; and, in default of such issue, to the prince Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and in default of such issue to the heirs of the said prince of Orange.”

As soon as the reading of this declaration was finished, the marquis of Halifax, as speaker of the house of lords, made a solemn tender of the crown to their highnesses, in the name of the peers and commons of England. The offer was accepted in the politest and most obliging manner by their highnesses; and they were the same day proclaimed by the name of William and Mary, king and queen of England.

Instead of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, suppressed by the declaration, new oaths in the following forms were substituted. “I sincerely promise and swear that I will be faithful to their majesties King William and queen Mary. So help me God.”

“I swear that from the bottom of my heart I abhor, as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and position, that princes excommunicated, or deprived by the pope, or any authority of the see of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other person whatever; and I declare that no prince, no person, no prelate, state or potentate hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm. So help me God.”

Before we leave this remarkable period, it will be necessary to review the state of the English military and commercial establishments, and the improvements made in the arts and sciences since the restoration of monarchy.

The militia of England during the reign of the two last princes, had been greatly neglected; a standing army being thought better adapted to promote the safety of the nation, when the princes on the continent kept such large bodies of troops in pay: But the navy was greatly improved. In 1660, when Charles was restored to the throne of his ancestors, he found the navy reduced to the low condition of sixty-three ships. In 1678, it consisted of eighty-three. At the revolution the number of ships amounted to one hundred and seventy-three; and forty thousand sailors were necessary for manning the whole. James, when duke of York, invented the signals still used at sea.

During this period, which consisted of no more than twenty-eight years, the number of merchant ships were more than double what they were at the death of Cromwell; an evident proof of the increase of the English trade. The art of navigation was very favourable to commerce, and produced the intended effect in every quarter of the globe. The colonies in America were considerably improved, and the produce of the new world added lustre to the old.

In the first year of the reign of Charles II. Sir Thomas Modyford, an eminent planter in the island of Barbadoes, having acquired a prodigious fortune, removed to Jamaica, where he instructed the young English planters in the cultivation of the sugar cane, for which eminent service, and others of a similar nature, he was appointed governor of the island. And in the same year an act passed in favour of the Flemings established at Colchester, who first brought into England the manufacture of baize.

In the year 1661, Charles II. granted a new exclusive charter to the East India company, by the old name of the governor and company of merchants trading to the East Indies.

About the same time, the worsted manufacture established at Norwich, and other places in Norfolk, was prodigiously increased, and the silk manufacture in London was arrived to that height, that it found employment for above forty thousand men, women, and children.

In 1668 Charles II. granted the town, port, and island of Bombay in the East Indies, in full property for ever to the East India company, to hold it in free common socage of the imperial crown of England, under an annual rent of ten pounds, to be paid yearly on the thirtieth of September at the custom-house in London.

The general balance of trade in the year 1668, was greatly against the English, the exports being less than the imports by no less a sum than two millions, one hundred thirty-two thousand eight hundred and sixty-four pounds, eighteen shillings. This amazing loss was chiefly owing to our having an unlimited intercourse with France; a trade which was afterwards prohibited.

In the year 1670, the wear of muslins was first introduced from India; before that time cambrics, Silesia lawns, and other linens from France and Germany, supplied its place. These linens were received in return for our woollen manufactures of different species, which were at this time exported thither in very large quantities. The same year the Hudson's bay company was established.

About the year 1676, the printing of calicoes was first established in London: and about the same time the weaver's loom engine was introduced from Holland. The same year one hundred and two ships were employed in the cod fishery at Newfoundland; and the total value of the fish and oil was computed at three hundred, eighty-six thousand four hundred pounds.

In the year 1680 the colony of Pennsylvania in North America was established by William Penn, an eminent quaker. He proposed to make it a retreat for the people of his own persuasion, who met with great disturbance here on account of their religious tenets. Numbers went over with him, and were soon joined by many more from various parts of England and Ireland. At his first arrival in that country he found many English families, and a considerable number of Dutch and Swedes. These all readily submitted to his wife and excellent regulations, which, together with his gentle and generous behaviour, soon endeared him to the planters, and extended his fame to such remote places, that vast numbers of people flocked from all parts of Europe to people his new colony of Pennsylvania. It is now one of the most flourishing countries in America.

The Turkey company was at this time in a very flourishing condition; they exported great quantities of our woollen manufactures, and other English commodities, to the great advantage of this country. Their exports about the year 1681, amounted to near half a million sterling; in return for which they brought home raw silks, program, yarns, galls and other drugs, cotton, &c. The greater part of which being manufactured here, afforded bread to great numbers of poor families.

The year 1685 was famous for the revocation of the edict of Nantes by Lewis XIV. This revolution, though infinitely distressful to many thousands of individuals in France, proved of the utmost advantage to all the protestant countries in Europe, especially to England; where many thousands of those unhappy French manufacturers, particularly in the silk branch, settled in Spitalfields; while a vast number of other artists helped to fill the suburbs of Soho and St. Giles's. It was computed that near sixty thousand of these refugee families retired hither, to the great improvement of our arts and manufactures, and the introduction of new ones. And if we suppose that these fifty thousand families brought one with another sixty pounds in money and effects, they must have added near three millions sterling to the riches of the nation.

The sciences made great improvement during this period. In 1660 Charles II. established, by letters patent, the Royal Society of London, so famous for its transactions and the learning of its members. But this patent was all Charles contributed to the advancement of the sciences. They indeed struck deep root, and attracted the admiration of all Europe; but licentiousness which overwhelmed the nation. He was truly an honour to his country. To the gift of genius and the acquisition of philosophy, he added what was then so uncommon, the merit of respecting morality, and the laws. He was as much above the common level of politicians, as he was above the common herd of authors.

Among a great number of physicians that flourished in this reign, Dr. Thomas Sydenham is justly placed at the head of that profession. He was a person of great penetration and experience, and added considerable improvements to the healing art. He dared to deviate from the common practice, where nature and reason pointed out a better method; and was the first that introduced a cool regimen in the small pox; a discovery which has been since followed with amazing success. His works are still in the highest esteem with the faculty.

Besides Sydenham, Willis, Sir George Ent, Glifson, Plunket, and Sir William Petty made several useful discoveries in physic, anatomy and botany.

Such was the state of commerce and learning at this remarkable period of history, when the liberties of Englishmen, which had been so often invaded by former princes, were established on a solid foundation.

From the Revolution to the Accession of George I.

WILLIAM III. and MARY II. King and Queen of England.

A. D. 1689. IT was highly consistent with the genius and spirit of the English to place the friend of liberty on the throne; especially as they did not strip the crown of any of its just prerogatives, when they presented it to the prince of Orange. The power of summoning, proroguing, and dissolving parliaments, of chusing members of the privy council, and of making war and peace, was still invested in the king. William on his part was extremely desirous of giving no offence to the English in his exercise of the royal authority. His council was composed of persons who had always been the friends of liberty, and could therefore give no offence to those who were true lovers of their country.

There was, however, a party in the nation who beheld the exaltation of the prince of Orange in a very different light, and could by no means be prevailed upon to approve of the revolution. The papists made indeed the bulk, but not the whole of this party. The former had very sufficient reasons to disapprove of the new settlement; but they were joined by a considerable number of protestants, who, either from the strong impressions they had received from the late doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, could not think it lawful to resist James, or from their being persuaded that the hereditary right of the crown was indefeasible, joined the catholics. The last absolutely refused to take the oaths to the present government, and were thence stiled non-jurors. These parties disturbed the operations of the ministry during this whole reign, and prevented the people from reaping all the advantages they might otherwise have obtained from the revolution.

Before any of the principal acts of government could be performed, it was necessary to assemble a parliament, or give that title to the convention. The latter was chosen as the easiest and most expeditious method. Accordingly William, on the twenty-third of February, gave the royal assent to a bill to "remove and prevent all questions and disputes concerning the assembling and setting of this present parliament." By this act the convention, which had settled the crown on the prince and princess of Orange, was changed into a parliament. This bill being passed, the king repaired to the house of lords, and delivered a speech from the throne, wherein he thanked them for the great confidence they had reposed in him by intrusting him with the English sceptre, and assured them it should be his study to preserve the good opinion they had conceived of his integrity. He laid before them the critical situation of affairs in Europe, particularly in these kingdoms, and concluded with an earnest request, that they would concur in the most effectual measures to preserve the domestic peace, and promote the happiness of the nation. He soon after sent a message to the house, assuring them that he had received certain advice, that James had sailed with an armament from Brest to invade Ireland. Desirous of convincing the world that they would support his majesty, both houses came to a resolution to assist him with their lives and fortunes: they voted a temporary aid of four hundred and twenty thousand pounds, to be levied by monthly assessments. Both houses waited on his majesty to inform him of this resolution.

This complaisance in the parliament was, however, far from being unanimous; several of the peers both spiritual and temporal, refused to take the oaths to the present government, and did not therefore attend their duty in parliament. Among the former were Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury; Turner, bishop of Ely; Ken, of Bath and Wells; White, of Peterborough; Lake, of Chichester; Lloyd, of Norwich; Thomas, of Worcester; and Frampton, of Gloucester: the four first had been imprisoned in the Tower by James, for refusing to publish his declaration for liberty of conscience. The temporal peers who refused the oaths, were the duke of Newcastle; the earls of Clarendon, Litchfield, Exeter, Yarmouth and Stafford; with the lords Griffin and Stowel.

William's friends were not deserted like those of Charles the second; they were rewarded for their fidelity. Among the rest Dr. Gilbert Burnet, who had for some time resided in Holland, and came over with the prince as his chaplain, was promoted to the see of Salisbury. The king, at once an enemy to persecution, and a friend to Calvinism, was very desirous of procuring the protestant dissenters a share in the government; but he could not prevail upon the parliament to abolish the sacramental test in favour of the presbyterians. They, however, passed a bill under the title of "An act for exempting his majesty's protestant subjects dissenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws." This law is still in force, and generally called the Act of Toleration. About the same time William acquired great popularity by recommending to the parliament the abolition of hearth-money, a tax which which was considered as a heavy burden on the poor. Pleased with the attention paid to their interests, the people looked upon their new sovereign as their father, and paid him the tribute of gratitude and affection.

The many shameful embezzlements of the public revenue before the revolution, now induced the parliament to provide a remedy for preventing such flagitious practices for the future. They resolved to allot a separate fund for the maintenance of the king's household, and the support of his dignity; and subjected the rest of the public revenue to the controul of parliament. The former was distinguished by the name of the Civil List, an appellation it still retains. They also voted, that these sums should be granted only from year to year, or, at most, for a very short term. This appropriation of the public revenue was of infinite advantage to the nation, and the strongest bulwark of the people's liberties. They were now no longer apprehensive of seeing the aids they granted lavished away by the sovereign in articles of profusion, or applied to the nefarious purposes of supporting armies to wrest from the generous donors their most invaluable privileges.

On the sixteenth of December, the king gave the royal assent to the bill of rights, and succession, agreeable to the declaration of rights made to the king and queen when they accepted the crown. A remarkable clause was added to the bill, by which all papists, and all persons marrying papists, were excluded from the throne.

This manner of applying the public money could not be very agreeable to William, whose revenue was granted only for a short and limited time. The sum of two hundred thousand pounds was granted him for the support of the crown in time of peace. William considered this measure as a mark of their diffidence, by which he was distinguished from all his predecessors, and thought it an ungrateful return for the great services he had done the nation. The Tories, desirous of distressing the Whigs, now made a tender of their services to the king, who recommended an act of indemnity to the parliament, in order to profit by their assistance; but so many frivolous objections were made to it, merely to prolong the time, that it was dropped at the end of the session. This increased the difference between the two parties, and gave great uneasiness to the government.

The authority of William was acknowledged in Scotland as well as in England, notwithstanding all the efforts and emissaries of the dethroned monarch. James, who was now in Ireland, wrote to the Scottish convention, soliciting the members to maintain his lawful rights against the usurper. He promised them immediate assistance; he offered pardon to all who would return to their duty, and threatened the severest punishments to those who should persevere in their rebellion. But both his promises and threatenings produced not the desired effect. Indeed, in his situation, they were vain, and almost ridiculous. The duke of Hamilton, president of the assembly, easily carried the votes against a prince, who was equally obnoxious on account of his religious and political principles. They voted, that James, by being a papist, and having exercised the royal authority without taking the oaths prescribed by the law; by having attacked the fundamental constitution of a limited monarchy, and violated the laws and liberties of the nation, had forfeited all right to the crown, and, in consequence of that forfeiture, the throne was now vacant. This vote was immediately passed into a law, under the title of "An act for settling the crown of Scotland upon the king and queen of England." All attempts to assist James were prohibited; William and Mary were proclaimed king and queen of Scotland; and commissioners sent to London with the act which established their authority.

The Scottish commissioners, after making a solemn tender of the crown of that kingdom to their majesties, proposed the form of an oath, containing, among other things, a promise to extirpate heresy: William absolutely refused at first to take this oath, protesting he would never lay himself under an obligation of being a persecutor: he was too fond of liberty himself, to be desirous of destroying it in others. The commissioners assured him, that the intention of the oath was very different, and on that declaration he accepted the crown of Scotland.

The meeting of the states of that kingdom was now, by virtue of a commission from their majesties to the duke of Hamilton, changed into a parliament. But complaints soon arose in that assembly against the king, who thought himself empowered to appoint the judges, and left some of the national grievances unredressed. Prelacy was, however, once more abolished in Scotland; but the presbyterian discipline was not established, owing to some disputes between the king and the parliament. The principal of these articles respected the lords. It was the custom for the king's commissioner to nominate eight bishops; who should chuse eight lords; and these eight barons and eight burgesses. These jointly formed a committee, under the title of "Lords of Articles," having an exclusive right to propose a reformation of abuses, and such measures as they thought useful to the kingdom. This important privilege was claimed by the Scottish parliament. William, in part, refused their request. He consented that the states should chuse the lords, and deliberate on such articles as the latter should reject. But this was not thought sufficient; they wanted more extensive privileges; while the king, fearful that they meant to resume that liberty which had so often degenerated into licentiousness; and unwilling to enter into contests with the parliament, as they might have been attended with dangerous consequences in the infancy of his reign; prorogued the assembly.

It must not, however, be imagined, that this revolution in Scotland was attended with no opposition. The duke of Gordon, still faithful to the Stuart family, defended the castle of Edinburgh, which was now blocked up by the troops of the city. He stood a regular siege; but having neglected to furnish the place with a sufficient quantity of provisions, he was forced to capitulate on terms very advantageous to the garrison, though he generously declined to solicit any for himself. He was, indeed, persuaded; that it would have been absolutely inconsistent with the duty he owed his master, to consult his own interest while he was defending the royal cause.

While the castle of Edinburgh was invested, the earl of Dundee, at the head of a body of Scotch highlanders, attacked the English, under the command of lieutenant-general Mackay, with the utmost fury, routed a large division of them at the first onset, and would, in all probability, have obtained a complete victory, had he not unfortunately been killed by a random shot. His death put an end to the contest. The highlanders lost their courage with their general; and one misfortune treading on the heels of another, they laid down their arms; and accepted the amnesty offered by the English.

James succeeded no better in Ireland than in Scotland. His behaviour, indeed, soon lost him the affections of his best friends: The earl of Tyrconnel, attached to him both by gratitude and a similarity of religious sentiments, exerted himself in the service of his master. He had secured the most important places in the kingdom before the king abandoned the English throne. Instigated at once by the motives of religion, policy and prudence, he treated the unhappy protestants with so much severity and rigour, that they abandoned their residence; and fled for protection to their brethren in the north of Ireland, where Kilmore, Coleraine, Inniskilling, and Londonderry, declared for William.

Such was the state of affairs in Ireland, when Lewis XIV. undertook to support his old friend and ally in the recovery of one part at least of his dominions: Perhaps there was hardly ever a more striking contrast than between these two princes. The one acted the part of a generous monarch, the other that of a mere devotee, always surrounded by Jesuits, and neglecting his own business and situation, that he might attend to their ecclesiastical controversies and metaphysical distinctions. Little success could be expected from the attempts of a prince of so bigotted a disposition. Lewis, however, furnished him with five thousand forces, under the command of M. de Laufun. These troops were embarked at Brest on board a fleet consisting of fourteen ships of the line, six frigates, three fire-ships, and a sufficient number of transports. Lewis also furnished him with arms for forty thousand men, a large sum of money, and superb equipages. At their parting, the French monarch embraced him, and said, "I cannot wish you better than that I may never see you more."

James sailed from Brest on the seventh of March; and on the twenty-second landed at Kingsale, in Ireland. He immediately set out for Cork, where he was received by the magistrates in their formalities. The people also expressed their zeal and their joy in the most extravagant manner. The earl of Tyrconnel joined him with an army of thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse. But these happy beginnings soon terminated unfortunately. James took no care to gain the affections of his subjects. Instead of endeavouring to gain the protestants over to his interest by acts of kindness and popularity, he exasperated them still more by his cruelty and arrogance.

On his approaching the capital, the catholic bishops and priests met him at the Castle-gate in solemn procession, having the host carried before them. He immediately dismissed all the protestant members of the council, and filled their seats with papists. He published, indeed, several proclamations, promising protection to all his subjects in general who should preserve their constancy; but so little regard was paid to his promises, that they all resolved to imitate the example of their friends, and stand in their own defence. He soon made himself master of Coleraine and Kilmore, and exercised the most brutal cruelty on all of that persuasion who fell into his hands. Terrified at these inhuman proceedings, and alarmed by the report of a general massacre intended to be perpetrated on all who adhered to the reformed religion, they fled from all parts of the country, and shut themselves up in Londonderry, fully determined to suffer all the horrors of famine, rather than submit to so brutal an enemy. An express was dispatched to England, imploring immediate assistance. Some arms and ammunition were directly sent them; and about the middle of April, two regiments, under the command of the colonels Richards and Cunningham, arrived in Loughfoyle.

By this time James's army had reached the neighbourhood of Londonderry; and advice of the enemy's approach was sent to Lundy, the governor, by Mr. Walker, a protestant clergyman of Donaghmore, who had raised a regiment for the defence of himself and his brethren. Lundy immediately summoned a council of war, at which both Richards and Cunningham assisted. Whether the members were affected with cowardice or treachery, is uncertain; but they came to a resolution, that the town was untenable, and that it would therefore be imprudent to land the regiments. Walker was of a very different opinion, and used every argument in his power to prevail upon the governor to take the field immediately, and bring on a general engagement with the enemy; promising that the protestant inhabitants would do their duty, and fall nobly in the contest, rather than submit to an enemy whose very religion rendered them inhumanly cruel. But all his endeavours were in vain: the pusillanimous soul of the governor was not to be roused to action by persuasions and arguments. He concealed himself in his chamber, and Richards and Cunningham escaped on board their ships.

Exasperated at this cowardly behaviour of those who ought to have exerted themselves in inspiring the inhabitants with courage, Walker, and major Baker, the deputy governor, resolved to defend their religion and liberties to the last extremity, and bury themselves under the ruins of the town, rather than submit to the enemy. They immediately formed the inhabitants, amounting to seven thousand men, into different regiments; taught them the manner of using their arms, the firing of cannon, and other particulars necessary to be known at this alarming crisis. Their religious sentiments inspired them with a noble contempt of death, and they determined to conquer or perish.

While Walker and his worthy associate were employed in disciplining their little army, Rozon, the French general, approached the walls, and began to play upon the town from several batteries. But the inhabitants, though the fortifications were in a very poor condition, and defended only by twenty pieces of artillery, bravely repelled all the attacks of the enemy. James was with the army at the opening of the trenches; but soon after returned to Dublin to open the session of parliament. Exasperated at the noble defence made by the inhabitants, Rozon, a person of more than savage brutality, caused four thousand protestants to be stripped naked; and in that condition driven close to the walls of the town, as so many victims destined to destruction, which the surrender of the place alone could preserve. But this infernal contrivance produced not the desired effect. Walker caused gibbets to be erected on the walls, and informed the French general, that unless he suffered these wretched people to retire, he would immediately hang up every catholic in the town, together with all the prisoners they had taken in their sallies. Convinced, by the noble defence the inhabitants had already made, that the threat would be immediately carried into execution, Rozon ordered the unhappy protestants to be released; but the brutal cruelties they had already suffered, rendered his mercy now of little effect; the greater part of them fell victims to hunger and distress.

The distress of famine, which now raged with uncommon violence, increased the horrors of the siege. The poor inhabitants eat their dogs, cats, mice, and leather; and even these wretched resources at last began to fail; and they were on the point of coming to the dreadful resolution of feeding upon their prisoners, when, major-general Kirk, who had rendered himself so infamous for his cruelties after Monmouth's rebellion, arrived in the Lough with a reinforcement of nine thousand men. He had received orders to relieve the town at all events; and accordingly sent three ships, laden with provisions, up the river, under the protection of the Dartmouth frigate. The enemy well knew that it would be impossible to conquer the town by famine, unless all communication with the sea, by means of the river, was cut off. They had accordingly erected several strong batteries on both sides of the stream, and drawn a strong boom across the channel. These precautions were thought sufficient to render every attempt made by sea, for the relief of the place, abortive. But here the enemy were mistaken. One of the ships, taking the advantage of the tide and a strong gale of wind, advanced through the fire of the batteries, with full sail, against the boom. The shock was too violent to be resisted; the boom gave way, and the ships reached the town in safety, amidst the joyful acclamations of the inhabitants.

Rozon now perceived that any farther attempts to reduce the place would be in vain. He raised the siege, and retired from before the town, where he had lost nine thousand men. Kirk entered the place with his reinforcement; and Walker, at the joint request of the garrison and inhabitants, passed over into

Misfortunes had no effect to alter the conduct of James. Still inclined to despotism, still immoderate in his zeal, he behaved in Ireland as if he had been studious to render both his government and person odious to the English. He again published a declaration, insisting on his impartiality with regard to the protestants, on the preference he gave them, on the care he took to protect them, and to maintain a perfect liberty of conscience; but his conduct belied his promises. The Irish parliament, consisting chiefly of catholics, annulled the act by which the protestants were maintained in the possession of those estates which had been taken from the catholics. The consequence was, that they were stripped of all their possessions with the utmost severity; and, to complete their ruin, a bill of attainder was preferred against those who absented themselves from the kingdom, or held any correspondence with James's enemies. About three thousand were included in this proscription. The protestant clergy lost their jurisdiction and privileges, and were driven from many of their churches. These measures would have been dangerous even in time of peace; in those troubles they were infinitely more so. James directed every thing, without foreseeing the consequences of his indiscretion. He was hurried headlong by the current of blind zeal. He was, however, desirous of restoring the churches to the protestants; but the papists refused to obey; they disavowed his authority whenever they disapproved his orders. He had been reduced to the necessity of coining copper money, and to give it a nominal value far superior to what it was intrinsically worth, in order to pay his troops. This, together with exorbitant taxes and ruinous expedients, were the resources of his preposterous government. Whether James acted from himself, or from the advice of others, he ought to have foreseen, that this abuse of a tottering authority would by no means contribute to render it more permanent.

Desirous of terminating, as soon as possible, the troubles in Ireland, king William sent admiral Herbert with twelve ships of the line, one fire-ship, and four tenders, to intercept a squadron of French ships then fitting out for the assistance of James, under the command of Chateau Renaud. Soon after the English admiral arrived on the Irish coast, he discovered, on the first of May, the French fleet, consisting of twenty-eight ships of the line, most of them from sixty to seventy guns, and five fire-ships, lying at anchor in Bantry-bay. The French admiral no sooner saw the English, than he got under sail, and stood out of the bay, to bring on an engagement, encouraged by having at once a superior fleet, and the advantage of the wind. Herbert did every thing in his power to gain the weather-gage of the enemy; but finding his attempts were in vain, he prudently declined an engagement, which must have been fought under every disadvantage. He therefore stood off to sea, and maintained, for some time, a running fight with the enemy; but, on the approach of evening, Renaud tacked, and stood again into the bay.

Preparations were, in the mean time, making, for sending an army over to Ireland; but, by some unaccountable neglect in those to whom the management of military affairs was intrusted, James had been six months in Ireland before an English army was ready to embark for that kingdom. At last eighteen regiments of foot, five of dragoons, and a suitable train of artillery, being ready, the duke of Schomberg was appointed general, and the forces landed in the neighbourhood of Carrickfergus on the thirteenth of August. About ten thousand foot and dragoons were detached to take possession of Belfast, which was abandoned by the enemy at their approach. They, however, retired no farther than Carrickfergus, where they proposed to make a stand against the English; but the latter attacked the place with so much intrepidity, that they were masters of it in four days. Newry, Dundalk, and other places opened their gates at the first summons; and had not so many delays have been made in sending the general the train of artillery he had left behind him in England, Schomberg would have made a much greater progress; but in consequence of this strange conduct he was obliged to continue inactive during the remainder of the campaign. On the approach of winter, both the English and Irish retired into quarters.

The same delays that had prevented Schomberg from pursuing his conquest, also rendered the designs of the naval armaments abortive. Admiral Herbert, now earl of Torrington, did not sail again for Ireland till the season was far advanced. His intention was to surprize the city of Cork; but was diverted from his purpose by false intelligence, that James with his whole army was encamped in the neighbourhood. It was therefore thought imprudent to attack the city, and the whole fleet, after a short stay on the Irish coast, returned to England, and came to an anchor in Torbay.

The parliament meeting on the nineteenth of October, the king repaired to the house of peers, and in his speech from the throne, explained the necessity of their granting an immediate supply for carrying on the war in Ireland; and that they would determine speedily with regard to the measures they intended to pursue in respect to the grand alliance formed against France. After his majesty's speech had been taken into consideration, they unanimously resolved to assist him in reducing Ireland, and in joining his allies abroad, for a vigorous prosecution of the war against France. And to make good these resolutions, they voted a supply of two millions, to be raised by a land-tax of three shillings in the pound, and additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate.

Party disputes between the Whigs and the Tories were now carried to the greatest height. William was not calculated for joining in these contests; he saw them with regret and concern. Cold, reserved, silent, generally shut up in his closet, without a taste for any thing but the chase, most commonly at Hampton-court, because the air of London did not agree with his constitution, he was by no means popular, and began to lose the affections of the English. He saw his error, and policy for once prevailed over nature. He suddenly adopted the old popular customs, was present at horse races, and shewed himself affable and complaisant. He dined with the lord-mayor of London, accepted the title of citizen, and submitted to be appointed master of the Grocers company, a condescension which would have been too great, had he known, at the same time, how to support his dignity.

The church of England, which hated popery, was far from being fond of Calvinism in the prince; and William, who was sufficiently aware of the dangers attending religious disputes, made another effort for uniting the church and presbyterians. But his endeavours were soon rendered abortive. The lower house of convocation opposed the attempt with the utmost firmness. On this occasion they had recourse to the phrase used by the ancient barons: "We will not have the laws of England changed." This increased the animosity, already sufficiently alarming, between the two parties. The Tories, persuaded they should gain the ascendant by making their court to the king, made him the most pompous promises of supplies, provided he would pass an act of oblivion and dissolve the present parliament. The Whigs soon discovered the design of their antagonists, and in order to render their attempt abortive, they introduced a bill for restoring corporations to their ancient rights and privileges; to which a clause was added, denouncing the severest penalties against those who had been any way concerned in delivering up the charters. The Tories opposed this clause with their utmost force, and it was at length rejected. The bill itself, itself, however, passed both houses; but the lords were so equally divided on this occasion, that the majority consisted of a single voice only. Both parties now made the strongest applications to the king to bring him over to their respective interests. William was under the greatest perplexity how to determine: the behaviour of the Whigs had given him sufficient reason to think that they were tainted with republican principles, and consequently enemies to the regal power. He was therefore persuaded, that by giving the royal assent to the bill, he must in a manner be dependent wholly on them, and therefore retain nothing more than the shadow of a king. On the other hand, he was no stranger to the attachment of the Tories to the divine indefeasible right of kings, and therefore it would be highest imprudence to place in them an unlimited confidence. These considerations, and the violent heats between the two parties so greatly affected him, that he was on the point of resigning the English sceptre, and retiring into Holland. The warmest of his friends interposed their influence, and by their persuasion William was prevailed upon to lay his plan aside. Determined not to resign the crown which had been so generously given him, he declared his intention of passing over into Ireland and heading his own army.

A. D. 1690. This declaration was agreeable to neither party. The friends of the revolution were fearful lest the fatigues of a campaign, and the bad climate of the country, exclusive of the chance of war, might have a fatal effect on the weak and tender constitution of the king, whose death, at this juncture, would probably involve the nation in all the horrors of a civil war. The Tories opposed it from a very different motive. They knew the military abilities of William, and therefore dreaded his taking the field against their old master. Both parties therefore for once agreed in their opposition, and determined to present an address against his intended expedition. William, aware of their intention, came to the house on the seventeenth of January, and in a speech which he made to both houses, declared, in form, his intention of passing over into Ireland. He told them, that having already ventured his life to preserve the laws and liberties of England, he was willing once more to expose it, in order to secure the enjoyment of these blessings. Having ended his speech he prorogued the parliament till the twenty-second of April; but on the sixth of February it was dissolved by proclamation, and the writs were issued for electing a new one to meet on the twentieth of March.

The election was so favourable to the Tories, that they had a considerable majority in the lower house, and the assembly was agitated with the most violent debates. Two bills in particular were violently opposed and as violently defended. The one for ratifying the acts of the preceding parliament; the other for requiring all persons in office, on pain of imprisonment, to take an oath, abjuring king James. The first passed notwithstanding the opposition of the most violent amongst the Tories. The house was apprehensive of the consequences, if that parliament, by virtue of which the present government was established, should be declared illegal. The second, which the Whigs supported in concert with the ministry, with all their power, was more obstinately opposed. The king, apprehensive that an open rupture between the two parties would be the consequence, desired the ministry to give up the point. This interposition of the king so highly disgusted the earl of Shrewsbury, then secretary of state, that he immediately resigned his post; nor could all the remonstrances of the king, who was no stranger to his great abilities, prevail upon him to keep the seals, till his return from Ireland. The Whigs had also the mortification to see an act of oblivion passed in favour of their antagonists.

After constituting the queen regent, during his absence, William embarked for Ireland on the fourth of June, and on the fourteenth landed at Carrickfergus, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough, and Manchester, and many other persons of distinction. The gallant Schomberg, grown old in arms, had not fulfilled the expectations of the people. His troops had been sickly and far inferior in number to those of the enemy. He had therefore carefully avoided an engagement with the Irish; but this delay, though the effect of prudence, and which deserved the highest applause, was the subject of complaint. So difficult is it to please a populace who have not the opportunity of judging equitably of the actions of great men!

The military affairs in Ireland put on a different aspect on the king's arrival. His army was now superior to that of the enemy, and William was at once more active and more successful. James determined to venture the whole on the event of a battle: William was equally desirous that one decisive engagement should put a final period to all competition for the sovereignty of Ireland. Both therefore moved towards each other in order of battle; the river Boyne separated the two armies, each of which consisted of near forty thousand men.

Before the battle began, William, desirous of reconnoitring the situation of the enemy, advanced to the bank of the river. His person was known by several of the officers in James's army, and two field pieces were brought down to the river's bank through a hidden pathway, and planted against his person. The first shot killed a man and two horses close to his side, and the second, rebounding from the ground, grazed his right shoulder, and occasioned a considerable contusion. The enemy, believing he was slain, gave way to the most extravagant expressions of joy. The news flew like lightening to France. The partizans of James, still blind and credulous in their prejudices, made public rejoicings, which certainly did honour to the prince they insulted.

William to prevent any confusion in his own army, rode through the ranks, and by that means effectually removed the impressions which this false rumour might otherwise have produced on the spirits of his troops. It was now determined in a council of war to cross the river, and give the enemy battle the next day. The English accordingly forded the stream, stood the shock of the Irish cavalry, and broke in upon, and dispersed the infantry. In this attack La Caillemont was killed at the head of the French refugees who served in William's army. Schomberg, informed of the furious attack made upon the regiments that had forded the river, and that the French refugees were without a leader, passed the stream immediately to head them. He had no sooner reached the opposite bank, than he rode full speed to the French protestants, and putting himself at their head, he cried out, "Behold your persecutors." Animated by his example, the refugees attacked the enemy with the utmost fury; but a party of James's guards, returning towards the main body of their army, surrounded Schomberg. Exasperated at the attempt, and desirous of revenging the insult, the refugees fired upon them with too little caution, one of the balls striking the general put an end to his life. Thus fell the famous Schomberg in the eighty-third year of his age, after a long life replete with military glory.

This misfortune was like to have been fatal to the whole army. The forces that had hitherto fought with such remarkable intrepidity, seemed to have lost their courage with their general: their arms remained inactive in their hands; they gazed at each other with silent astonishment, and gave ground apace. The enemy perceived it, and animated with so fortunate an incident, returned to the charge with such ardour and intrepidity, as seemed to command success. William, who might be said to be every where during the whole action, perceived the advantage of the enemy, and brought up the left wing at the very moment when they were going to fall upon the center. Intimidated at his approach they halted, faced about and retreated retreated to the village of Dunmore, about half a mile from the pass. There they made so brave a stand, that the Dutch and Danish horse, though headed by the king in person, unable to sustain their fire, gave way: the Irishkillers themselves seemed unwilling to advance. Alarmed at this backwardness, William rode up to the latter, and in a sharp tone of voice asked them, if this was the behaviour he was to expect from them? Stung with this reproach, they resumed their usual courage, and returned to the charge with irresistible fury; and the enemy, after a very bloody conflict, was driven back with considerable loss. General Hamilton, who had inspired the Irish with courage and intrepidity during the whole action was now taken prisoner. This loss was decisive. William met with no farther opposition, but from the French and Swiss guards, who retreated in good order.

In this battle James lost about fifteen hundred men, among whom were the lords Dungan, and Carlingford, Sir Neile O'Neile, and the marquis of Hocquincourt. The English lost about five hundred men, an inconsiderable number in gaining so important a battle; had not the duke of Scomberg, the most illustrious general in Europe, been one of the number.

In this memorable battle the contrast between the two kings was remarkable. James, merely a spectator of an action in which he bore a principal part, was the foremost in the retreat. His former courage was shook by misfortunes. He reproached the Irish with cowardice, and embarked for France, where he was sure of living in quiet. William was every where in the thickest of the action, encouraging his troops with his presence, and animating them by his example. They followed with ardor a prince who displayed such admirable conduct, resolution, and presence of mind. The Irish themselves were so sensible of this advantage, that they declared, if the English would change kings with them they would fight the battle over again.

William pursued the victory he had gained over James with great vigilance and success. His generals took many places, and he himself laid siege to Limerick. But the badness of the season, and the resistance of the inhabitants obliged him to abandon the enterprise.

While the king was employed in the reducing of Ireland, his queen held the English reins of government with a steadiness and resolution that gained her the admiration of the whole kingdom. On receiving advice that a powerful fleet was fitted out at Brest in order to make a descent on the west of England, the queen ordered the earl of Torrington, who then lay with his fleet in the Downs, to sail immediately to Portsmouth, and collect a number of ships sufficient to enable him to render the design of the enemy abortive. While the admiral lay at St. Helen's advice arrived from Weymouth, that the French fleet, consisting of seventy-eight ships of the line and two fire-ships, had entered the channel. The admiral had been lately joined by a squadron of Dutch men of war, but several ships expected from Plymouth had hitherto been prevented, by contrary winds, from joining him. A council of war was immediately called, and it seemed to be the general opinion that it would be imprudent to meet the enemy, as the whole combined fleet did not exceed fifty-six sail; but before any resolution was taken an express arrived from the queen, with positive orders to hazard an engagement at all events, rather than suffer the enemy to sail up the channel, and insult the English coasts and harbours.

Pursuant to these orders Torrington stood out to sea immediately, with the combined fleets of England and Holland. The enemy soon appeared in sight, and on the thirtieth of June, the engagement began off Beachy-head about nine in the morning. The blue squadron engaged the French with the utmost bravery, but Torrington kept his division in a line, and fought at too great a distance. The Dutch, desirous of bringing on a closer engagement, advanced towards the enemy, and by that means were separated from the English. Tourville, the French admiral, perceived the imprudent valour of the Dutch had carried them too far, and determined to take advantage of their error. He accordingly collected all his ships that were now engaged with the English, and surrounded the Dutch squadron. All retreat was now cut off; and the whole squadron must have been taken, had not Calémbourgh the Dutch admiral fortunately ordered his ships to drop their anchors with all their sails standing. This saved his squadron. The tide set strongly up the channel, and there being very little wind, the French, who were ignorant of the stratagem, were soon hurried away by the tide, while the Dutch continued safe at anchor beyond the reach of their cannon. They had, however, received considerable damage; their two vice admirals were killed, and several of their ships so greatly shattered, that they were obliged to sink them, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. The English lost two ships, two of their captains, and about four hundred men. The next day the English admiral called a council of war, in which he was resolved to retreat without hazarding another engagement, and to destroy all the disabled ships should the enemy attempt a pursuit. Torrington accordingly retreated without much interruption to the mouth of the Thames, while Tourville, after continuing about five days in the channel returned to Brest. The nation was at once exasperated and alarmed at this incident. It was the common opinion, that if Torrington had followed the example of the blue squadron, and brought on a close engagement, the enemy must have been defeated; the consequence of which, would in all probability have been fatal to the French, as it was almost impossible for them to have returned to Brest, a very considerable squadron then lying in Plymouth sound. Torrington's conduct was censured by his own admirals, and on his arrival in London, he was sent to the tower.

This defeat though attended with no alarming consequences, furnished the jacobites with matter sufficient for an ungenerous triumph. The people, who see only the surface of things, were seized with the most gloomy apprehensions; a descent on the coast was every day expected; and a general panic was spread over the kingdom. The queen alone seemed unaffected with this unmanly fear; she behaved with admirable spirit and discretion. She made use of every precaution to render any attempt of the enemy abortive. The principal sea-ports were put into a good state of defence: proper orders were issued for refitting the ships and augmenting the navy; the militia of the western counties was embodied; and to strike a greater terror into the domestic enemies of the government, a proclamation was issued for apprehending several disaffected persons, who were either suspected or accused of holding a correspondence with James and his party, for disturbing the internal peace of the kingdom.

Pleased with this prudent and magnanimous conduct in the queen, she received addresses from the city of London and most of the principal counties and corporations in the kingdom, who all declared their resolution of supporting her, her royal consort, and the present government, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. These addresses were very grateful to the queen, who pursued her measures with such prudence and success, that the clamour gradually subsided, and the tongue of envy was hushed to peace. Soon after William had left Ireland, the celebrated earl of Marlborough landed at the head of five thousand men in the neighbourhood of Corke, and being joined by nearly the same number under the command of the duke of Wirtemberg and general Scrivenmore, he undertook to reduce several of the places in Ireland. Success attended all his measures; he took the towns of Corke and Kingsale, which were of the last importance to James on account of their maritime situation; ation; and the count de Lauzun, who commanded the French troops in Ireland, despairing of James's cause, thought proper to evacuate the kingdom.

The greater part of Europe was now in arms against France; the treaty of Aulburgh, was not sufficient to crush the power of Lewis XIV. The prince of Waldeck, general of the confederates, who had conquered d'Humières at Valcour, was beaten at Fleurus by the marshal de Luxembourg, the pupil and imitator of the great Condé. There now seemed a necessity for all the powers engaged in the alliance to exert themselves in the common cause, or submit to receive a peace dictated by the most ambitious monarch in Europe.

William opened the session of parliament on the second of October with a speech from the throne, in which he informed the assembly, that he had used his utmost endeavours for the reduction of Ireland, in which he had met with great success, and doubted not but he should have finished the arduous task, if the necessary supplies had been granted him in time during the last session. He put them in mind also, that he had asked no revenue for himself, but what he had subjected to be charged for the use of the war; recommended to them the care of clearing his revenue, so as to enable him to subsist, and maintain the charge of the civil government. Then addressing himself to both houses, told them, that he hoped they would proceed in their deliberations with spirit and concord; and that who ever should endeavour to divert their attention from the important subjects he had recommended to them, could neither be his friends, nor the friends of the kingdom.

Both houses of parliament addressed him separately on this speech, in which they congratulated him on his success in Ireland, and on the queen's happy administration during his absence. The commons particularly told him, "That he too freely exposed his invaluable life, on which the whole protestant interest of Europe depended;" and concluded with assuring him, "that they should always be ready to assist him to the utmost of their power: and as the best and truest way of expressing their gratitude, they would endeavour effectually to support his government against all his enemies."

Nor were they long before they carried these assurances into execution: for the very day their address was presented, they voted a supply of four millions for the service of the ensuing year: a larger sum than had ever before been granted by an English parliament to their prince. Among other taxes for raising this prodigious sum, a land-tax of three shillings in the pound was imposed; the excise upon beer and ale was doubled; a duty was laid on all India goods, foreign wrought silks, and several other commodities imported; and a duty was imposed upon new wines and spirits of the first extraction. They also voted that one million should be raised by the forfeited estates in Ireland, and that a bill should be prepared for confiscating these estates, with a clause empowering his majesty to grant one third of them to those who had served in the war: but this bill failed in the house of lords.

A.D. 1691. On the fifth of January, the king, impatient of being in Holland where a congress was appointed to be held by the allies, came to the house of peers, and after giving the royal assent to such bills as were ready, he put an end to the session with a speech from the throne, wherein he assured both houses, that he entertained the most grateful sense of their liberality and dispatch; that the supplies they had granted should be faithfully employed in the services for which they were allotted: that he would make no grant of the forfeited estates in Ireland, till that affair should be fully settled in parliament, to the satisfaction of all parties. That he hoped they would take care to propagate in their several counties, the same principles of zeal and attachment to his government, which they had so eminently displayed in parliament: and that he trusted the good understanding between him and his subjects, would be more than sufficient to defeat the designs of their secret foes, and the attempts of their open and avowed enemies.

After putting an end to the session of parliament, the king embarked for Holland on the sixteenth of January, in order to assist at a congress of the confederate princes and states, appointed to be held at the Hague, to concert measures for the defence of the liberties of Europe against the encroachments of France. On his arrival in the capital of the United Provinces, the states general, the states of Holland, the council of state, and other colleges, waited on the king with congratulations on his safe arrival. On the twenty-sixth of January, he made a public entry, and was received with great pomp, and the sincerest expressions of joy. Triumphant arches were erected in the principal streets through which he passed, filled with inscriptions expressing his great and generous actions in defence of public liberty.

The congress was opened soon after his arrival. It consisted of the imperial ministers, those from Spain, Denmark, Sweden, Poland, Brandenburg, Saxony, Trier, Mentz, Cologne, the Palatine, Savoy, Zell, Munster, Hesse-Cassel, Wolfenbuttel, Hanover, Holstein Gottorp, Liege, and those from king William. The whole forming one of the most glorious assemblies mentioned in the annals of history, and convened for the noblest purpose, that of opposing the ambitious encroachments of an arbitrary prince, and securing the peace, tranquillity, and liberties of a whole continent.

William opened the congress with a very pathetic speech, in which he displayed, in the most forcible colours, "the imminent danger to which they were at present exposed; plainly demonstrated the impropriety of their former conduct, and the absolute necessity of an immediate change of measures: that this was not the time to deliberate, but to act: that the enemy was already master of the principal fortresses which formed the barrier of the common liberty; and would soon be able to possess himself of all the inferior fortifications, if a spirit of division, selfishness, and irresolution, continued to influence them: that every one ought to consider his own interest as involved in the good of the whole: that the forces of the enemy were numerous and powerful; and, if not prevented, would sweep every thing before them like a torrent: that it was in vain to oppose the pretensions of injustice by unavailing complaints, unprofitable clamour, or fruitless protestations: that not the resolutions of a peaceable diet, nor the hopes of some men of fortune built on a sandy foundation, would be sufficient; but that of powerful armies, bold enterprizes, and a prompt and vigorous execution to accomplish the glorious work: that all these must be instantly employed against the common enemy, if they meant to check his progress, and to snatch from his hands the liberties of Europe, which he was now subjecting to a cruel and heavy yoke." He concluded with assuring them, "That, for his own part, he would neither spare his forces, his credit, nor his own person, to effect so noble a design; but would appear in the spring at the head of his troops, to fulfil faithfully his royal promises."

This speech was received with great applause by the whole assembly, and produced the most happy effect. A resolution was immediately taken to employ two hundred and five thousand men against France, of which the several princes and states were to furnish the following proportions: the king of England, twenty thousand; the emperor, twenty thousand; the king of Spain in Flanders, twenty thousand; the states-general, twenty-five thousand; the duke of Savoy, and the troops of Milan, twenty thousand; the elector of Bavaria, eighteen thousand; the elector of Saxony, twelve thousand; the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, eight thousand; the circles of Suabia and Franconia, ten thousand; the duke of Wirtemberg, six thousand; the elector of Brandenburg, twenty thousand; the elector Palatine, four thousand thousand; the prince of Liege, six thousand; and the prince of Lunenburg, sixteen thousand. Had these engagements been punctually fulfilled, a final stop would soon have been put to the conquests of France; but this was far from being the case. Few of the princes took any care to send their full quota of troops to the general rendezvous; so that England and Holland were obliged to bear almost the whole expence and burden of the war.

While William was thus nobly opposing the power of France in the Low Countries, his general in Ireland, baron Ginckle, ruined the remains of James's interest in that kingdom. Athlone was taken by storm, and almost under the eye of the Irish army. A decisive battle was fought at Atrim, where the catholic forces were totally routed; and Tyrconnel, the principal friend of James, was so affected with that fatal misfortune, that he died of grief. The taking of Limerick crowned the success of Ginckle. He granted the inhabitants an honourable capitulation, in which all the other places that had not yet submitted were comprehended. It was declared, that whoever should acknowledge the authority of William and Mary, a few persons only excepted, should be restored to their fortunes, privileges and immunities, and enjoy the protection of the laws; that each person should have liberty to retire, with his family and effects, into any other country except England or Scotland; that such as chose this alternative, should be provided with carriages and transport vessels; that the Roman catholics should enjoy the free exercise of their religion, as far as was consistent with the laws of Ireland, and in the same manner they had enjoyed it in the reign of Charles II. Whether the protestants were satisfied with this treaty is not absolutely known; but Ginckle was ordered to put an end to the war; and his expedition was so much the more glorious, as Lewis XIV. had sent a reinforcement of troops, and large quantities of ammunition and provisions, to Limerick. But notwithstanding the amnesty and liberty of conscience, above twelve thousand Irish chose rather to banish themselves, than submit to the government. France was the kingdom they chose for their retreat, and where they were thanked by James for their fidelity. It would have been more to his honour, and, perhaps, to his advantage, had he put himself at their head, and supported the declining state of a kingdom so firmly attached to his service.

William returned to England in the month of April, and exerted all his abilities in restoring peace to his kingdom, which had been greatly disturbed during his absence by the secret practices of the malecontents. A conspiracy had been formed for restoring James, and several persons apprehended just as they were going to sail for France. This rendered the plot abortive. The king having thus put an end to a contrivance that seemed to threaten the peace of England, embarked for Holland on the second of May, in order to put himself at the head of the confederate army.

The French had taken the field much sooner than the allies. Luxemburg, with an army of forty thousand men, was advancing to besiege Brussels; while the marquis de Boufflers, with another army, sat down before Liege. William lost no time in putting himself at the head of the allied army, and soon rendered both enterprizes abortive. The French were obliged to raise the siege of both places almost as soon as the trenches were opened. He endeavoured to bring Luxemburg to an engagement; but in this he was disappointed; that general was unwilling to engage an army greatly superior to his own; and the campaign ended in Flanders without any considerable advantage being gained on either side.

On the nineteenth of October, William landed in England from the continent; and on the twenty-second opened the session of parliament with a speech from the throne, wherein he informed both houses, "That he hoped the success his forces had met with in Ireland would be a powerful inducement to their assisting him with fresh supplies. He recommended the keeping a strong fleet at sea, and an army of sixty-five thousand men ashore, that they might annoy the enemy in the most sensible part; adding, that they had now an opportunity of establishing their future quiet and prosperity on a firm foundation; an opportunity which, if now neglected, might never return."

The parliament congratulated William on his success, and declared their readiness to support him in the necessary war in which he was engaged against France. They also thanked general Ginckle for his services, and the king created him earl of Athlone. But in the promise given by the parliament, there was, in general, more flattery than sincerity. A secret discontent was every day gaining ground in the kingdom. The idea of keeping on foot an army of sixty thousand men alarmed the people. It was thought very strange, that a greater number of troops should now be thought necessary than in times of the greatest danger: it was even insinuated, that so numerous an army might be employed to establish the throne of despotism on the ruins of the people's liberties. They complained, that they bore the whole burden of the war without reaping any of the profits. The most mortifying reflections were thrown out on the conduct of the ministry and the character of the king. He was charged with ill-nature and ingratitude, chiefly on account of the earl of Marlborough, who, instead of being rewarded for his services, was disgraced. He was also accused of employing corruption in electing members to serve in parliament. The Jacobites exaggerated all these grievances; and the Whigs, who had sufficient reason to complain, were not more tender with regard to the reputation of the ministers. These reflections, however, produced no alarming consequences; the commons voted upwards of a million and a half for the service of the navy and ordnance, and above two millions for the service of the land forces.

A. D. 1692. The funds for the year being at last settled, the king came to the house of peers on the twenty-fourth of February; and, after giving the royal assent to the bills that were ready, closed the session with a short speech, in which he thanked his parliament for the zeal and attachment they had shewn for his government, and the liberality and dispatch with which they had provided for the necessities of the state; adding, that he intended speedily to pass over to the continent, in order to head the allied army in person.

Scotland, during these transactions, was greatly agitated. William, ever since the commencement of his reign, had treated the presbyterians with great respect; but that fiery sect soon displeased him by their strange conduct. He changed his opinion, and conferred his favours wholly on the friends of episcopacy. These, in their turn, abused the credit they had obtained over a people whom they hated. Their behaviour enraged the presbyterians, and the dissolution of their assembly was considered as an act of tyranny. They, however, continued their meetings, though express orders had been sent from the king to the contrary, and became the implacable censors of government. William had, indeed, given them reason for complaint, by massacring a number of the Scots highlanders, though Macdonald, their chief, had taken the oaths to the government. An enemy of that leader had represented him at court as an obstinate rebel. Possibly the king was a stranger to his submission, and a cruel order was as cruelly executed. Part of the inhabitants of the valley of Glencow was also put to the sword, their houses burnt, their cattle carried off, and their wives and children left without support amidst their native snow. Thus the few whom the sword had spared fell victims to cold and hunger. This cruel execution occasioned such heavy complaints, that the king ordered the authors and abettors of it to be impeached. He declared he was ignorant of the contents of an order signed by his own hand. Terror only restrained the Scots highlanders from taking a severe revenge: they mourned in silence the loss of their friends, who merited a much better fate, but were never thoroughly friends to William's government.

Soon after the king's departure for Holland, Lewis XIV. engaged with the Jacobites in England to make another effort for restoring James to his throne. An invasion was projected, and it was agreed that the troops should be landed on the coast of Suffex. So much precaution had been taken in France in carrying on the necessary preparations, that every thing was ready for executing the design before it was so much as suspected in England. The land forces consisted of four battalions of English and Irish troops, and about nine thousand French, commanded by the marshal de Belfondes; so that the whole amounted to twenty thousand men. A fleet of three hundred transports was collected, and provided with every thing necessary for the invasion. The troops were ready to embark, and waited only the arrival of the count d'Etrees with a squadron of twelve men of war, appointed to escort the transports; while Tourville cruized in the channel with the grand fleet.

James sent over colonel Parker about the beginning of the year, to give his friends intelligence of his design. Parker, not content with executing his commission, formed a plot with one Johnson for assassinating king William; but before an opportunity offered for executing their barbarous design, the king embarked for Holland, which rendered the whole abortive.

Soon after the king's departure, James sent over a printed declaration, dated at St. Germain's; in which he openly avowed his intentions of using all the means in his power to recover the throne of his ancestors; and boasted of having obtained assistance from France sufficient, he hoped, to render the attempt successful. At the same time he exhorted all his faithful subjects to continue in their fidelity. He offered pardon and rewards to all the prince of Orange's soldiers, and others who should think proper to join him; and even proceeded so far as to except by name from this indemnity no less than thirteen noblemen, two bishops, seven barons, and a great number of the clergy and gentry. This declaration was ordered to be published as soon as the troops were ready to be embarked.

Parker and his agents were, in the mean time, busily employed in enlisting men privately in the northern counties; while Fontaine, as lieutenant-colonel to lord Montgomery and colonel Holman, employed themselves in forming two regiments of horse in London, ready to join James on his landing. But their zeal for the service of their master carried them too far. Persuaded that every person in the kingdom who was not a zealous friend to the established government would readily join in an attempt to overturn it, they made no difficulty of applying to all who had shewn the least dissatisfaction at the public measures. Rear admiral Carter was known to have strenuously defended the rights of the people, and on this foundation only they made application to him as a friend to the dethroned monarch. Their bigotted prejudices prevented them from reflecting, that he who was a true friend to liberty, must be an enemy to James, and every other prince who laboured to establish his throne on the ruins of English freedom. Carter immediately informed the queen and council of the offers that had been made him by Fontaine and Holman. Alarmed at this discovery, and desirous of procuring the necessary information, Carter was desired to continue his correspondence with the conspirators, and pretend an inclination of joining them. He fully performed the request of the council; and the conspirators, who exulted in having gained over to their interest so able an officer, made him acquainted with all their secrets. They immediately dispatched an express to lord Melfort, James's secretary, informing him of their success in corrupting Carter, who would take care to bring over all the officers of his squadron. At the same time, they desired he would press the king of France to send peremptory orders to Tourville to sail directly, without waiting for d'Etrees. This proved the destruction of the whole scheme. James repaired to La Hogue, on the coast of Normandy, where the troops were ready to embark, and Tourville was ordered to sail immediately.

The manifesto of James was now published, in which the severities of the prince of Orange's government, the enormous expences to which he had put the nation, were enumerated, and the people invited to return to the allegiance of their native prince. He promised to protect the church of England, to establish an entire liberty of conscience, to make trade and navigation flourish, to redress all the grievances, and to confirm the happiness of the nation. These fine promises were not, however, sufficient to efface the remembrance of the many grievances which had forced the people to drive him from the throne. Whatever discontents might prevail in England, the animosity against James was much stronger than the murmurs against his rival.

This declaration was hardly published, before the Dutch fleet, consisting of thirty-six sail of the line, under the command of admiral Allemonde, joined the English at St. Helen's; and admiral Russel, who commanded in chief, received orders to put to sea immediately. The trained bands of London and Westminster, amounting to about ten thousand men, were drawn up in Hyde Park, and reviewed by the queen in person.

On the eighteenth of May, admiral Russel left St. Helen's, and stood over towards the coast of France. About three the next morning, the scouts, to the westward of the fleet, made the signal for discovering the enemy, and orders were immediately given for forming the line of battle. This was soon effected, and the whole fleet stood towards the enemy in the following order. The Dutch squadron formed the van; the red squadron the center; and the blue squadron the rear. The French admiral was astonished when he saw the combined fleets of England and Holland. He had received no advice of this junction, and flattered himself with being able to defeat the English, unassisted by their ally. He might, however, have declined an engagement; but having received positive orders to fight the enemy, he resolved to obey, and exert all his endeavours to execute the commands of his master, in the manner becoming a good officer and an intrepid seaman.

The combined fleet consisted of ninety-nine ships of the line, and the French only sixty-three. About half an hour after eleven, Tourville, in the Royal Sun, a ship of one hundred and ten guns, brought to, began the fight with admiral Russel, and continued the engagement about an hour and a-half, when he began to tow off in great disorder, his rigging, sails and top-sail yards being very much damaged.

Hitherto the wind had been westerly, but it now flew about to the north-west; and soon after, five ships of the enemy posted themselves, three a-head, and two a-stern of their admiral, and continued firing very smartly till about three o'clock; so that Russel and his two seconds, Churchill and Aylmer, had six or seven ships upon them at once. About four a thick fog came up, and the firing on both sides ceased; but it clearing up in a little time, the French admiral was discovered towing away to the northward, and Russel ordered all the ships of his division to do the like. A small breeze from the eastward now sprung up, and the signal was immediately made for chasing. About this time a continued firing was heard to the westward; and it soon appeared that Sir Cloudesty Shovel, rear-admiral of the red, having got to windward of Tourville's squadron, had attacked their admiral of the blue. After the engagement had continued for some time, the ships of both squadrons came to an anchor. In the mean time, admiral Ruffel ordered all the ships of his division to stand to the westward during the night, from a persuasion that the French would do all in their power to escape to Brest. He was not mistaken; for in the morning he found himself much nearer to the enemy than those who had come to an anchor. About eight at night a firing was heard to the westward, and continued about half an hour; part of the English blue squadron having fallen in with some ships of the enemy during the fog; and in that dispute rear-admiral Carter was slain. Finding his last moments were at hand, he begged his captain to fight this ship as long as she would swim; a sufficient proof that there was not the least reason to suspect his zeal for the service of his country.

The fog continued during the whole night, with very little wind; and in the morning it was so hazy, that very few of the enemy's ships could be seen; but the weather clearing up about eight, the Dutch, who were at some distance to the southward, made the signal for seeing the French fleet, and soon after, thirty-four sail were discovered about two or three leagues distant to the south-west, the wind being then at north-east. The English now crowded all the sail possible; and between eleven and twelve the wind came about to the south-west, when the French stood away to the westward, and the English after them. About eleven the next day the Royal Sun ran ashore, while two other large ships of the enemy stood as near her as possible. Sir Ralph Delaval, vice-admiral of the red, was now ordered to destroy the Royal Sun, while the rest of the fleet continued their pursuit of the enemy. This service he effectually performed, and the finest ship in the French navy was reduced to ashes.

About four in the afternoon, eighteen of the French ships which had reached Cape Barfleur, haled in for La Hogue, and came to an anchor close under the shore. The next day Ruffel ordered Mr. Rooke, vice-admiral of the blue, with his squadron, the fire-ships, and all the boats of the fleet, to stand in and destroy those ships. He obeyed his orders, and burnt thirteen men of war, several transports, and some small vessels, loaded with ammunition.

In this famous engagement two ships of one hundred and four guns, one of ninety, two of eighty, four of seventy-six, four of sixty, and two of fifty-six guns, belonging to the enemy, were destroyed. James saw this destruction, and was so sensibly affected by the misfortune, that, in a letter he wrote to the king of France on this occasion, he begged he would leave him to his fate. "I have hitherto (said he) supported, with some constancy and resolution, the weight of my misfortunes, while I myself was the only sufferer; but this disaster has overwhelmed me with grief, and left me no room for comfort. I know too well that my own unlucky star has drawn this misfortune upon your forces, always victorious but when they fought for my interest, and therefore I no longer merit the support of so great a monarch. Let me therefore intreat your majesty to concern yourself no longer for a prince so dreadfully unfortunate; but permit me to retire, with my family, to some corner of the world, where I may cease to obstruct the course of your majesty's successes and conquests, and where it will be the greatest of my consolations to hear of the quick return of your majesty's wonted triumphs, both by sea and land, over both your enemies and mine. This, I doubt not, will soon be the case, when my interest shall be no longer intermixed with yours." Lewis endeavoured to alleviate his afflictions by every method in his power. He wrote him an answer, filled with the kindest expressions, and promised never to forsake him in his misfortunes.

The queen was no sooner informed of this victory, than she sent thirty thousand pounds to Portsmouth, in order to its being distributed among the sailors; ordered medals to be struck for the officers; and caused the bodies of admiral Carter and colonel Hastings, who had fallen in the engagement, to be honourably interred. The French, in their turn, were threatened with an invasion, and about seven thousand men embarked on board the fleet for that purpose. Great expectations were formed with regard to this expedition; but the advanced season of the year was thought a sufficient reason for laying it aside, and the troops were sent over to serve in Flanders.

But if Lewis was unfortunate at sea, it was different with regard to his army in the Low Countries. He took Namur in person. The marshal de Luxembourg, who covered the siege, conducted the whole with such address, that William, at the head of a numerous and powerful army, could neither pass the Maes, nor throw any succours into that important place. Luxembourg, though then extremely ill, gained a victory over him, some time after, at Steinkirk; but William found inexhaustible resources in his genius. He kept the field as if he had not been conquered, and the joy which this victory occasioned in France was a kind of triumph for him. It is often as glorious to repair the misfortunes of a defeat, as to gain a victory. About this time a conspiracy, formed against the life of king William, was discovered. The whole was attributed to the French minister, and, indeed, with sufficient reason.

The English malecontents were greatly dissatisfied with the affairs on the continent. They thought not so much of the propriety of opposing a monarch who was the common disturber of Europe, as of the consequences of a war, which would at last beggar and depopulate the kingdom. The king (said they) is sacrificing the state to foreigners. The interest and necessities of the English affect him much less than the advantages of the Dutch; imprisonments and illegal violences make the former feel all the weight of despotism; the ministry pay no regard to the laws, or to public liberty; each prefers his own interest to that of his country; and even those evils will only prove a prelude to greater, unless a speedy remedy be applied." It must, indeed, be acknowledged, that the principles of the nation were greatly altered. Meannets rose to affluence, affluence led to luxury, and luxury to corruption. The scandalous practice of purchasing votes in parliament had grown common, and the disorder spread with rapidity. So that the spirit of party, which exaggerates every thing, had an ample field for the exercise of its malignancy. William accordingly, on his return from Holland, found the affairs of the kingdom in a greater ferment than ever. The most violent debates were carried on in the house of lords, on account of the imprisonment of certain peers; and it was resolved that the judges, and others, who had caused the prisoners to be arrested for high-treason, ought, according to the act of habeas corpus, to have admitted them to bail, unless two witnesses were ready to declare upon oath, that they were really guilty; but these they could not produce. Alarmed at the ferment, and dreading the consequences, William immediately set the prisoners at liberty. On the other hand, the commons entered into inquiries, why the victory at sea had not been pursued? Why the intended descent had been laid aside? and why proper care had not been taken to cover the trade, by having convoys stationed at proper places? They also deliberated on presenting a remonstrance to the king on different subjects; but the influence of the ordinary means of corruption soon put an end to the design, and induced them to grant large and extravagant supplies. Two millions were destined for the navy, and more than three for the army and the continental war. They voted fifty-four thousand men, of whom twenty thousand were to remain in the kingdom, for its defence. Estates real and personal, except the pay of military officers, were taxed at the rate of four shillings in the pound.

pound. The lords added a clause to the bill, implying, that they had taxed themselves. This gave offence to the commons, who affirmed it to be a violation of the right they possessed in all regulations of parliamentary supplies. The lords gave up the dispute, but declared they did it only in consideration of the urgent necessities of the state. But notwithstanding the almost servile compliance of the parliament, some measures were attempted contrary to the views of the court. It was proposed to annihilate the East-India Company, which was charged with great abuses; and to pass an act to render parliaments triennial, in order to prevent bribery and corruption at elections. But the ministry had sufficient influence and address to render these designs abortive.

A. D. 1693. On the thirty-first of March, the king embarked at Gravesend, and landed safely at the Maese on the second of April. He soon after put himself at the head of the allied army, and advanced against the enemy. Luxembourg surprized and attacked him at Nerwind with a superior army. The king lost not a moment. He drew up his forces in order of battle, exposed himself to every kind of danger, but was obliged at last to give way to the numbers of the enemy. Though vanquished, he made a glorious retreat, and was still respectable. Nor did the French reap any other advantage from their victory than that of making themselves masters of Charleroy. William was thought to have gained more real honour in the battle of Nerwind than when he triumphed at the Boyne. His very enemies were charmed with his conduct. It was a common saying in the French camp, that "they wanted only such a king to make themselves masters of Christendom." The prince of Conti, in a letter he wrote to his comfort, used the following expression: "I saw the king exposing himself to the greatest dangers; and surely so much valour very well deserves the peaceable possession of the crown he wears." The king of France himself is reported to have said, "That Luxembourg's behaviour was like that of the prince of Conti, but William's like that of marshal Turenne."

Germany and Piedmont were also at the same time the theatres of war. The Palatinate was inhumanly ravaged by the duke of Lorges. The duke of Savoy, who, the preceding year, had spread desolation through Dauphiny, was defeated near Marseilles by Catinat. But Lewis XIV. notwithstanding so many victories, found enemies in every quarter, capable of making the strongest resistance. The dreadful scourge of war, after strewing the plains with the bodies of the dead, frequently leaves nothing more behind than vain exultations on the side of the victor. The more dreadful scourge of famine followed that of war. Two harvests had failed, and the vintage had suffered greatly; so that the French had neither bread nor wine. The utmost diligence was used to import corn from other countries; and the famous Dubart seasonably purchased large quantities both in Sweden and Denmark, conveying it safely into the harbours of France.

The affairs at sea were not advantageous to England. The French had, in some measure, repaired their losses at La Hogue, and the commerce of the allies suffered greatly. The English and Dutch fleets were, indeed, very strong, and sailed early. The admirals were not at first restrained by any particular instructions, but ordered in general to destroy the ships of the enemy, and protect the trade; but they afterwards received particular instructions with regard to a large fleet of near four hundred sail of merchant ships belonging to England, Holland, and Hamburg. After several councils held on this occasion, it was determined that the whole fleet, together with the Mediterranean squadron, should proceed together thirty leagues west-south-west from Ushant; when Sir George Rooke, who was appointed to command the squadron destined to convoy them, was to proceed with them towards the ports to which they were bound. Accordingly Sir George, with all the Turkey ships, left the main body of the fleet on the sixth of June; and steering for the Straights, left by the way the vessels bound for Bilbao, Lisbon, St. Ubes, and other ports. When he was within sixty leagues of Cape St. Vincent, he discovered part of the French fleet; on which he immediately called a council of war, where it was resolved, that as the wind was northerly, and a fresh gale, the merchant ships should make the best of their way to Cadiz. This resolution was hardly taken, before the whole fleet of the enemy, consisting of eighty sail, under the command of Tourville, was discovered. Rooke was persuaded there was now no time to retreat; but Vandergoes, the Dutch vice-admiral, informed him, that he chose to avoid an engagement, which he thought extremely hazardous. Rooke therefore followed his advice, and they both stood off with an easy sail, that the heavy ships might work up to windward. At the same time, the Sheerness was dispatched with orders to the small ships, near the land, to endeavour to keep close under the shore during the night, and take shelter in Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz. About six in the evening, the van of the enemy came up with the sternmost of the confederate fleet, consisting of three Dutch men of war. These bravely fought, first eleven, and then seven of the enemy's ships, for five hours together. They had the good fortune to clear themselves from the former; but were obliged to submit to the latter, after making a most obstinate resistance. The Dutch merchant ships immediately tacked and stood in for the shore, and the enemy after them. Rooke stood off to sea during the night; and the next morning fifty-four of the merchant ships, and several men of war, were about him; but no more than two of the latter belonged to the Dutch. Five sail of the enemy's ships were seen to leeward, and two to windward; the latter kept in sight of him till it was night. The next day the admiral called a council of war, where it was determined to sail directly to the Madeiras, in order to procure water, and thence either to Cork or Kingale. This resolution was accordingly executed, and Sir George conducted that part of the fleet back to Ireland in safety.

Had the enemy pursued their first advantage with the same conduct and resolution, hardly a ship could have escaped; for when the Dutch tacked and stood in for the shore, the van of the French were within cannon-shot of the English admiral; but their tacking after the Dutch gave the other part of the fleet an opportunity of escaping. The loss was, however, very considerable, and fell chiefly on the Hollanders, who lost on this occasion above eighty sail of merchant ships, and three men of war. The English lost only one man of war, and about five merchant-men.

About the latter end of October, the king returned to England; and on the seventh of November, opened the session of parliament with the following speech from the throne.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am always glad to meet you here; and I could heartily wish that our satisfaction were not lessened at present by reflecting upon the disadvantages we have received this year at land, and the miscarriages in our affairs at sea. I think it is evident, that the former were only occasioned by the great number of our enemies, which exceeded ours in all places. For what relates to the latter, which reflects so great disgrace upon the nation, I have repented it extremely; and as I will take care that those who have not done their duty shall be punished, so I am resolved to use my utmost endeavours, that our power at sea may be rightly managed for the future: and it will well deserve your consideration, whether we are not defective, both in the number of our shipping, and in proper ports to the westward, for the better annoying our enemies, and protecting our trade, which is so essential to the welfare of these kingdoms.

"My

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am very sensible of the good affection wherewith you have always assisted me to support the charges of the war, which have been very great; and yet I am persuaded that the experience of this summer is sufficient to convince us all, that, to arrive at a good end of it, there will be a necessity of increasing our forces, both by sea and land, the next year. Our allies have resolved to add to theirs; and I will not doubt, that you will have such regard to the present exigence, as that you will give me a suitable supply to enable me to do the like. I must therefore earnestly recommend it to you, gentlemen of the house of commons, to take such timely resolutions, as that your supplies may be effectual, and our preparations so forward, as will be necessary both for the honour and security of the nation."

The commons in answer to this speech, unanimously declared they would support his majesty and his government, and grant sufficient supply for the vigorous prosecution of the war. But before they proceeded to take the supplies into consideration, they began an enquiry into causes of the miscarriage of the fleet during the last summer, and the best methods for securing the trade of the nation. But the enquiring into the miscarriage of the fleet was attended with no discoveries; a mismanagement appeared some where; but it was found impossible to fix it on any individuals.

This enquiry being finished, the commons proceeded to deliberate on the supplies, and voted, that five hundred thousand pounds be raised towards discharging the wages due to the seamen; and that a farther sum of two millions be granted to their majesties for the maintenance of the fleet, including the ordnance: that the number of forces in their majesties pay be increased to fix new regiments of English dragoons, and fifteen new regiments of English foot: that eighty-three thousand one hundred and twenty-one men, including commission and non-commission officers, were necessary for the service of the ensuing year, to be employed in England and beyond the seas: and that the sum of two millions, five hundred thirty-five thousand, five hundred and ninety pounds be granted for the maintenance of the land forces. They also voted one hundred and eighteen thousand pounds to make good the annuity deficiency; and two hundred ninety-six thousand six hundred and ninety-two pounds to make good the deficiency of the poll-bill. Thus the supplies voted for the service of the ensuing year, amounted to near five millions and a half, and were raised by a land-tax of four shillings in the pound; by an increase of annuities; a farther excise on beer, and a duty on salt.

After finishing these votes, the commons passed a bill for rendering all members of their house incapable of trust and profit. This bill also passed the upper house, and lay ready for the royal assent; but when the king came to the house of peers to pass the land-tax bill, he thought proper to refuse it. This refusal alarmed the commons: the whole house was turned into a committee on the state of the nation, and it was resolved, "That whoever advised the king not to give the royal assent to the act which was to redress a grievance, and take off a scandal from the commons in parliament, is an enemy to their majesties and the kingdom; and that a representation be made to the king to lay before him how few instances have been, in former reigns, of denying the royal assent to bills for the redress of grievances; and the grief of the commons for his not having given the royal assent to several public bills, and in particular to this bill, which tends so much to clear the reputation of this house, after having voted so freely to supply the public occasions."

These resolutions being formed into a representation, it was presented by the whole house to the king, who was pleased to make the following answer:

"Gentlemen,

"I am very sensible of the good offices you have expressed for me on many occasions; and the zeal you have shewn for our common interest; I shall make use of this opportunity to tell you, that no prince ever had a higher esteem for the constitution of the English government, than myself; and that I shall ever have a great regard for the advice of parliament.

"I am persuaded that nothing can so much conduce to the welfare of this kingdom, as an entire confidence between the king and people, which I shall by all means endeavour to preserve; and I assure you I shall look upon such persons as my enemies, who shall advise any thing that may lessen it."

This answer, however kind, was not thought sufficient by many of the members of the house of commons; and a motion was made, "that application be made to the king for a farther answer." This occasioned a very warm debate; but the question being put, it passed in the negative.

Another bill for naturalizing foreign protestants, engaged the attention of the public. It was represented on one hand, that the ravages of war, the depopulation of the kingdom, the decay of agriculture, the wealth and industry of the refugees, already established in England, the prospect of increasing their numbers, and thereby giving subjects to the state, and fresh resources to commerce and manufactures, were considered as objects of the last importance, and urged in behalf of the bill. On the other hand it was alledged, that foreigners engaged in the manufactures of the English, would infallibly be of great prejudice to them; that after amassing fortunes at their expence, they would leave the kingdom, and return with their riches to their native country; that numbers of artificers were starving for want of employment, and that the evil instead of being lessened would be increased by this measure. In short, to admit so many non-conformists into the number of natural born subjects, was to expose the church of England to danger which should be avoided. The last observation was urged with great warmth, and prevailed with many who considered the church and state as a prey to foreigners. Popular prejudices are often formidable. The court party saw the difficulty, and despairing of success, withdrew the bill till a more favourable opportunity.

While the parliament were employed in settling the supplies, captain Bombow bombarded St. Maloes four days together, but with no remarkable success. The engineer in this expedition had prepared a fire-ship of a new construction, which was intended to be laid as close to the walls as possible, and there set on fire, the explosion of which it was imagined would have produced very great effects. But in conducting her to the place intended, she ran on a rock; and the engineer perceiving it would now be impossible to execute the design, set her on fire. The explosion was prodigious; all the windows in St. Maloes were broken, the roofs of several houses torn off, and the earth trembled for three miles round. Had she been carried close to the walls as intended, and there set on fire, great part of the town must have been destroyed.

A.D. 1694. About the latter end of February advice arrived, that a fleet of merchant ships, under a convoy of men of war, commanded by Sir Francis Wheeler, having sailed from Gibraltar up the Streights, met with a most violent storm, which continued the whole day and the succeeding night, and occasioned the most melancholy misfortune. The Suffex, the ship on board of which Sir Francis carried his flag, foundered, and he himself with his whole crew, except two Moors, perished; the Cambridge and Lumley-castle men of war, the Serpent bomb-ketch, and the Mary ketch, together with six merchantmen, were driven ashore, to the eastward of Gibraltar, and most of their men lost. The same fate attended three Dutch ships richly laden; but rear-admiral Nevill, and three Dutch men of war, had the good fortune to escape into Cadiz.

most

On the twenty-fifth of April, the money bills being all passed, and the king desirous of opening the campaign early, came to the house of peers, and put an end to the session with a speech from the throne, in which his majesty thanked them for the zeal they had expressed for the government, and for the large supplies they had granted; promised to do his part towards rendering the efforts against the common enemy successful, and intreated them to be careful to preserve the public peace during his absence.

The confederate fleet sailed early in the spring; but they were neither able to block up the French in Brest, nor to bring them to a general engagement at sea. They industriously avoided a battle: the defeat at La Hogue was not yet forgotten; another such misfortune would have almost annihilated their maritime power. They sailed from Brest before the English appeared, and continued their course to the Mediterranean; Lewis having formed very dangerous designs against Spain. William knew this, and gave orders to admiral Russel to follow them; but being informed that a fleet of French merchantmen was lying in Bertram-bay bound to the westward, the admiral detached captain Pickard and the Roebuck fire-ship to take or destroy them. He executed his orders with success: the fleet consisted of fifty-five sail, of which he burnt or sunk thirty-five, and drove their convoy among the rocks, where she was set on fire, and soon after blew up. Two armed sloops that attended her were also destroyed.

A project for destroying Brest had been for some time concerted, and an attempt was now made for carrying it into execution. The land forces were commanded by lieutenant-general Talmash; and on the fifth of June, lord Berkeley, admiral of the blue squadron, parted from admiral Russel, with twenty-nine men of war of the line, besides small frigates, bomb-ketches, fire-ships and transports. On the seventh he came to an anchor between Bertram-bay and Camaret, a small neck of land in the mouth of the river of Brest.

On the eighth it was resolved that eight ships of the line should enter the bay in order to cover the landing of the troops, and, if possible, to silence the batteries of the enemy. The marquis of Carmarthen, who commanded this squadron, was no sooner within reach of the enemy's mortars, than they began to play upon them with the utmost fury from the point de Filettes and the western point of Camaret. Three batteries more were now opened upon them, situated in different parts of the bay. But notwithstanding all this opposition, the marquis posted the ships in such a manner, that they gave great assistance to the land forces, and silenced some of the batteries.

While the ships were thus playing upon the enemy, Talmash landed at the head of about nine hundred men, under a little rock on the south side of a small bay, where they were immediately charged with so much vigour by the French marines, that they were obliged to retire to their boats in great confusion. But it happening to be ebb tide, most of their boats were fast aground, so that the greater part of the men were either killed or taken prisoners. Among the rest the brave Talmash was mortally wounded. The rest of the boats escaped to the ships; and the marquis, perceiving it was impossible to succeed, stood out of the bay, with the loss of the Wesep, a small Dutch man of war, and four hundred men. Of the forces that landed near four hundred were either killed or taken prisoners, and about the same number desperately wounded. Such was the consequence of an expedition which had no chance of succeeding. The secret had not been kept, and the French had time sufficient to take measures abundantly sufficient to render the attempt abortive had nine thousand instead of nine hundred men been landed.

The campaign in Flanders was marked with no event of consequence. The allies endeavoured to penetrate into the French territories but were prevented by Luxembourg, who posted his army in such a manner, that William, despairing of success, invested Huy, which soon surrendered. The advantage was, however, on the side of the allies, and many entertained thoughts that the French would now be willing to make a peace upon equitable terms. They were mistaken; Lewis was not yet sufficiently humbled to give peace to Europe.

The king being returned to England, he opened the session of parliament with a speech from the throne, in which he informed them, that though no great advantage had been gained, a stop had been put to the progress of the French arms; that having had so much experience of their affections and their zeal for the public, he could not doubt of their being willing to assist him with supplies sufficient for carrying on the war with vigour, the only means of obtaining a safe and honourable peace. He concluded with earnestly recommending a bill for the encouragement of seamen. "You must be sensible," said he, "how much a law of this nature would tend to the advancement of trade, and of the naval strength of this kingdom; which is our great interest, and ought to be our principal care."

The parliament made no difficulty of complying with the king's request. The supplies, which amounted to near five millions were readily granted. But at the same time the commons brought in a bill for the more frequent calling of parliaments. This bill went hand in hand with those for the supply, and having passed both houses, received the royal assent on the twenty-second of December. By this bill it was enacted that a new parliament should be called every third year, and that the present parliament should be dissolved before the end of the succeeding year. The passing of this bill gave great joy to the people. They were persuaded that the manner of procuring votes at elections by bribery and corruption would now be laid aside; and that the commons would recover at once their strength and reputation.

The very day this bill was brought into parliament, Dr. John Tillotson, archbishop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature, sincerely lamented by all who esteemed piety and virtue. He was a person of great judgment, clear understanding, and a tender and compassionate heart: a faithful and zealous friend, but a gentle and forgiving enemy. Without affectation, bigotry, or superstition, he was truly religious. His notions of morality were at once excellent and sublime. His reasoning was clear, easy and solid. He enforced the precepts of the gospel, in pure and elegant language. His sermons were so greatly admired that they were esteemed the best examples of sacred declamation in any language; nor have they yet lost their esteem.

Both the king and queen were greatly affected at the death of this pious prelate. The queen for several days mentioned him in the tenderest manner, and never without tears. He died so poor, that if the king had not given up his first-fruits, his debts could not have been paid. He was too charitable to acquire riches, and the only legacy he left to his family was his works. Dr. Tennison, bishop of Lincoln, was judged the most proper to supply his place, and he was accordingly translated to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury.

The queen herself did not long survive her favourite prelate. She was taken ill about a month after his death. She was seized with the small-pox on the twenty-first of December, and died on the twenty-eighth, in the thirty-third year of her age, and the sixth of her reign. She was an excellent princess, and adorned with most of the virtues that render the sex amiable. Her charity was very extensive, but entirely void of ostentation; and her example of conjugal fondness was greatly superior to what is generally found in her exalted station. The nation testified their loss by their tears; for the queen was universally lamented.

Sensible that his majesty's interest was greatly weakened by the death of the queen, both houses of parliament attended on his majesty with their address of condolence, on the thirty-first of December: that of the lords was as follows.

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do with inexpressible grief humbly assure your majesty of the deep sense we have of the loss your majesty, and the whole kingdom, doth sustain, by the death of that excellent princess, our sovereign lady the queen; most humbly beseeching your majesty that you would not indulge your grief upon this sad occasion, to the prejudice of the health of your royal person; in whose preservation, not only the welfare of your own subjects, but of all christendom, is so much concerned. We farther beg leave on this sad occasion, humbly to renew to your majesty the hearty and sincere assurances of our utmost assistance against all our enemies both at home and abroad, and of all other demonstrations of the greatest duty and affection, that can possibly be paid by the most faithful subjects."

The king returned a very gracious answer, which was couched in the following terms: "I heartily thank you for your kindness to me, but much more for the sense you shew of our great loss, which is above what I can express." The whole nation followed the example of the two houses of parliament, and consolatory addresses were presented to the king from all quarters of the kingdom. The princess of Denmark, who had for some time been refused admittance to her sister, wrote the following letter to the king on this mournful occasion.

"Sir,

"I beg your majesty's favourable acceptance of my sincere and hearty sorrow for your great affliction in the loss of the queen; and I do assure your majesty I am as sensibly touched with this sad misfortune, as if I had never been so unfortunate as to have fallen under her displeasure. It is my earnest desire your majesty would give me leave to wait upon you, as soon as it can be without inconvenience to you, and without danger of increasing your affliction; that I may have an opportunity myself, not only of repeating this, but of assuring your majesty of my real intentions to omit no occasion of giving you constant proofs of my sincere respect and concern for your person and interest, as becomes duty."

Sir,

Your majesty's sister,

ANNE."

This letter produced the desired effect. Pleased with discovering that the princess was forming no party against him, he listened to the instances of the earl of Sunderland, who brought about a reconciliation between them. The princess waited upon the king at Kensington, and was received with the strongest marks of esteem. St. James's palace was appointed for her residence, and the king made her a present of the greatest part of the late queen's jewels. But though a reconciliation took place, it was without friendship; a political regard only subsisted between them.

A. D. 1685. The queen, after lying in state at Whitehall, was interred with great solemnity in Westminster-abbey. Not only her majesty's household, but all the judges, serjeants at law, the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and, which raised the mournful pomp to the highest pitch of splendor, both houses of parliament attended the royal corpse to the abbey, where a funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Tennison, archbishop of Canterbury.

A. D. 1695. THE enemies of the government ungenerously took advantage of the death of queen Mary for distressing their country. The earl of Rochester proposed a doubt in the house of lords with regard to the legality of the present parliament. This doubt was certainly very ill founded: because the calling of a parliament is part of the executive power, which had been lodged in the king by the act of settlement. Had this objection been deemed of force sufficient to have procured the dissolution of the present parliament, the consequence might have been fatal to the liberties of Europe, as all the preparations for opening the ensuing campaign must have been suspended till a new parliament could have been assembled. But the observation was happily thought too frivolous by the house that it was not seconded.

The commons now applied themselves to the discovery of ways and means for raising the supplies; but were soon stopped in their progress by the discovery of an alarming scene of bribery and corruption; in which not only the agents of the army, and some members of parliament, but even the privy-counsellors themselves, were deeply concerned. The enquiry into these corrupt practices was as accidental as it was necessary. It was occasioned by the just complaints of some inhabitants of Royton, in Hertfordshire, against the abuses of officers and soldiers in demanding subsistence-money. Their petition being laid before the house of commons, and the petitioners, together with Mr. Tracy Pauncefort, agent of colonel Hastings's regiment, and the officers complained of being heard and examined, it was unanimously resolved, "That the officers and soldiers of the army demanding and exacting subsistence money in their quarters, or on their march, is arbitrary and illegal, and a great violation of the rights and liberties of the subject;" and it was ordered, "That the commissioners for taking and stating the public accounts do lay before the house their observations of the abuses and ill practices committed by the agents of the army; and that agent Pauncefort should forthwith lay before the house a particular account of all the monies received by him from the earl of Renalagh, and the times of such receipts, since the twenty-eighth of May last; and how he had paid the sums, when, and to whom, and what remained in his hand.

Pursuant to this order, Mr. Harley, from the commissioners for taking and stating the public accounts, presented presented to the house their observations on the ill practices committed by the agents; which being taken into consideration, and Pouncefort, upon bringing in his accounts, being examined, as also colonel Hastings, major Montcal, and some other officers and agents, it was resolved by the house, that agent Tracy Pouncefort, for neglecting to pay the subsistence-money to the officers and soldiers quartered at Royston, having moities in his hands to do the same, be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms attending the house." About a fortnight after, Pouncefort was again examined; and refusing to answer several questions, though required on pain of being proceeded against with the utmost rigour and severity, it was unanimously resolved, "That his absolute refusal to answer to a matter of fact, demanded of him by the house, he had violated the privilege, and contemned the authority of the house, and the fundamental constitution thereof;" and was immediately sent a prisoner to the Tower for his offence.

The next person who felt the weight of the commons' resentment, was Mr. Edward Pouncefort, brother to the agent, who being examined, it was resolved, "That he, for contriving to cheat colonel Hastings's regiment, and for giving a bribe to obtain the king's pardon, be taken into custody." Mr. Henry Guy was the next victim. He was a member of the house, and secretary to the treasury; but for having taken a bribe of two hundred guineas for procuring the arrears due to a regiment to be paid, was committed to the Tower, and deprived of his post. The members were more provoked, because it was generally believed that he, together with the speaker, had been deeply concerned in corrupting the members of the house of commons. He had held his post in the reigns of the two preceding kings, and the share he had in the secret distribution of the money, had rendered him a necessary assistant in those measures.

Having proceeded to a sufficient length, the commons agreed to represent the whole to the king, setting forth the notorious abuses, ill practices, and intolerable exactions of the colonels and their agents, on the inferior officers and common soldiers; and his majesty promised to take the necessary care to redress these grievances. Colonel Hastings was immediately discharged, and his regiment given to Sir John Jacob, his lieutenant-colonel.

The commons proceeded in their enquiries with regard to several other species of corruption, and several of a very extraordinary nature were discovered. But before they had finished their enquiries, the king came to the house of peers, and sending for the commons, put an end to the session with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am come to give you thanks for the supplies provided for carrying on the war in which we are engaged; and, at the same time, to conclude this session, which cannot be continued longer without manifest prejudice to the end for which these supplies were given, the season of the year making it so necessary for me to be abroad, that it were to be wished our business at home would have allowed me to have been there sooner.

"I will take care to place the administration of affairs, during my absence, in such persons, on whose care and fidelity I can entirely depend; and I doubt not, my lords and gentlemen, that every one of you, in your several stations, will be assisting to them. This is what I require of you, and that you will be more than ordinarily diligent in preserving the public peace." The king immediately embarked for Holland, after nominating a council of regency, in which neither the princess nor prince of Denmark had any share. This occasioned a fresh subject of complaint, and the king's conduct was reflected on with great severity.

This campaign was more favourable to the allies than any of the preceding. William had now the honour of stopping the French arms, and even of taking Namur. Marshal Bouffiers, a distinguished general, was in the place, with near sixteen thousand men; while an army of an hundred thousand, under the command of marshal Villeroy, threatened the besiegers with a battle. The garrison behaved with the utmost intrepidity; but the prudence of William rendered all his attempts abortive. He took Namur in the sight of the French army. Lewis, enraged at this disappointment, bombarded Brussels, in revenge for the bombardment of Dieppe, Havre de Grace, St. Malo, Dunkirk, and Calais, by the English the preceding year. The latter also attempted new bombardments, but with no remarkable success. All Europe was in flames, and exhausted of men and money, for the quarrel of some particular princes, who, perhaps, never sighed over the calamities of their subjects. Distress, however piercing, had no effect on them; they were deaf to the voice of complaint.

When William returned from the continent, he was received in triumph by his subjects. The conquest of Namur, in so remarkable a manner, merited all their applause. On this occasion he affected a popularity, which being unnatural, was awkward, and could not be lasting. It, however, served to gain him several friends, and greatly retarded the machinations of his enemies.

The former parliament being dissolved, a new one met at Westminster on the twenty-second of November; and having elected Paul Foley, Esq; for the speaker, the king opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which he observed, "That he had engaged in the present war by the advice of his first parliament; that the last had, with great cheerfulness, assisted him in carrying it on; and that he doubted not but the present would as readily support him in it, by granting the necessary supplies: that he could not but take notice, on this occasion, of the signal bravery of the English forces during the last campaign, which had reflected equal honour on themselves, and on the nation to which they belonged. He lamented, as a great misfortune, his having been obliged, from the very beginning of his reign, to ask such large aids of his people; but, at the same time, observed, they were absolutely necessary for the effectual prosecution of the war. He took notice, that the funds had been deficient, and the condition of the civil list such, that he could not possibly subsist without their care. He told them, that compassion obliged him to mention the miserable condition of the French protestants who suffered for their religion, and the redress of the bad state of the coin, though they would prove an additional charge. He recommended to them the framing bills for the encouragement and increase of seamen, the advancement of trade, particularly that of the West-Indies; and for recruiting the army in such a manner, that the people should have no cause to complain: and concluded with exhorting them to use dispatch, and to avoid heats and divisions."

The first bill passed by this parliament, was that respecting trials for high-treason; a subject which, though of the last importance, had hitherto been subject to many abuses. By this bill it was enacted, that the person impeached should have a copy of the impeachment five days before the trial came on, and be allowed counsel for his defence: that no person should be impeached, but on the testimony of two credible witnesses: that if the impeachment consisted of several articles, the two witnesses could only be considered as one, when their depositions were not upon the same article: that the person accused should have a list of the witnesses two days before the trial; and that three years after the crime was committed, no accusation should take place, unless the crime was an attempt against the life of the king. The lords added a clause, whereby a peer was to be judged by the whole house of lords. Had this law taken place sooner, sooner, it would have saved the lives of many illustrious men, and liberty would have had a rampart against despotism and ministerial vengeance. It is a deplorable consideration, that the beneficial science of legislation arrives so slowly at perfection, even in points where the interests of humanity are so greatly affected.

This celebrated bill being dispatched, the commons proceeded to take into their consideration the supplies for the succeeding year. The necessary estimates were laid before them, and they voted five millions twenty-four thousand eight hundred and fifty-three pounds for that service. The funds necessary for raising this prodigious sum were the following: 1. By a land-tax of four shillings in the pound. 2. By duties continued on wine, vinegar, tobacco, East-India goods, and other merchandizes. 3. An additional duty upon all French commodities. 4. Duties on low wines or spirits of French extraction. 5. Duties continued upon salt, glass-ware, tobacco-pipes, &c. They also settled a fund for raising five hundred thousand pounds a year for the civil list; and another for raising fifteen thousand pounds a year for the relief of the French protestants.

The next subject that engaged the attention of the parliament, was the amendment of the current coin; and they resolved, that the established standard should be preserved, with regard to weight and fineness; and that the loss arising from calling in the old money should be borne by the public, and a fund was established for that purpose. The new coinage was placed under the direction of Sir Isaac Newton, and Mr. Locke lent his assistance. Nor is it in such circumstances only that men of letters may be useful to the state.

A. D. 1696. From the very beginning of this reign, conspiracies, many of them imaginary, had been frequently talked of; but a real plot was now formed, either to carry off or assassinate William, and restore his rival to the throne he had abdicated. The earl of Aylesbury, lord Montgomery, and several other persons of less distinction, were at the head of this conspiracy. The duke of Berwick, James's natural son, passed secretly through the kingdom, encouraging the Jacobites, and declaring that an invasion was ready to take place. He conjured them to exert themselves on this occasion, and concerted measures for rendering the attempt successful.

While the conspirators were labouring, with the utmost assiduity, to increase their party, the russians, who were to execute the execrable deed, held private meetings in London, where the proper measures for carrying it into execution were concerted. Sir George Barclay, a native of Scotland, and a man of undaunted courage, may be considered as the leader of this desperate band. He was a furious bigot to the church of Rome, close, circumspect, and cruel. He came into England in the beginning of January, and having procured a private commission from James, the rest of the party implicitly obeyed his orders. This enthusiast undertook the horrid task of assassinating the king, with the assistance of forty horse. The king usually hunted at Richmond on every Saturday; and it was resolved to attack him in his return to Kensington, in the lane between Brentford and Turnham-green. This scheme was so well laid, that it would, probably, have succeeded, had not one Pendergrafs revealed the whole the very day before it was intended to be executed.

Pendergrafs was an Irish officer, and a Roman catholic, and therefore considered as a proper person to engage in so desperate an attempt. He was accordingly solicited, and seemed at first very willing to engage. But reflecting on the horrid barbarity of an act detested by God and man, he repaired immediately to the earl of Portland, and discovered to him the whole scheme, begging to be introduced to his majesty. Portland informed the king of this discovery, and Pendergrafs was admitted into his majesty's closet, where he fully revealed all the particulars he knew relative to this horrid conspiracy. He at first, however, refused to give up the names of the conspirators; but, on the king's promising that he should not be produced as an evidence, without his own consent, he gave his majesty a list of the assassins.

Every measure was now taken to render the whole contrivance abortive. Admiral Russel sailed immediately for the coast of France; and the enemy, confounded at his appearance, retired into their harbours; and James, who was arrived at Calais in order to embark, retired to his court at St. Germain's, overwhelmed with grief and disappointment. In the mean time, the king laid the whole design before the parliament. Both houses immediately waited upon his majesty with the most loyal addresses; wherein they congratulated him on the escape of his royal person from the designs of his enemies; declared their abhorrence of such villainous and traitorous attempts; and solemnly promised to stand by and defend his royal person against all his enemies, open and concealed; adding, that if he should fall by a violent attempt, they would severely revenge it on the Roman catholics. They likewise drew up an association to the same purpose, which was signed by all the members of the house; wherein they declared king William their rightful and lawful king, and mutually engaged to stand by each other in his defence. The king returned them thanks for their zeal for his person, and declared he should always be ready to risqué his life in defence of the laws, religion, and liberties of the nation.

Several of the conspirators were seized, tried at the Old Bailey, where they were found guilty of high-treason on the clearest evidence, and suffered at Tyburn.

Sir John Fenwick had a considerable share in the conspiracy. There were two witnesses against him, but one of them disappeared without giving evidence in the court. He had, however, given a written deposition, and the legality of this was strongly debated in parliament. The advocates of the person accused maintained, that, according to all the rules of jurisprudence, the evidence ought to be present, and to be confronted by the prisoner; that the depositions of the dead were inadmissible, and those of the absent equally void; that the parliament, though not subject to the rules of inferior courts, was nevertheless subject to the eternal and invariable rules of equity; and that the late act relating to processes of high-treason, would be openly violated by a contrary practice. These arguments, however plausible, were too weak to gain a majority. Established principles gave way to the security of government. A bill of attainder was passed against Fenwick, and he was executed pursuant to his sentence. Several others, among whom Sir John Friend, a brewer in the Minories, was the principal, besides the conspirators who were to have executed the horrid deed, suffered for their treason.

The campaign was opened on the continent by the allies burning a prodigious magazine which had been laid up at Givet, for the use of the enemy. But though the beginning was prosperous, and the war continued with the same animosity: the powers engaged in it were no longer capable of making the same efforts. Notwithstanding the ardour of William, the campaign in Flanders had no striking events. Lewis XIV. less fortunate than before, was now desirous of peace. He accordingly dispatched M. de Callieres, as his ambassador to the states-general, for settling such preliminaries as might serve as a basis for a treaty. The Dutch, with the consent of king William, listened to the proposal; and it was agreed to accept the mediation of the king of Sweden, which had already been offered by the baron Lillieroot, his ambassador at the Hague. Lewis, however, did not wholly depend upon negotiation; he made very advantageous offers to the duke of Savoy, and drew him off from the grand alliance.

This

This perfidious conduct of the duke greatly enraged the allies: his ministers, indeed, attempted to excuse it, by alledging, that it was absolutely necessary for him to embrace the offers of France, in order to prevent his own ruin; and that common prudence would not suffer him to let slip an opportunity of procuring such singular advantages to his own family.

The campaign in Catalonia, and on the Rhine, was as barren of events as that in Flanders: the advantage, if any, was on the side of the allies; but all the armies retired into winter quarters in the beginning of October.

As the distress of the army abroad was chiefly owing to the calling in and recoining the money, so the same calamity was felt among the manufacturers and labourers, who were most of them idle, occasioned by the scarcity of coin, few masters being able to employ any workmen. An order of council was therefore issued in July, directing the justices of the peace to meet frequently in their respective divisions, in order to consult the most effectual means to relieve and subsist the poor, till a sufficient quantity of money could be issued to relieve the present scarcity. The attorney-general was also ordered to prosecute all those who had entered into confederacies not to employ any workmen in the woollen and other manufactures during the present scarcity of coin.

As soon as the armies were gone into winter quarters, William returned to England, and opened the session of parliament on the twentieth of October. He told them, "that he thought it a great happiness that no disadvantage had happened abroad, nor any disorder at home during the last summer, considering the great disappointments in the funds, and the trouble that had arisen in receiving the money: that the business they had before them would be attended with great difficulty, as they were not only to provide for the service of the ensuing year, but also to make good the deficiencies of the last." He observed, "that overtures of peace had indeed been made him; but he was certain they would prove abortive; that the only way to procure an honourable peace was to treat sword in hand; and therefore, the supplies for the succeeding must, at least, be equal to those for the last. He also pressed them to maintain the honour of parliament, by making good the funds they had granted. He reminded them of the civil list and the French protestants, and of making some farther provision for remedying the difficulties relating to the coin, and for recovering the national credit."

The commons, in answer to his majesty's speech, assured him in their address, "That though this was the eighth year they had assisted him with large supplies, for carrying on this just and necessary war, they should be neither amused nor diverted from their firm resolution of obtaining, by war, a safe and honourable peace;" and concluded with declaring, "That they would continue to support his majesty against all his enemies, both at home and abroad."

They accordingly voted five millions for the sea and land service for the succeeding year; besides a supply for the civil list, and new funds for making good the deficiencies, and securing the public debts, which now amounted to near twelve millions. Notwithstanding it was so vastly large, they pursued such vigorous measures, that they surmounted every difficulty, and placed the credit of the nation on a sure and solid basis.

A.D. 1697. The parliament having finished the national business, the king came to the house of peers on the sixteenth of April; and after giving the royal assent to the bills they had passed, put an end to the session with a speech from the throne, in which he thanked them for the large supplies they had granted him; congratulated them on the success of their endeavours for restoring public credit; acquainted them with his intention of passing over to the continent; and begged they would carry with them into their respective counties the same loyal principles they had so conspicuously displayed in parliament.

The conferences for a peace were opened at Ryfwic on the twenty-ninth of May, and the negotiation proceeded with very little trouble. The demands of Spain, that France should restore all the conquests that had been made during the war, seemed the only difficulty. Lewis was therefore determined to exert all his force against that kingdom, in order to induce the Spanish plenipotentiaries to accept the offers of France. The city of Barcelona was accordingly besieged and taken by the duke de Vendôme. De Pontis, a French commodore, was sent, with a small fleet, to the West-Indies, where he took and plundered the town of Carthagena, and returned with an immense booty. These successes tended greatly to hasten the conclusion of the treaty. Lewis gave up almost all his conquests. To Spain he restored Luxembourg, Mons, Ath, Courtray, besides what he had taken in the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees. To the Empire, Friburg, Brisac, Philipsburg, &c. And, lastly, he acknowledged the prince of Orange king of England. Thus William was confirmed in his possession of the throne, while France abandoned all the fruits of her victories. Lewis submitted to these conditions more from policy than generosity. The burden of the war was become intolerable. The victors and the vanquished were equally weakened. It was absolutely necessary that the finances should be repaired, and the murmurings of the people satisfied. Lewis, after he had deluged Europe with blood to satisfy his ambition, was obliged to purchase peace at the expence of his conquests.

Soon after the signing of this treaty, William returned to England, where he was received with great demonstrations of joy. On the third of December, he opened the session of parliament with a speech from the throne; wherein he observed, "That the war he had entered into by the advice of his people, was, by their assistance, brought to the end he had ever proposed, a safe and honourable peace: that he was sorry, however, to acquaint them, that his subjects could not immediately find that relief from the peace they might expect, the funds having fallen short, and there remaining so great a debt to the navy and army, besides what was wanting to support the civil list. He observed, that the navy was increased almost double since his accession, and could not be supported without a proportional increase of money; and he believed they would agree with him in allowing, that the chief strength of England must ever consist in a powerful navy: that, considering the state of affairs abroad, he was of opinion, that the kingdom could not be safe without a land force. He promised to rectify whatever abuses might have crept into any part of the administration during the war, and effectually to discourage prophaneness and immorality. He expressed his satisfaction with the proofs his people had given him of their loyalty and attachment to his person;" and concluded with declaring, "That as he had, at the hazard of his life, rescued their religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremest danger; so he should place the chief glory of his reign in preserving and leaving them entire to posterity."

The parliament, in their address, complimented him on the peace; and assured him, "That they would be always ready to support his majesty, who had confirmed them in the quiet possession of their rights and liberties; and, by putting an end to the war, fully completed their deliverance."

But notwithstanding these congratulations and compliments, they opposed his designs. This politic and warlike prince was desirous of establishing a standing army, which could not fail of rendering him respectable both at home and abroad. The conduct of Lewis, who still retained a considerable part of his army, seemed to lay the other powers under a necessity of doing the same. This was a very plausible reason, and adopted by several of the members; but the majority was alarmed at the king's proposal. It had an apparent tendency to establish despotism on the ruins of the constitution. They were persuaded the nation would soon lose its privileges, and the people their liberties, if mercenary troops were at the command of the government. "This custom," said they, "being once established will become a maxim of state; and elections, parliaments, every thing will depend upon the caprice of the court. Is not the kingdom sufficiently defended by the ocean that surrounds it? May not the militia be established and regularly exercised? And will not such men be more zealous in the defence of their country than mercenaries? Will not these with a formidable fleet be a sufficient security against any invasion?" These arguments seemed unanswerable, and prevailed with the majority. Ten thousand only of the land forces were retained; and three thousand added to the marine.

Highly offended with this resolution of the commons, and persuaded that they suspected he had formed designs against their liberties, William declared he would have had nothing to do with the government, if he could have suspected the parliament could have been guilty of so much distrust and ingratitude.

A. D. 1698. The commons now applied themselves assiduously to the discovery of means for the discharge of the public debt. The necessary supplies amounted to near five millions sterling; and it required all their wisdom to raise so large a sum, after the nation had been impoverished by the late war. The East India company offered to advance seven hundred thousand pounds for the service of the public, at the rate of four per cent. interest, provided the legislature would settle on them the exclusive trade to India. This offer was favourably received by the ministry, and would, in all probability, have been accepted, had not another company of merchants made more advantageous proposals. They offered to lend the government two millions on the same terms. They also proposed that their subscribers should not be obliged to trade in a joint stock; but if any number of their members desired to be incorporated, a charter should be granted them for that purpose. The last proposal was thought the most eligible, and a bill was accordingly brought into parliament, and easily passed the commons; but on its being sent up to the lords, the old company petitioned the house, and they were heard by their council against the bill. They alleged, "that the company had actually acquired, at their own expence, revenues at Fort St. George, Fort St. David, and Bombay, as well as in Persia, and other parts, amounting to forty-four thousand pounds per annum, arising from customs and licences for a great number of particulars: that they had also erected forts and settlements, and procured settlements in the island of Sumatra, and on the coast of Malabar, without which the pepper-trade must have been actually lost to England: that they had also a strong fort in the kingdom of Bengal, and also many factories, buildings and settlements in various other parts; having purchased, at high rates, of the Indian princes many valuable privileges and immunities: that they were encouraged to do this from a presumption that their rights and inheritance would always be objects of the nation's care: that since this bill had been brought into parliament, the company had agreed to submit their present stock to a valuation of fifty per cent. viz. twenty per cent. for their dead stock, namely their forts, factories and lands, and thirty per cent. for their quick stock, which they were content even to warrant at that rate: and upon these terms the company likewise offered to raise a subscription of two millions."

To this it was answered by the council for the new subscribers, "That the old company in reciting their charters, had forgot to mention the provisos they contained, the kings of England, who granted them, having reserved to themselves a discretionary power to make them void on three years warning: that the king could not grant the trade, exclusive of all others, by his charter alone, it being directly contrary to positive laws; nor had his present majesty in fact granted any such exclusive right: that several recoveries had been made at law against the company for prosecuting such pretended right: that his majesty's message to the commons in the year 1692 plainly signified that the concurrence of parliament was necessary for making a complete and useful settlement of this trade: that the company's managers, in order to obtain their last new charter and regulations, had made no scruple of having recourse to the indirect methods of bribery and corruption: that it was never esteemed a breach of public faith, nor a derogation from the authority of the great seal, or from the honour of our kings, to have their patents annulled by parliament, when it appeared that such grants were either unprofitable, or contrary to the common rights of the subject; neither did any of our king's think themselves bound in honour or conscience to refuse passing an act of parliament for the annulling of such grants: that moreover kings having been often deceived by such grants, they have even frequently been annulled by the common course of law."

On the other hand it was replied, and urged, in behalf of the old company, "That the properties of many families, widows, and orphans, would be greatly affected by the bill now depending, which they said made no provision for a determined stock; so that it may hereafter happen that the trade may be lost to the nation for want of a sufficient capital to carry it on; it appearing, by thirty years experience, that it requires at least six hundred thousand pounds a year to carry it on in its full extent: that by this bill the new subscribers were permitted to trade during the three years, as well as the company, which is directly contrary to the charter, will create great confusion, and render the said three years allowed the old company of no benefit, because they are still bound to export to the value of one hundred thousand pounds annually in our own manufactures, though the new subscribers are under no such obligations: that the old company are besides obliged to pay taxes to keep up forts, factories, &c. while the new subscribers are to have an equal benefit of the trade without either: that since the last subscription in 1693, the company has lost, either by accidents, or the calamities of war, twelve large ships, which, with their cargoes, would have sold for near a million and a half sterling; and yet, notwithstanding such losses, they have paid in customs since that period two hundred and ninety-five thousand pounds, besides eighty-five thousand in taxes: that they had, moreover, supplied his majesty in Holland, on a very pressing occasion, with six thousand barrels of gunpowder; and had also, at a time of great extremity, subscribed eighty thousand pounds for circulating exchequer bills, at the instance of the treasury; and that many hundred families have their whole fortunes depending in the stock of the present company, who must be utterly ruined if this bill takes effect."

All these arguments, however powerful, were urged in vain. The bill passed the lords in favour of the new company, without paying any regard to ancient charters, or the fortunes of a multitude of families. They received their charter on the third of September; and on the fifth his majesty incorporated them as one joint-stock exclusive company, trading to the East Indies.

But the parliament did not confine their disquisitions wholly to the commercial state of the nation, and the ways and means for raising the large supplies that were become absolutely necessary; they exerted themselves nobly to prevent that corruption of manners which was every day gaining ground in the kingdom. Persuaded that unless care be taken to keep the people's morals from being tainted, wealth and power will only become the sources of poison; that the vices of the citizens are infectious to the body politic; that a state without virtue has almost as many enemies as subjects; and that its grandeur is a preface of its ruin: they presented an address to his majesty, in which they enumerated the excessive irregularities that prevailed, and were daily increasing; and requested him to issue orders to the magistrates to put the laws in force against impiety and debauchery. Their address was very favourably received. The king promised to attempt, without delay, a reformation of manners, and testified his zeal for the suppression of impious books, which usually corrupt at once both the heart and the understanding. Schemes of this nature, however laudable, however necessary in themselves, are seldom executed. A society for the reformation of manners, under the protection of his majesty, was established; the members of which engaged to inform the magistrates of such debaucheries and vices as came within their knowledge. The fines imposed were destined for charitable uses. A number of ecclesiastics were to promote virtue by public lectures; and a liberal provision was made for their maintenance. These establishments, and others of a similar kind, could not fail of being useful, especially to the poor. But informations are always odious. It is the business of people in office to inspect the conduct of the citizens. And, with regard to the reformation of manners, nothing can be sufficient but those powerful resources which government alone can employ with success. The example of the court would perhaps be more effectual than any other method that could be practised.

While the parliament was laudably employed in contriving ways and means for raising the necessary supplies, and endeavouring to stop the progress of vice and immorality, Peter Alexowitz, czar of Muscovy, since known by the appellation of Peter the Great, visited this kingdom. Having formed the noble design of civilizing his barbarous subjects, of introducing the arts and sciences among them, and of rendering the forces of his empire by sea and land equal to those of his politer neighbours, he travelled through most countries in Europe to gain instruction. He was particularly desirous of establishing a marine, and of having a respectable fleet in the Baltic: and therefore his principal intention was to learn the art of ship-building. In the summer of the preceding year he sent an embassy to Holland, to regulate some points of commerce with the states-general, and accompanied his ambassadors disguised as one of their retinue. While he was on this tour he discovered himself to king William, and had a private interview with that prince at Utrecht, and in consequence of his invitation he now visited England. He staid here above three months, during which time he was lodged and entertained with all the magnificence possible for a prince, who chose to remain unknown. He passed his time here, as he had done in Holland, in examining the dock-yards, and improving himself in the art of ship-building; to attain which he worked several hours every day as a common shipwright, in the royal yard at Deptford. At his departure William made him several magnificent presents; and particularly the yacht in which he himself used to pass over to Holland. She was a very beautiful vessel, finely adorned, and called the Royal Transport. And it being thought absolutely necessary to gain his friendship, he was allowed to engage several English artificers in his service; and to take two of the scholars from Christ-church hospital; and these afterwards laid the foundation of the marine academy at Peterburgh.

The Scots, desirous of sharing in the advantages resulting from commerce, had formed a commercial company in order to carry on their foreign trade with more spirit and advantage. And animated with the same spirit of self-interest which had carried so many persons to the New World, they established, at a great expence, a colony in the Straights of Darien, the Isthmus that connects South and North America. This establishment did not resemble the bloody conquests of the Spaniards. It was made by agreement with the natives of the country; but the Spaniards complained of it as an infringement of the late treaty. The English and Dutch considered the Scots as dangerous rivals, and the colony they had established as prejudicial to their commerce. William therefore forbade all correspondence with this new colony. The Scots, finding themselves disappointed of the treasures they expected, made the most violent complaints; and their parliament adopted their cause. The most animating speeches were made in that assembly, and every thing seemed to threaten a revolt. The king was alarmed, and it was only by time, address and flattering promises, that he put a stop to an affair that threatened the most alarming consequences.

Charles II. of Spain had long been in a very declining state, and having no issue, the consequence that might attend his large dominions passing either into the Bourbon family, or that of Austria, alarmed all Europe. William passed over to the continent, where he negotiated a treaty with Lewis XIV. for the division of the Spanish monarchy. By this treaty, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the province of Guipuscoa, and several other places dependent on Spain, were destined to the dauphin; the Milanese to the archduke, Charles II. son to the emperor; and the rest to the young prince of Bavaria, who was about eight years of age. That prince died soon after the treaty; and it now became necessary to negotiate a new one. Bavaria was assigned to the archduke; Lorraine added to the possessions of the dauphin; and Milan given to the duke of Lorraine.

During the king's absence, the elections for a new parliament were carried on in England with all the appearance of freedom: the ministry giving themselves very little trouble to influence the voters. The returns were, however, generally in favour of revolution principles. The assembly met on the third of December, when William opened the session with a speech from the throne; wherein he strongly recommended to them the keeping up such a force, as might preserve that weight and influence they at present enjoyed in the affairs of the continent; and their making a farther progress in discharging the national debt contracted by the war. He concluded with recommending three popular subjects to their particular attention: the making provision for the poor; the advancement of trade; and the discouraging vice and prophaneness.

It is remarkable that in this speech William made no mention of the partition treaty he had so lately concluded abroad, and which afterwards so greatly excited the attention of the kingdom. This was industriously concealed both from the parliament and the privy-council. Probably he suspected the sincerity of Lewis, and therefore thought it extremely necessary to keep a good body of troops in readiness to compel the French monarch to observe the late treaty in case of the king of Spain's death.

Ignorant of the partition treaty, and of the necessity of keeping a large body of troops in pay, the parliament took immediately that part of the king's speech into consideration. William, when he passed over to Holland, had left orders with the ministry to retain sixteen thousand men in the service, notwithstanding the vote of the commons, by which the army was limited to ten thousand. This arbitrary act so irritated the new parliament, that they resolved to oppose the king in all his demands. They accordingly came immediately to the following resolution, "That all the land forces in English pay, exceeding seven thousand men, and these his majesty's natural born subjects, be forthwith paid off and disbanded; and that all the forces in Ireland, exceeding twelve thousand men, all his majesty's natural born subjects, be likewise forthwith disbanded and paid off." This resolution resolution being passed, a bill was ordered in, and soon passed both houses; in consequence of which not only the French protestant regiments, but even the king's favourite Dutch guards were to be removed out of the British dominions.

William was exasperated to the highest degree at this conduct of the parliament. Their jealousy so deeply affected him, that he actually formed a resolution of abandoning the government, and had even composed a speech which he intended to have delivered on that occasion; but was diverted from his rash design by his most intimate friends; and at last persuaded to give the royal assent to the bill for reducing the army.

A. D. 1699. Accordingly on the second of February he came to the house of peers, and addressed himself to the parliament in the following manner: "I am come to pass the bill for disbanding the forces as soon as I knew it was ready for my assent. Though the reduction of the army to so inconsiderable a number, may, in our present circumstances, be attended with the most fatal consequences; and though I might justly complain of the harsh treatment I have received in being deprived of those guards who accompanied me into this kingdom, and have constantly attended me in all my fortunes, yet as I am convinced that nothing can be more prejudicial to our common interest, than to suffer any jealousy or misunderstanding to arise between me and my people, I am firmly resolved to comply with your request.

"Nevertheless, after having thus assigned my reasons for passing this bill, I must likewise in discharge of the trust you have reposed in me, declare, that, in my opinion, the nation is left too naked and defenceless; it is your duty, therefore, to take this matter into your consideration, and immediately to provide such a strength as may be deemed necessary for the safety of the kingdom, and the preservation of that peace we have so lately obtained."

Though the king had passed the bill for disbanding the army, he was very unwilling to part with his guards, and accordingly sent a message to the commons, informing them, "that the necessary preparations were made for transporting the guards who came with him into England, and that he intended to send them away immediately, unless, out of consideration to him, the commons could find out some way to continue them longer in his service, which his majesty would take very kindly." But the commons were inexorable. They reminded him of his former promise to dismiss all foreign troops. The happiness of the kingdom, they added, depended on the mutual confidence of the prince and the people. That this confidence required him to intrust the care of his sacred person to his subjects.

The king, finding it would be in vain to contend with the commons, he yielded to necessity, and the Dutch guards were transported to Holland. It must be owned that the behaviour of the lower house with regard to the Dutch guards, strongly indicated that they were rather inspired with the spirit of ferocious obstinacy than genuine patriotism. William was persuaded of this, and took no pains to disguise his sentiments. "Had I as many places to bestow," said he one day to the earl of Sunderland, "as there are members in the house of commons, I should not know what it was to have my will disputed."

Nothing is more dangerous to the peace of a kingdom than a disagreement between the branches of the legislative power. The commons made it their study to thwart and vex the king, who, by his political talents, had, in a great measure, governed Europe. They examined into administration, re-established the old India company, and declared papists incapable of inheriting or purchasing lands. They deliberated on demanding of the king the removal of lord chancellor Somers; and William soon after found it necessary to deprive him of the seals to please the Tories, who formed the majority in parliament.

On the fourth of May the king came to the house of peers, and after giving the royal assent to such bills as were ready, put an end to the session with a speech from the throne, wherein he told them, "that having sat so many months, the season of the year, as well as their own particular affairs, made it reasonable they should enjoy a recess; that he took it for granted they had finished all the bills they thought necessary, and he had given his assent to all they had presented to him; that if any thing else was wanting to their safety, the security of the public credit, the discharge of the national debt, the advancement of trade, the suppression of vice, and the employment of the poor, the things he proposed to them at their meeting, he did not doubt but effectual care would be taken of them next winter; and wished no inconvenience might happen in the interval."

The Spanish monarch, who was no stranger to the treaty of partition, highly resented their usurping a power to dispose of his dominions without his consent. He determined therefore to make a will in favour of the archduke, second son to Leopold, the reigning emperor. The queen of Spain also used her utmost endeavours to give the crown to that young prince, to whom she was so nearly related. She accordingly new modelled the council; bestowed the government of Milan upon prince Vaudemont; appointed the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, viceroy of Catalonia, and carried the sick king to Toledo, under pretence that the air of Madrid was unwholesome.

But the court of Vienna, by its indiscreet and imperious conduct, rendered all these measures abortive. Charles determined not to make a will in favour of the archduke. On the other hand the marquis d'Harcourt, ambassador of Lewis XIV. managed the Spaniards with more dexterity and address. Their inveterate antipathy to France decreased every day. The grandes were as unwilling as their master to dismember the monarchy; and France alone seemed capable of preventing an incident so destructive to the honour and power of their country. They advised Charles therefore to give the preference to a prince of that nation. Pope Innocent XII. who then filled the papal chair, was consulted on this interesting subject, and approved the measure, as agreeable to the laws of Spain, and the interest of religion.

Lewis, ignorant of this resolution in favour of his family, caused sixty thousand of his best troops to advance towards Catalonia, while a great number of ships and galleys cruized along the coasts and entered the Spanish harbours. It was now absolutely necessary for some measures to be taken; and the dying monarch sacrificed the interests of his family to those of his kingdom: he nominated the duke of Anjou, youngest son to the dauphin, heir to his dominions, with this proviso, however, that the two crowns of France and Spain, should never be united.

On the sixteenth of November William opened the session of parliament with a speech from the throne, wherein he observed, that his calling them together so early was owing to an absolute necessity of making some farther provision for the security of the kingdom by sea and land; and recommended particularly the repairing the royal navy and fortifying the harbours. He reminded them also of making good the deficiencies of the funds, discharging the national debt, and providing supplies for the ensuing year. He told them, he hoped that the nation was already convinced of the good effects of the peace, by the evident increase of their trade, which he should use his utmost endeavours to promote and encourage; that he thought, however, it might receive a farther advantage, by passing a bill for punishing the unlawful and clandestine running of goods; and by employing the poor, who were become a burden to the nation: he declared himself to be fully assured of the love and affections of his people, which he should endeavour to preserve, by maintaining their rights and liberties, by supporting the established religion, by dispensing justice with clemency and impartiality, by countenancing virtue and discouraging vice, and by declining no difficulties or dangers to promote their welfare and prosperity." Having particularly declared his intentions, he concluded his speech in the following manner: "Since, therefore, our aims are only for the public good, let us act with confidence in one another, which will not fail, with God's blessing, to make me a happy king, and you a great and flourishing people."

This speech, which certainly breathed nothing but kindness, and a concern for the happiness of his people, gave great offence to the commons. The spirit of party magnifies every thing. The expression of "acting with confidence in each other," was construed into an implication of a distrust, or want of confidence in them, and they determined to resent it. They accordingly returned no address of thanks; but, on the fourth of December, presented what may be considered as a remonstrance; in which they declared, "That being highly sensible nothing was more necessary for the peace and welfare of the kingdom, the quieting of the minds of the people, and the disappointing the designs of their enemies, than a mutual and entire confidence between his majesty and his parliament, they esteemed it their greatest misfortune, that, after having so amply provided for the security of his majesty and his government, any jealousy or distrust had been raised of their duty and affection; and, at the same time, begged leave to represent, that it would greatly conduce to the continuing and establishing an entire confidence between his majesty and his parliament, if he would be pleased to shew marks of his high displeasure towards such persons as should presume to misrepresent their proceedings to his majesty; and they should, on their part, discourage all false rumours and reports reflecting on his majesty and his government, whereby any misunderstandings might be created between him and his subjects."

The king, astonished at this representation, replied, "That no person had ever yet dared to misrepresent the proceedings of either house; and if they had, they would immediately have felt the highest marks of his displeasure: and that he took very kindly the assurance they gave him of discouraging all false rumours and reports reflecting on himself and his government."

A. D. 1700. These proceedings were ill calculated to produce the harmony so necessary between the different branches of the legislature, for rendering the nation respectable abroad, and happy at home. The commons did every thing in their power to mortify the king; and William gave them, in return, many indications of his resentment. They passed a bill of resumption, whereby the estates in Ireland he had given to his favourites were taken from them, and became again the property of the crown. But not satisfied with this victory, they proceeded to such absurd lengths in their career, that they came to a resolution to address his majesty, that no person, who was not a native of his dominions, except the prince of Denmark, should be admitted into his councils of England or Ireland. But before this address could be presented, the king came to the house of peers; and, after giving the royal assent to such bills as were ready, put an end to the session.

While this ill-humour continued between the king and the house of commons, Charles II. of Spain paid the debt of nature. The death of this prince, who left no issue, seemed to threaten the balance of power in Europe. Lewis XIV. and the emperor Leopold, were related to him in the same degree; and the renunciation of Maria Teresa of Austria, wife to Lewis, and eldest daughter to Philip III. appeared to the enemies of France an engagement of very little weight. Nor was this of any great consequence, because the balance of power would be equally destroyed, whether Leopold or Lewis obtained the succession. This was the true motive that induced William to sign the treaty of partition, which, it was apprehended, would prevent a general war, as well as the two contending monarchs from becoming too powerful for the other princes of Europe. He was mistaken; the emperor refused to accede to the treaty; and it appeared, on the death of Charles, that he had bequeathed his dominions to the duke of Anjou.

Lewis, for some time, hesitated, whether he should accept the bequest or not, from the prospect of a war more formidable than any in which he had hitherto been engaged. But ambition soon decided in favour of the will. He, however, thought it necessary to justify his conduct to the king of England, and the States general. In order to this, he represented, that the treaty of partition had occasioned great and general complaints; that it was absolutely impracticable to carry it into execution; and that, in renouncing this treaty, he made large sacrifices to peace and the public good, having abandoned Sicily, Naples, and several other territories which France was to have enjoyed.

These arguments were by no means solid, and the known ambition of the house of Bourbon gave great uneasiness to the powers of Europe. The States general, for some time, refused to acknowledge the duke of Anjou king of Spain; but being in no condition to oppose the progress of Lewis, should he attempt to invade their territories, they made a virtue of necessity, by acknowledging that prince king of Spain, under the title of Philip V. William dissembled his intentions; and considering himself as destined to hold the balance of power, which was now on the point of being destroyed by the ambition of the house of Bourbon, he resolved, if possible, to form a new league, for rendering their alarming attempts abortive.

The king had met with so many mortifications during the last parliament, that he determined now to make a change in the ministry. He accordingly gave his confidence to the earl of Rochester, who was at the head of the Tories, and who undertook that the whole party should exert all their power to support the measures adopted by his majesty. That nobleman was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the privy-seal was given to the earl of Tankerville; Sir Charles Hedges was made secretary of state; lord Godolphin appointed first commissioner of the treasury; and the management of the commons intrusted to Mr. Robert Harley. The new ministry did not, however, think themselves strong enough to carry their measures in the present parliament; and it was therefore determined to dissolve it by proclamation, and summon a new one, to meet on the sixth of February.

The usual means of corruption were exerted in electing the members; and venality prevailed so far, that the Tories had a very considerable majority in the house of commons. The duke of Gloucester, only surviving son of the prince and princess of Denmark, dying on the twenty-ninth of July, it became necessary to settle the succession of the crown, after the death of the princess of Denmark, that young prince being the last of seventeen children that had proceeded from this marriage.

A. D. 1701. The new parliament meeting on the sixth of February, was prorogued till the tenth, when Mr. Harley was chosen speaker; and the next day his majesty opened the session of parliament with a speech from the throne, wherein he mentioned the great loss the nation had sustained by the death of the duke of Gloucester, which, he observed, had rendered it absolutely necessary that a farther provision should be made for the succession of the crown in the protestant line; and therefore earnestly recommended it to their early and serious consideration. He observed, that the death of the king of Spain, together with with the declaration he had made with regard to his successor, had made so great an alteration in the affairs abroad, that it required their particular attention; and that he doubted not but their resolutions on that important subject would be such, as should be most conducive to the interest and safety of England, the preservation of the protestant religion, and the peace of Europe. He told them, that considerable supplies would be necessary for the service of the current year; reminded them of the deficiencies and public debts, which were yet unprovided for; and recommended the royal navy particularly to their care; desired they would exert themselves in improving the trade of the kingdom, and in making provision for the poor.

After providing for the credit of the exchequer-bills, which, on a change of the ministry, had fallen near twenty per cent. the commons took into consideration the great object of settling the succession to the crown. After long debates, it was resolved, that, in order to exclude every catholic prince from the succession, the heir should be of the church of England; that if he were a foreigner, the nation should not engage, without consent of parliament, in any war for the defence of the dominions he might possess out of the kingdom; that he should not leave England, Scotland, or Ireland, without the same consent; that when this act of limitation should take effect; no foreigner, though a naturalized inhabitant, unless of English extraction, should be admitted into the council, become a member of either house, or obtain, by a grant from the crown, any lands or inheritance: that whoever should hold any pension or lucrative employment under the king, should be incapable of sitting in the house of commons; and that a pardon, under the great seal, should be of no effect against an impeachment of the house. Having voted these regulations, which greatly restrained the prerogative, and implied a severe censure on the present government, it was resolved, that the princess Sophia, dutchess-dowager of Hanover, and granddaughter to James I. was the next heir in the protestant line, after the respective descendants of the king and the princess of Denmark. A bill was ordered to be brought in on these resolutions; and, after passing both houses, received the royal assent on the twelfth of June.

The next object of importance that engaged the attention of parliament, was the partition treaty. It is said, that Lewis XIV. distributed large sums among the members of the lower house, in order to procure their suffrages. But however that be, the commons were so far from approving the king's measures, that they condemned them with the greatest asperity. They complained loudly of its having been signed without consent of parliament; and observed not even common decency in their debates. Sir Edward Seymour compared the division which had been made of the Spanish territories, to the distribution that highwaymen make of their booty; and Mr. Howe had even the insolence to call it a felonious treaty; an expression which so highly incensed the king, that he is reported to have said, he would have demanded personal satisfaction with his sword, had he not been restrained by the disparity of condition between himself and the person who had offered so outrageous an insult to his honour.

The peers themselves were far from approving the treaty, but their debates were guided by prudence and discretion. They examined its tendency with candour, and then represented it, in an address to the king, as incompatible both with the interest of England and the safety of Europe. They prayed his majesty to be advised by his own subjects, and place his confidence in them rather than in strangers. They added, that since the French king's accepting the will of Charles II. was a manifest violation of the treaty, they humbly advised his majesty, in future treaties with that prince, to proceed with such caution as might carry a real security.

Though this address was in reality an insult upon the king, he thought proper to dissemble his resentment; and only returned for answer, "That their address contained matters of very great moment; and he would always take care, that all treaties he made should be for the honour and safety of England."

Lewis XIV. having embraced the will of Charles II. made great preparations for supporting the duke of Anjou on the Spanish throne; and refused to grant any other security, than that of renewing the peace of Ryswick. This refusal being communicated to the parliament, both houses resolved to request his majesty would concert measures with the states-general for putting a stop to the designs of France in the Netherlands; assuring him they would always be ready to enable him to fulfil the conditions of the treaty subsisting between England and Holland.

William thanked them for the assurances they had given him; and said, he did not doubt but the readiness they had shewn on this occasion would greatly contribute to the procuring such a security as they desired. But he was far from approving their address, as it implied their disapprobation of a new confederacy, which he was very desirous of forming. They seemed to limit their assistance to the obtaining a new barrier in the Netherlands, without entering into a war for the recovery of the kingdom of Spain. He therefore thought it most prudent to acknowledge the duke of Anjou's title to that crown, and to congratulate him on his accession.

Alarmed and exasperated at this incident, the emperor loudly complained that he was abandoned by his allies at the very time he stood most in need of their assistance. He, however, determined to assert his right by force of arms; and accordingly sent prince Eugene into Italy, at the head of an army, to take possession of the dutchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire. Both the pope and the Venetians were attached to the French interest, but refused to declare themselves at this important crisis.

The Dutch, who had dearly experienced the ambitious designs of the French king, notwithstanding all his pretensions of friendship and esteem, exerted themselves in providing for their own security, by reinforcing their garrisons, and soliciting succours from foreign powers. They also wrote a letter to king William, in which they expressed the most sincere zeal for the interest of England, and earnestly requested that the stipulated number of troops might be immediately sent to their assistance. The king laid the letter before the parliament, on which the commons came to the following resolution: "That they will effectually assist his majesty to support his allies in maintaining the liberties of Europe; and will immediately provide succours for the states-general, pursuant to the treaty."

The lords went farther: they addressed his majesty in a very warm, affectionate manner; requesting that his majesty would not only perform the articles of any former treaty with the states-general, but that he would enter into a league offensive and defensive with them for their common preservation, and invite into it all princes and states that were concerned in the visible danger arising from the union of France with Spain. They also exhorted him to enter into such alliances with the emperor as his majesty should think prudent, assuring him of their resolution to assist him in the most effectual manner.

But though both houses had declared their resolutions to support his majesty, they determined to shew their displeasure against the partition treaty. The earls of Portland and Oxford, the lords Somers and Hallifax, by whose advice the treaty was supposed to have been concluded, were impeached by the commons; but the upper house declared the impeachments null and void. This exasperated the commons, and the most alarming animosities between the two houses succeeded.

The whigs now determined to exert their whole power against the tory parliament, who were become obnoxious to the people. They openly charged them with being pensioners to the French king, whose interest they espoused on all occasions. They represented them as implacable enemies to the present government; and that all their views and actions tended ultimately to the restoration of the abdicated king and his family. They even endeavoured to procure petitions from the city of London, and several of the principal counties of England, to express their disapprobation of the proceedings of the commons, and the present ministry; flattering themselves with being able, by that means, to procure a revolution in favour of their own party. They, however, failed in general; the county of Kent alone would be prevailed upon to send up a petition to parliament: it was conceived in the following terms:
